SIGILLVM · VNIVERSITATIS · CALIFORNIENSIS
LVX
FIAT
MDCCCLXVIII
EX LIBRIS

MISS PARDOE'S

COMPLETE WORKS.

COMPRISING

THE CONFESSIONS OF A PRETTY WOMAN.
THE JEALOUS WIFE.
THE RIVAL BEAUTIES.
THE WIFE'S TRIALS.
THE ROMANCE OF THE HAREM.

BY

MISS JULIA PARDOE.

COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME.

LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.

Philadelphia:
T. B. PETERSON AND BROTHERS,
306 CHESTNUT STREET.

955
P226

48516

PREFACE.

THE only explanation required by the following pages is, perhaps, a brief account of the manner in which they came into my possession. Driven, for change of air, into a distant county, after a long and severe illness, I accepted the hospitality of a friend living in one of those beautiful villages which are to be found in no other country than our own. The castellated cottage of my hostess, half-smothered in creeping roses, white jasmine, and passion-flowers, stood midway upon a gentle slope which formed the southward boundary of the village-green; the gray old church, overtopped by three venerable yews, and surrounded by its humble gravestones, joined the shrubberies on the east; snug cottages, with each its fenced-in garden, and its group of fruit-trees, were scattered along the base of a low range of hills, clothed with beeches; and, at an easy walk from the hamlet, rose a stately mansion, with an extensive park, stocked with deer, and rich in timber. This noble property was inhabited by a widow lady, whose extraordinary matron-beauty startled me when I saw her, for the first time, at the village-church; and induced inquiries on my part, to which the replies only served to increase my curiosity. I was told that she was immensely rich, profusely and unweariedly charitable, but that a dark shadow hung over her former life, by which, even now, her mood and manner were occasionally influenced.

Her circle was limited, for she would not tolerate mere acquaintance; and some of the families of the neighborhood shrank from decided friendship with an individual who might compromise them, although her hair had become gray, and that her lofty figure was somewhat bowed beneath the pressure of time.

From her own hand I received this written record of the past, only a week or two before her death; and I give it (with her permission) to the world, in all confidence that such a transcript of the real struggles of a woman's mind, and of the actual trials of a woman's life, will present more lasting and wholesome interest than the romantic creations of fiction, or the poetical miseries of a merely fertile fancy.

March, 1846.

48516

CONFESSIONS OF A PRETTY WOMAN.

CHAPTER I.

I DO not know why I am about to write my own memoirs. It is said that a blind man should not judge of colors, but I am by no means inclined to submit to the truth of the sentiment. Why should not a ci-devant beauty, reduced to a tour de tête and metallic teeth, be able to lay bare the intricate recesses of a pretty woman's heart, because that woman may chance to have been herself? Perhaps it is merely to prove the invalidity of the proverb that I have conceived the project of recording my own confessions; and it is very possible that I may, in this, be about as wise as the boy who thrust his hand into a wasp's nest, to secure the honey before any one else could appropriate the prize; but I have at least the consolation of feeling that I can only be canvassed and condemned in effigy, for I have far too much respect for the tranquillity of my old age to appear on the title-page of a book; and the success of my afternoon nap, or my evening rubber, will consequently run no risk of being periled by the comments and criticism of the public; or the guesses and gossipry of my own immediate circle, who will at once find a reply to their suspicions when they look me in the face.

Heroes, monarchs, and statesmen (I place the heroes in advance advisedly) have bards and historians to sing and say all their great deeds; therefore, it is truly an excess of self-immolation when they meddle with the work, and rub in the shadows of the picture as a pastime; and an equal folly when they take pen in hand, for the purpose of broadening the lights. In the first case, all the world laugh at them as fools, for having betrayed their own poor and petty weaknesses; while in the second it is still worse, inasmuch as no one believes one syllable of the self-laudatory labor, which to all, save the workman, appears to be a mere web of egotism and fatuity. This, however, is far from being the case with that potent and influential portion of the creation entitled pretty women. Where lives the man who could undertake the biography of one of these? He can talk of well-fought battles, intriguing cabinets, court-gossip, or party measures; but what knows he about flirtations, or palpitations, or heart-economy! How can he undertake to raise one veil after another, each as mysterious as that of Vesta, so as to lay bare the myriad mysteries of a woman's spirit?

Pooh! pooh! Man, all self-sufficient as he esteems himself, would deserve the fate of the detected school-boy, did he ever attempt so impossible a feat.

I can give another reason, also, for thus volunteering a record of the past in its relation to myself. The world has run wild, of late years, upon biographies and auto-biographies. Every class of society has contributed its quota to satisfy the curiosity of "a discerning public;" and each succeeding triplicate of volumes has been received with welcome. From the quaint sketching of dear old Pepys, and the sonorous periods of stately Clarendon, to the "dramatic twaddle" of Miss Burney, and the professional sallies and struggles of defunct players, nothing appears to have come amiss; and this is just as it should be.

"The proper study of mankind is man;"

and it acquires an additional zest when we have reason to apprehend (as must frequently be the case) that we were never intended to have the opportunity of doing it at all. How many "sayings and doings," meant for the seclusion of home; how many opinions and sentiments, uttered only for the privacy of the family circle; how many letters, scratched off a tutto volo da penna, have been put to press, injurious to the memory of the dead, and painful to the feelings of the living!

For my own part, whenever I meet with an advertised announcement of the forthcoming "biography" or "memoirs" of some deceased celebrity, whether noble, political, literary, fashionable, or dramatic, I am invariably lost in astonishment at the reckless courage of the individual who left such a task of delicacy and difficulty to be performed by others; when, at the expense of a little labor, he could have accomplished it himself, adducing his own motives, and assigning his own reasons, for a thousand actions which must inevitably suffer from misconstruction.

If then such false readings may and must be the result of the interference of a second person in the written lives of statesmen, poets, and players, what had I to expect, if I left my motives, reasons, actions, and impulses, to be decided upon by others? Truly, a pretty woman resolved (as I am) to be frank, and truthful, and honest, has more than sufficient cause to apprehend a host of evil judgments, not only from one sex, but from both; and can, therefore, ill afford to leave herself without that best of all advocacy—her own. An acknowledged beauty, like the turquoise-flowering flax, is marked, even from the first years of her blooming girlhood, for future appreciation: the germ is the index of the maturity; but she must be well immersed in the stagnant waters of envy and maliciousness, and well beaten by the cudgels of jealousy and misconstruction, before she is deemed fitted for the uses of the world; and the parallel holds good to the last; for neither the beauty nor the flax is estimated at its real value, until all that charmed the eye has been destroyed, and that nothing is left but the good tough fibre which may render their available qualities serviceable to others.

Let no one imagine, however, that I deem it expedient to offer an apology for these my confessions. Far from it. I consider that I am doing the world a service by their transcription. My own sex may learn better to analyze their feelings and actions by the perusal, and the other to be less ready to misjudge both.

Of this I am well assured, that men, in the aggregate, can form no just or correct idea of the trials and struggles of a woman's life. It is an admitted conventionalism, that the world was made for man, and home for woman. Be it so, on the broad basis upon which it should be understood. Let the stronger and the bolder portion of creation strive and wrestle with the ocean-waves of public life: they are the best fitted to its duties; but let them not imagine that there can be no "death from drowning" in the mere placid-seeming river. The violence of the cataract corrodes but slightly the face of the rock over which it pours its impetuous volume; but the slow and monotonous dropping of the domestic drain wears a deep hollow in the surface of the stone upon which it falls.

Now and then we hear of a suicide in what is called "genteel life;" and it is always a man who has had recourse to the razor or the pistol —the moral coward's remedy for worldly disappointment. No woman, save among the more degraded of the sex (except, indeed, in very rare instances, where she commits self-destruction in conjunction with a lover or a husband, and cannot, consequently, be correctly esteemed a free agent, but rather as acting under a tangible and controlling influence), ever contemplates such a method of release from trial; and thus the obituary of the year teems with cases of female consumption and heart-complaint. Ay, truly! 'tis no misnomer—heart-complaint! —where the thread is most worn, there it breaks; and the "weaker vessel" carries her sorrows with her to the grave, and hides them there.

But the word grave has startled me! I have no intention to moralize. My life contains its own moral. I will leave men to their self-satisfied view of the economy of human nature. It is, at best, a very harmless egotism: for they are no sooner in care or in necessity, than they, one and all, recant their error—at least, until they no longer require counsel or consolation; and this fact may well make women smile at their delusion, and forgive it.

Thus much by way of preface.

My father was a wealthy merchant. Of a highly respectable but impoverished family, he had received for all portion an admirable commercial education, and a recommendatory letter to one of the first establishments in London.

Unlike such missives in general, which are commonly "bought off" by a family dinner, or "thrown off" with an apology, the document in question procured for him a high stool in the office of the Messieurs Osbaldiston, and a daily seat at their table, while his own good and useful qualities did the rest.

There was, I believe, some distant relationship between the principals and their young clerk, which doubtless cemented the connection; but, be that as it may, thus much is certain, that my father had not been more than five years in their counting-house, when he was intrusted with a mission of great importance to the West-Indies; of which he acquitted himself so skilfully, that the brothers, on his return, felt that they could offer to him no recompense more adequate than a share in their gigantic establishment. They were no longer young men: began to prefer port wine to burgundy, and a comfortable nap in an easy chair after dinner, to a renewal of business; and thus they found it pleasant and profitable to transfer the overplus of their occupation to their young, and active, and intelligent partner.

My father made three voyages to the islands before the death of the younger Mr. Osbaldiston; and became an experienced man of business at an age when most merchants are merely in their novitiate. Advancing years, and the loss of his only brother and near relative, and moreover his junior, began to produce their effect upon the head of the firm; who, ere long, abandoned all the interests of the house to my father, and contented himself with signing his name to transfer-deeds and bank-checks, lounging away his mornings in the warehouses, and giving himself up to the care of his cook and valet for the remainder of the day.

Nor had the old gentleman ever reason to repent his confidence; for when he was, in his turn, gathered to his fathers, he died calmly, in the comfortable conviction that all his dependents could live respectably thereafter on their several legacies, without seeking a new and strange servitude; and that my father was not only the proprietor of a magnificent business, but that his name was "good" for some £80,000 at his banker's.

Happy testator! and still happier legatee! My father was only two-and-thirty years of age when he was thus cast upon the world; but, unlike many other young men, he did not relax an effort in the pleasant occupation of money-making. Let it not be supposed, however, that his perseverance arose from a sordid love of gold. Far from it. He had his projects. Riches were to be the means, and not the end, of his ambition. He admitted no partner into the house. He was sufficient to himself; and he would not delay the accomplishment of his hope, by dividing and subdividing his receipts.

At the termination of a couple of years he ventured upon a gigantic speculation. Many of his friends shrugged their shoulders, and exclaimed upon his rashness, in an unctuous and tranquil tone, which satisfied their hearers that it would be no particular heart-break to themselves even if he should happen to have, as they expressed it, "kicked down all that he was worth;" but, luckily, they were not put to the trial, for he was still the favorite of fortune; and, after the suspense of a few months, he awoke one morning worth £500,000.

I think I have already shown that my father was a wise man; nor did his mother-wit forsake him on this occasion. He was no gambler at heart, so he abandoned all speculation for the future; and while his anxious friends were awaiting from day to day the intelligence that he had again tempted the smiles of his slippery patroness, they were startled and surprised (in some cases it was even hinted not pleasantly), by learning that he had disposed of his house in the city for an enormous sum, and was on the point of starting for a tour on the Continent.

Circumstances alter habits, says the Spaniard; and it was certainly an apothegm perfectly applicable to my father's case; for he no sooner snook the dust of commerce from his feet, than he flung away with it all the habits of his past life. Not to play the purse-proud fainéant, however, did he do this. He had higher aims than that of lounging through existence. He knew that he had been a capital man of business. He was reminded of the fact by every hat that was lifted to him as he passed along the city streets; his purpose was now to become an accomplished gentleman; not a profound scholar, nor a scientific virtuoso; he well knew that it was too late to indulge in such lofty dreams as those; nor was he quite sure that erudite acquirements would at all further the plan and project upon which he had built up his own particular Château en Espagne. His aim was simply to become a man of the world; what, in the days of Addison and Steele, would have been called "a pretty fellow;" and what we, in our times, understand by "a man about town;" only shorn of his vices, and delivered from his duns.

Abroad he went then. Conveniently but not ostentatiously attended, he traversed France, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy; visited cathedrals, galleries, mountains, and waterfalls; operas, grottoes, and Houses of Assembly; learned to distinguish one popular singer from another, and to call the premieres danseuses of the three great capitals by their correct names; purchased a few undoubted (copies of) rare pictures, some fine Roman medals (manufactured and verdigreased at Milan), and several equally well authenticated busts and statues; which were all carefully packed, and transmitted to an English warehouse, to await his return home; after which he had nothing more to do than to amuse himself, and be careful not to suffer any opportunity of accomplishing his cherished purpose to escape him.

He was not, however, destined to succeed while on his tour. He had made many eligible acquaintance, but he was a shrewd man; and he did not require to be told that the fashionables and hyper-fashionables with whom he had partaken of champagne dinners, and whom he had accommodated with seats in his opera-box on an equal footing on the Continent, might perchance look more coldly upon him in England, when they discovered that, in their own set, he was utterly unknown. Nevertheless, he did not despair. Gross geld, grosser glaube, and he knew it; so he was content to bide his time.

Among the many pressing invitations which he received, to renew at home the friendship so pleasantly commenced abroad, was one so frequently and so earnestly repeated, that my father could not doubt its sincerity; and he accordingly promised to accept it. That he was flattered by the pertinacity of the inviter, there can be no doubt; for he was not only a man of ripe age and matured judgment, but, moreover, a Scottish peer.

That the Earl of Glenfillan was not wealthy, was sufficiently evident from the facility with which he availed himself of the different domestic luxuries of his new friend: and the remarkable tardiness which he exhibited in making any return not purely verbal. This, however, was perfectly immaterial to my father, who required nothing at his hands; and who was by far too proud a man to have suffered their positions to be reversed. And so Lord Glenfillan rode my father's horses, ate my father's dinners, traveled in my father's carriage, and borrowed my father's money, to his heart's content; while he received in return the I O Us of his noble friend, and the reiterated invitations to which I have already alluded.

"Did Mr. Tilden fish and shoot?"

My father at that time did neither, but he intended to do both; so, as a matter of course, he replied in the affirmative. There was magnificent fishing and shooting at Glenfillan! Four thousand acres of moorland, and a lake like an inland sea, visible from the windows of the castle. Mr. Tilden was an admirable billiard-player. His lordship was rejoiced at it, for they had the best table in Scotland at Glenfillan—rather out of repair, he was afraid, for his gout had obliged him to abandon the game, and the ladies of his family did not understand it; but he would have it set to rights against he had the honor of receiving Mr. Tilden, who, perhaps, would be able to induce "Flora and Madelaine" to make an attempt at learning.

Of course my father was delighted at the prospect of teaching two hoydening girls to play billiards on a rickety old table; and he felt half-tempted to offer the earl a new one of his own selecting; which, without doubt, he might have done safely, as Lord Glenfillan was not prone to take offence at such trifling matters; but he forbore, for he was strongly imbued with a strange sort of delicacy, which always prompted him to make his wealth as little conspicuous as possible, and never to presume upon it by taking liberties with others.

The close of their continental communion took place at Calais, whither my father had conveyed his lordly friend from Marseilles in his own carriage; and, as a matter of course, the earl had been his guest throughout the journey. This arrangement was agreeable to both parties; for, as the courier who had accompanied my father from England, transacted all business upon the road, so neither of the milords in the calèche and four, which opened the traveling procession, were broken in upon by dull details of the day's expenses. In short, they got on together admirably. The earl shared my father's carriage; his solitary manservant was de tiers with my father's valet and his chéf; all the luggage jolted along amicably in the same voiture d'occasion, guarded by the sleepy grooms; and nothing could be more amicable or more pleasant than the whole arrangement.

Once or twice his lordship of Glenfillan exceeded a little at table upon the road; but that was the fault of my father's hospitality, and the hyper-zeal of his attendants; and the noble earl had a gout-mixture in the carriage-pocket near his hand, which, diluted in a little pale brandy, generally succeeded in procuring him an hour's sleep; so that, upon the whole, he might have been worse off on the rugged highways of a belle France; and he admitted the fact with a graceful frankness which could not but convince my father of the sincerity of his assertion.

By the by, Lord Glenfillan, as I should have explained, had visited the French capital for the purpose of consulting a celebrated gout-doctor of that day; from whose skill he had been led to expect that he should obtain both speedy and permanent relief. But it is certain that if his counselors had themselves really derived any benefit from the Gallic Galen in a similar extremity, they had been of a different order of men from the earl, who backed up all the remedies of his medical adviser, with dinners served at Les Frères Provençaux, and burgundy from Justin.

This state of things, or rather this system of curative ethics, could not, of course, last long, without convincing his most gustative lordship that he was rather becoming worse than better.

That it was reculer pour mieux sauter, he was not altogether clear; and in this dilemma, with very real and natural reluctance to tear himself from the flesh-pots of Egypt, and a still more invincible objection to be conveyed home in a leaden receptacle, six feet by two, he seized with avidity the hope held out to him of better success with an Italian empiric established at Marseilles; and forthwith departed for the fair city of the south.

Alas for the gout-tormented earl! To an individual of his tendencies, this was fairly a case of cader dalla padella nella brace; for at Marseilles, in addition to the sublime cuisine of Paris, he found all the luxuries of the East; all the fruits of the earth; and all the fish of the sea. My Lord Glenfillan had such a fit of the gout at his hotel in the Rue de Rome, eight days after his arrival in the paradise of gastronomers, that he afforded a noble opportunity for the display of skill possessed by Il Signor Ferdinando della Placida—the very name of the man would have seemed to me to be either an insult or an epigram—and began to have serious thoughts of making his will.

It was at this period that my father returned from Malta; and, having heard that he was under the same roof with a sick countryman, very inefficiently attended, and in the hands of an ignorant pretender, who was de mortié with the cook in winding up what had been an affair of many years' standing, in a very complete and concise manner; he sent in his card to his noble neighbor, and begged permission to wait upon him.

The gouty lord desired no better, for he had already heard from his valet of the arrival of a milord, the fracas of whose return to his old apartments had reached even to the sick chamber; had received a detailed account of the nature and number of his attendants, equipages, horses, and packages; and was, moreover, tired of his own society, and glad of any incident which promised a momentary amusement.

No better prelude to rapid acquaintanceship could have been suggested by the most practiced social tactician. Lord Glenfillan was drugging, gorging, and frightening himself into his grave, with all possible expedition; and there he sat, with his foot swathed in flannels, a Glengarry cap upon his gray head, a tartan waistcoat covering his ample chest, and a flowered dressing-gown enveloping his tall and bony figure; with an English journal a fortnight old (for in those days Galignani was not, and L'Echo du Continent lay hushed in chaos), endeavoring to read, for the twentieth time, the speech of one of his political opponents, most provokingly broken up by "hear! hear!" and "cheers from all parts of the house."

I once heard it declared by a gallant officer, now in his grave, that the greatest misery of human life was to halt with a party of men in a country village, and to remain throughout the day in its solitary inn, with, for all companionship, an old Army List, in which your own particular regiment was torn out. I am tempted, however, to believe that I should have preferred even that dilemma to the earl's. Be it as it may, he averred that this unlucky paper was his only resource between his paroxysms of pain, which, as he was a rabid politician, it had probably assisted to multiply.

No wonder that my father soon ceased to be considered as a stranger, and that his daily advent in the sick room was hailed with delight by the querulous invalid. Ere long, Lord Glenfillan had extorted a promise from his friend not to abandon him during his illness; and soon afterwards it was agreed that they should make the homeward journey together; and this was how it came to pass that the earl and my father arrived at Calais in company.

CHAPTER II.

It has just struck me that I ought to give some idea of the personal appearance of my father. I remember him well, for I loved him very dearly; and my memory supplies me with the picture of a tall, finely made, and aristocratic-looking man, with large gray eyes, a handsome but somewhat too prominent nose, hair which had once been almost black, magnificent teeth, and a smile so beautiful that at times I still see it in my dreams. His extreme nicety and neatness might have passed into a proverb; but he was no whit a prig; and he had so thoroughly divested himself of all the formalities and technicalities of his early pursuits, and fallen back so easily and so naturally upon the proud old blood which filled his veins, that I feel convinced, had he ever been raised to the peerage, no one could have considered him misplaced.

I have a miniature lying beside me now, however, which has preserved a far more flattering portrait of my father than even my loving memory. It was taken the year of his marriage, as a bridal-gift to my mother; and, judging from the ivory counterfeit, he must at that period have been supremely handsome.

Moreover, most courteous reader, he was my father!

After a few months spent in London, which were fully occupied by the arrangement of his monetary affairs, the purchase of an eligible residence, and daily practice at a shooting-gallery to fit him for his coming campaign in Scotland, my father began seriously to meditate a descent on Glenfillan. The earl had, at times, been grandiloquent on the subject of his paternal estate; and his visitor consequently left town with very magnificent ideas of the locality which he was about temporarily to inhabit.

There was no steam at this time, so that the journey was rather a long one; but my father was glad of the opportunity of seeing Edinburgh, and would not allow himself to consider it tedious.

He spent a week in Auld Reekie, and then started for the Highlands. He saw all the "lions" (as per guide-book) before his departure; but I am afraid that he was deficient in historical sentiment, if not in morals; for he took no interest in Holyrood, simply because he had not made up his mind whether Mary were a martyr or a culprit, and rather inclined to the latter opinion. Now, if my father carried one particular prejudice to excess, it was against coquetry and coquets; therefore it requires no explanation that the very idea of conjugal infidelity was to him hateful beyond the power of words.

He was the very aftertype of Cæsar.

This, par parenthèse.

When he advanced beyond Edinburgh, the scene changed. Glenfillan lay, like a lion's lair, in the very centre of the Highlands, and the roads were anything but macadamizæd. All around him was wild and grand, but the air was hungry; and as he had left all his establishment in town, save his body-servant and a couple of grooms, he fared, as he traveled, somewhat roughly. He had no taste for mountain-dew; not a soul to speak to except his man, who began to wax slightly sulky, as he left, according to his own opinion, all civilization and comfort behind him; and, altogether, his progress was as dreary as it was slow.

At length, however, they reached a hamlet with an unpronounceable name, where they found half a dozen of the earl's retainers, who had already been waiting there several days, with as many wild-looking, wiry, ungroomed mountain ponies, to serve as guides to the castle, and to help the Sassenach gentlemen over sundry "bad bits" which they had to traverse on their way. Only one among them could make himself understood, and they were all as savage-looking as a party of bandits; but nevertheless they were a relief to the monotony of his journey, and to the eye of an artist would have been in admirable "keeping" with the scene. They were, moreover, active, strong, and willing; and proved eminently useful to the unaccustomed and helpless travelers.

From the crest of a mountain which it had taken them three dreary hours to ascend, and which my father had partly mounted on foot, his guide at length pointed out a small gray object which he exultingly announced as Glenfillan Castle. He was answered by a shudder. Nothing could be more desolate than the aspect of the "promised land" from the spot chosen to make it known.

The travelers were standing, as I have said, on the brow of a high mountain, covered entirely with heather, and utterly destitute of trees, before them and beneath them, at the distance of several miles, lay a deep valley, backed by another rugged and cloud-capped height; and in this hollow stood the castle; while, about a furlong off, commenced a bleak, cold, unsheltered sheet of water, which was lost in the distance as it wound round the base of the giant mountain that shut in the view.

There was an expression compounded of contempt and mortification on the countenance of the highlander, as he met the look of disappointment and disgust which my father could not repress; but he gave no signs of annoyance beyond leaving his side, and talking in a quick and indignant tone to his companions.

The descent of the mountain proved to the full as tedious as its rise; and thus, fortunately for himself, my father had both time and opportunity to amend his first judgment, and to give due admiration to the several really noble features of the scene. The sun, "that great landscape painter," threw in opportunely a few touches which greatly relieved the vastness of the picture; and as the light vapors swept along the sky, casting their flying shadows upon the hills, and succeeding each other like pleasant thoughts in a weary mind, he began to see positive beauty where half an hour before all had seemed black and barren. As they advanced, too, the old gray castle loomed out majestically from the green heather, and grew into size and importance. My father could distinguish a round tower of respectable altitude, and a length of wall which might be a battlement or a terrace, but which, in either case, gave a dignified and solid air to the whole edifice. Trees there were none, even about the building, at least none that he could discern on his approach; but, nevertheless, he felt more reconciled than he had done on the mountain-top, and became at last even interested in the aspect of his temporary home.

They had no sooner reached the outskirts of the glen than one of the guides, springing to the back of his pony, rode off at a pace of which my father had never believed the animal to be capable, in order to announce the arrival of the expected guest to his noble master; and in about an hour the well-appointed English chariot passed the gate of Glenfillan Castle, and my father found its lordly owner waiting to receive him on the threshold of his own stately hall.

The day was far advanced; and after a warm but brief welcome, the visitor was ushered to his dressing-room to refresh himself after his journey, and to prepare for dinner. The ladies were already busied with their toilets; and my father consequently retired without having been presented to any member of the family. He was conducted to his apartments by a fine-looking, gray-headed, solemn butler, who seemed almost coeval with the building, and who appeared to consider himself the greatest personage on earth, except his lord.

The dressing-bell was already ringing out sonorously from the belfry-tower, and the sound harmonized agreeably with my father's sensations. He was gratified by the reception of the earl, somewhat impressed by the ancient stateliness of all around him, and disposed to see everything en beau. His apartment was spacious and somewhat gloomy. The bed and window were alike hung with dark-green damask; and the walls were of richly carved oak, into which were panneled a series of what were evidently family portraits, the size of life, all grim and ghastly with age. The bed itself was of that capacious description which would lead one to infer that one's forefathers and foremothers must have been of unconscionably broad dimensions; the window, deeply pierced into the massive wall, was of a totally different character, for it was narrow to an inconvenient degree; but, en revanche, it reached from the ceiling nearly to the floor, while its arch was filled with stained glass to the depth of half a dozen of the diamond-fashioned panes, which reduced the already small quantity of light admitted into the chamber to something still less. There was, moreover, an aspect of decay and rustiness about everything, which betrayed that the Taplow and Holland of the day had not laid their refined and renovating spell upon the place, but that it was mouldering away quietly and comfortably, without interference of any kind. Although it was yet early in the summer, the air of that mountain-valley was still keen enough to render the huge fire which was burning upon the hearth the most attractive object in the room; and, as my father's valet somewhat sulkily remarked, "it was a relief, in such a hobgoblin-looking place, that nobody could understand who hadn't seen it."

The gold-furnished dressing-case had scarcely given up all its costly contents for the decoration of the toilet-table, when the second bell rang, and my father prepared to obey the summons; but a difficulty arose as to the means of reaching the dining-room without a guide; there was no bell in the room; while my father felt, en preux chevalier, that he would rather risk any inconvenience than detain the ladies from the dining-room, and create an unfavorable impression within the very hour of his arrival. He opened the door of his apartment abruptly; rushed out into the gallery; and nearly fell into the arms of the same solemn old gentleman who had marshaled him from the presence of the earl, and who was patiently waiting to conduct him back.

And now I come to an eventful moment in my father's life, and one to which I owe my own existence. The double doors of a spacious drawing-room, comfortably draperied with tapestry, were thrown back by two liveried attendants; and as my father entered, the earl abandoned his position upon the hearth-rug, where he had been comfortably facing the ladies, and backing to the fire, in that peculiarly graceful style which has been popular among the male sex in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from time immemorial; and advanced to meet him with a mixture of stately urbanity and hospitable frankness.

He was presented in turn to Miss Margery Macspleuchan, a tall, stiff, bony, high-checked, sharp-nosed spinster of some fifty, "or, by'r lady, threescore" years, attired in a very stout and rather rusty dress of black tabinet, with a pointlace apron and ruffles; the ostensible dame châtelaine, and sister-in-law of the earl; to the Lady Flora Glenfillan, his lordship's elder daughter, a sepia fac-simile of her maiden aunt; and ultimately, to the Lady Madelaine "of that ilk," his youngest child, the offspring of a second marriage, and one of the loveliest maidens who ever furnished forth the day-dream of a poet.

The Lady Flora was all smiles and welcome; she spoke with a strong accent, and laughed until she displayed an awful vacuum, where teeth were not. She was, as I have said, a modified duplicate of her aunt, who had been the sister of her mother. She was not quite so stiff, nor so tall, nor so bony; her cheeks were not quite so prominent; and her nose was a little more moderate in its sharpness; all, or most of which circumstances, were probably to be accounted for by the fact that she had not long passed her thirtieth year; neither was her sable silk quite so rusty, nor her point quite so yellow; but in all about her there was goodly promise that the likeness would increase from day to day.

Lord Glenfillan had, in his first matrimonial venture, made a prodigious mésalliance, having marrieddthe daughter of a petty laird, no one could ever rationally decide wherefore. But Jessie Macspleuchan was a shrewd body; she required no spectacles to detect the prominent weakness of the great man; and she accordingly reverenced with so awful a reverence, and worshiped with so humble a worship, the dignity of his peerage, that the plain, homely, prim nobody soon grew to be the most sensible woman of the earl's acquaintance. Her nose was no longer sharp; her voice had ceased to be shrill; her dull gray eyes were turned with so much meek wonder upon his coronet, that he felt assured, in his own mind, that even matrimony itself would never induce any undue familiarity or pretensions of equality on the part of Miss Macspleuchan.

So, to the astonishment of every one save the lady herself, she became, after due deliberation on the gentleman's side, Countess of Glenfillan; and then she taught the proud peer a lesson which he never afterwards unlearned. She had not "served seven years" for her coronet, crushing every natural impulse, and quelling every rebel disposition, to be "shelved" by her own husband, and made a nonentity in her own house. Contention, as the word is usually understood, could not occur between them, for Lord Glenfillan was too innately a gentleman so to degrade himself; added to which, he soon learnt to feel that he was no verbal match for his lady; but for years it was a war of wits, and a war of will, that most effectually prevented all stagnation in the establishment. At length, however, the earl, whose armor began to chafe him from constant wear and who had no wish to die in his harness, prudently laid down his arms, and my Lady Glenfillan had it all her own way.

This state of things lasted for six years, during which period she became the mother of a daughter—the Lady Flora, to whom my reader has been already introduced—and whom she only lived to see enter her second year.

The noble widower was not disconsolate; and, whether it were from respect for his departed wife that he was anxious to demonstrate his confidence in her family, or, on the contrary, that he desired to remove from before his eyes everything which could remind him of the deceased lady, he never declared; but it is certain that he forthwith proposed to his honored father-in-law, the laird, that his daughter Margery should take charge of the infant until she became of an age to require more accomplished guidance. Miss Macspleuchan desired nothing better; and declared herself quite ready to remove to the castle, and to receive her dear little niece from the hands of her noble parent, "directly after the great wash;" but this concession by no means formed part of the earl's arrangement.

He had been Macspleuchaned long enough, and their season was over. He did not wish his will and pleasure to be put into competition with soap and blue; and he, therefore, gave Miss Margery civilly to understand, that the conventionalities of life would not permit a man of his age to offer a home beneath his roof even to the sister of his wife. That the Lady Flora Glenfillan would be no burden upon her mother's family, he deemed it almost needless to add; and he felt convinced that, when Miss Macspleuchan had taken time to reflect upon the subject, she would find that her obliging proposal was utterly out of the question.

Now, all this was not said, but written—written upon a very ample sheet of paper, and sealed with the earl's coat-of-arms; to produce which effectively, it required almost sealing-wax enough to fill a tea-saucer. This signet never failed to produce its effect. It was the fee-faw-fum which announced to refractory tenants that their rents must be paid; and to presuming petty lairds that his lordship, the earl, understood nothing about liberty and equality. It may, consequently, be imagined that its apparition at the hill-farm rendered further discussion useless. In short, it performed a miracle, for it shut Miss Margery's mouth.

The Lady Flora was accordingly transferred from the castle to the laird's house, and from the cold caresses of her noble father to the hearty hugs of her less exalted relations; and in due time initiated into all the mysteries of meal-porridge, baked sheep's heads, and haggis.

A happy man was Lord Glenfillan; a very happy man! He felt vastly as Sinbad must have done, when he shook the old gentleman from his shoulders, whose organ of adhesiveness he had so long mentally voted a nuisance. Right glad was he, when his eye chanced to rest upon the hatchment which he had caused to droop, like a heavy eyelid, over the upper section of one of the drawing-room windows, as a last token of respect to the deceased—much on the same principle that a man who has completed an unpleasant letter appends an enormous flourish to his signature, in the exuberant joy of his heart that he has come to an end of it—right glad was he, I say, that her departed ladyship had not presented him with an heir to his family honors. A son of Miss Jessie Macspleuchan to inherit the name and rank of the Glenfillans—faugh! And he was still, as he reflected, so young and active, that a season in London, and careful making up, would repair all the ravages of carelessness and seclusion.

This idea haunted him for several years; but no man, not even a Lord Glenfillan, can throw off, without a violent effort, the bonds which time and habit have woven about him. The parvenue countess had reduced her husband's confidence in himself, and in his own value, full fifty per cent.; and, although he still talked very big to himself, he shrank involuntarily from the effort of testing the opinions of others.

At length, however, he arrived at the conclusion that it behoved him to marry again with all convenient speed; but he had become a wiser man than he was when "caught" by the Macspleuchan; and consequently now, when he was many years older by the calendar of time, and twice as many by the gnawing of mortification and disappointment, he decided that two things were absolutely indispensable in the fortunate woman whom he should select as his second wife—extreme personal beauty, and an undeniable pedigree. A few thousands into the bargain would not, he felt, be amiss; but, in favor of the two former attributes, he resolved not to make a point of the last.

He had remained throughout all these years at Glenfillan, visiting his orphan child scrupulously once in each month, and shuddering as he remarked how much the Macspleuchan nose and bone were beginning to develop themselves; but eventually he put his purpose into execution, and started for England. He had not reckoned without his host. A clever artiste succeeded in making him up admirably; and, being really a fine man, and moreover a peer, he was soon the cherished friend of half a score middle-aged widows, fashionable demireps, and matrons with marriageable daughters. My noble grandpapa was not, however, so practicable as he might have been, had he not already learned wisdom. He listened, smiled, and looked about him; and the more he looked, the less chance had the ladies in question of making him their prey.

Many young and beautiful girls did he see in the hotbed of London society—girls in look, and women in mind—who would gladly have bartered their loveliness against his coronet; but half of them were parvenues, and the other half nobodies. Many a titled dowager, whose quarterings rendered her eligible for a German court circle, and whose diamonds were far brighter than her eyes, did not scruple to let him understand that she was not inexorable; but my Lord Glenfillan was anxious for an heir. The very eligibles, the young, the beautiful, and the high-born—the creatures of his dreams—considered him too old, or too poor, or hated widowers, or could not contemplate the horror of being mothers-in-law; and thus, entre chien et loup, he made no progress.

The London season was drawing to a close

> "Fashion, you know, prescribes the minute
> When to be out of it, and in it:
> She waves her hand, and woe betide
> The lingering few, unless they hide,
> Or swear they're passing through, to go
> To Norfolk, in an hour or so;
> And mean, next month, to show their faces
> If possible, in twenty places."

The earl was just contemplating a journey to "the moors," and sighing as he remembered that the solitude of Glenfillan must remain unbroken for another year; when he was accidentally introduced to the honorable Dennis O'Finistree, who was on his way through town, with his fair sister Madelaine, whom he had escorted from Naples; and who, after a brief sojourn in London, was to be his companion to their paternal home in the wilds of Connaught.

Every one, who is any one, must know all about the O'Finistrees, so it were a mere waste of words for me to expatiate here upon the antiquity of their family, or to explain in what manner their patrimonial estate had dwindled into one-tenth of its original splendor, and "their noble" had, actually as well as figuratively, "come to ninepence." They were also, as they always declared, lineally descended from the kings of Connaught, (who, soit dit en passant, if all be true which is laid to their charge in this way, must have been wonderfully prolific!) an assertion which few persons felt disposed to question, for the O'Finistrees were all celebrated shots.

The honorable Dennis took a great fancy to my grandfather. He was a high-spirited, dashing, fine-looking young fellow, and a perfect man of the world. After a time, he proposed to introduce his new friend to his sister, who was residing perdue at an hotel near Portman Square. The earl thought of his star; and, without asking any questions, accepted the civility. He did right. Madelaine O'Finistree was a genuine Irish beauty, with dark hair and eyelashes, and eyes of a deep rich blue, which, when she laughed, looked positively black. She was tall, and well-proportioned; had something of a foreign deportment, tempered, however, by extreme gracefulness, and a spice of haughtiness which went straight to the heart of my grandfather.

Of course, the gay, thoughtless Dennis had never contemplated any serious results from the acquaintance of his sister and Lord Glenfillan. He could not have heard from his associates that the Scotch peer had rejoiced in the name of "the wife-hunter" throughout the season; and it could not, consequently, have been in the hope of "bringing down his bird" that he had detained Madelaine in London, when their finances had "dwindled to the shortest span," and that every guinea was to them thrice-refined gold. Nevertheless, everything fell out well. The earl returned home, "seven fathom deep" in love with the fair Hibernian. He felt that his hour was come. She was so utterly unlike Jessie Macspleuchan. She was so graceful, so beautiful. Her proud brow looked as though (how novel-like is the phrase upon which I have stumbled!) nature had designed to cincture it with a coronet. In short, Lord Glenfillan was a lost man, from half-past four o'clock p. m. on that 29th of June.

He was found again, however, a few months afterwards. The hatchment of the defunct lady had, years before, been consigned to the attic; the earl had almost forgotten her thrall; and he was flying along the highroad between London and Edinburgh in a traveling chariot and four, with the new Countess of Glenfillan by his side.

A year subsequently, my grandfather was once more a widower. His beautiful and high-born wife gave birth to a daughter, and in so doing, resigned her own life; but it was a year of happiness which cast its spell over the after existence of the bereaved husband. The first wish of his heart—the first object of his ambition, had indeed been disappointed. He had no son to inherit his name and honors; but the memory of his young and gentle wife was, nevertheless, too dear to be obliterated by a newer tie.

His only consolation was derived from the fact, that she had left to him an infant image of herself, a second Madelaine, in whom, as she grew to womanhood, he might trace a renewal of her mother's beauty, and to whom he might thereafter devote his best affections for that mother's sake. Nay, so unaffected was the self-abnegation of the widowed father, that he gratefully accepted the proposal of an aunt of Mr. O'Finistrec's, the widow of an old English baronet, who divided her time between Wentworken Hall and her house in Cavendish Square, to take the motherless infant into her own care; and so well did Lady Sinclair, who was herself childless, fulfil her voluntary duties, that at each successive visit to England, the earl found his daughter more beautiful, more graceful, and more accomplished than at their previous meeting.

At rare intervals, Lady Sinclair accompanied her niece to Glenfillan Castle, where they were met by Lady Flora and Miss Margery, who, on such occasions, contrived to display her housewifely capabilities to great advantage in the eyes of the earl; while she found so much and such serious occupation in the buttery and still-room, that she was rarely visible elsewhere. In short, Miss Margery was a genuine Macspleuchan, and as sharp as a needle; and she looked upon these opportunities as "the very skimming of her life's milk," as she herself graphically expressed it to a particular friend. It was now or never with her, and she played her cards well; for when, on the death of Lady Sinclair, which happened just as Madelaine had completed her eighteenth year, Lord Glenfillan found it necessary to establish both his daughters beneath his own roof, he could not deny that she was the most correct and eligible person whom he could select, to relieve them from the drudgery of housekeeping, and to throw a matronly air over the establishment.

Fortunately also, as Lord Glenfillan considered, Macspleuchan of Macspleuchan had paid the debt of nature, though he had left several less imperative debts unpaid; and there being no son to perpetuate the name and vulgarity of his father, the earl felt less repugnance to offering a home to the solitary Miss Margery.

Such, therefore, was the organization of Lord Glenfillan's household when my father became his guest. The lovely Lady Madelaine had already been an inmate of the castle for a tedious year, during several months of which period she had been condemned to the sole companionship of her sister and her aunt; the earl's gout expedition having taken him from home, before she had long been domesticated beneath his roof.

And now, how am I to describe the said Lady Madelaine? I have said that she was just nineteen, that loveliest of all ages for a woman; when, in addition to her own individual attractions, she possesses also what a French writer has wittily defined as la beauté du diable, that sweet and evanescent freshness, which, after the age of twenty, is gone forever.

Like her mother, she was tall, and fair, and graceful, with regular and well-cut features; eyes like amethysts; and a mouth of that rare and peculiar description, which, when it is met with, appears to convey more expression than all the rest of the face combined. Her smile was the very sunshine of the heart; and her scorn was so naturally seated upon the arched and ruby lip, that it would have been insolent in any one of less rank than a peer's daughter. Perhaps, indeed, this latter expression was the more habitual one to that fair mouth; for, unfortunately, the exclusive education and habits of Lady Madelaine had prepared her to find much to despise in her natural home; nor did her French suivante suffer any of the deficiencies of either persons or things at Glenfillan to pass unobserved. The "Aunt Margery" of the elder sister never ceased to be the "Miss Macspleuchan" of the younger—an alien alike to her heart and to her blood. She never forgot that Lady Flora, although the first-born of an earl, was nevertheless the child of a roturière; and, as Félicie delicately expressed it, merely "sa sœur par méprise." The family-coach was a never-ceasing theme for contempt; and the family expedients something almost too absurd to provoke a laugh.

From such of these as arose from certain deficiencies in the Glenfillan treasury, the haughty young beauty was happily exempt, Lady Sinclair having considerately wound up all her account of kindness and affection, by bequeathing several hundreds-a-year to her beloved niece; and, perhaps, to this circumstance might be attributed much of the deference with which she was regarded by her female relatives.

But, although pride was the predominant feature of Lady Madelaine's character, it must not be supposed that she was destitute of other and more endearing qualities. Her generosity was unbounded. Her purse was a common property whenever it could be rendered available; and her nature was enthusiastic and unsuspicious.

Thus, it was only to her very particular friends that Miss Margery ventured to pour out her vial of wrath against the "stuck-up English-bred quean who dared to look down upon her niece Flora, her own niece by blood, and own daughter to the right honorable the Earl of Glenfillan; and herself, own sister as she was to the right honorable the countess," in some of those quiet hours of gossipry and local scandal, which she contrived to secure in her morning room; and which helped to support her through the tedium of a life, which, however enviable she had esteemed it so long as it appeared to be unattainable, she had since learnt to consider as an existence of constraint; obliging her, as she graphically expressed it, "always to wear her company face." But, as Miss Margery was not a bad woman at heart, it is only fair to remark, that even after these little conferences, although they always were held "with closed doors" her conscience frequently pricked her, as some act of uncalculating generosity on the part of the "stuck-up English-bred quean" toward herself suddenly flashed upon her mind.

Nor should the haughtiness of my mother—for the beautiful and accomplished Lady Madelaine was my mother; and, as I am not writing a melodrame, and have no genius for mystery, I may as well say so at once—nor should her haughtiness be too severely censured, inasmuch as it had been one of the darling endeavors of Lady Sinclair to impress her, from her earliest girlhood, with an exalted idea of her own position in society. Such a lesson is readily learnt, for few things are more susceptible than human vanity. "I will not," had said the cautious aunt, "talk to her, at so early an age, of her own personal attractions. The knowledge of those will come soon enough;" and so the discreet lady only poured the guano over the soil which was to produce "the earl's daughter," and left the comments of her friends and servants to administer the unctuous matter which was to force into bloom the budding vanity of "the little beauty."

Thus she grew up—thanks to the care of her anxious teachers—moderately vain, and uncompromisingly haughty; whilst all her better qualities were the spontaneous growth of her own purer and nobler nature. A solitary season in town, immediately before the death of her aunt, during which she had been "the observed of all observers," had not tended to diminish these failings; and thus, in her nineteenth year, the Lady Madelaine Glenfillan was possessed of a perfectly accurate knowledge of her own pretensions, both personal and social, only to be condemned, without any consolation save the companionship of her French maid and her Marlborough spaniel, to the solitude of a highland castle.

CHAPTER III.

And now some curious reader may wish to be informed what motive the Earl of Glenfillan, who, as the reader must have gathered, was by no means a wealthy man, could have had in pressing a casual acquaintance like my father, and one, moreover, to whom he owed money, to visit him in his home, and to see him surrounded by his Dii Penates in the undress costume of a Scottish country gentleman.

Heaven bless the bonhomie of the simple-hearted individual who ventures the inquiry! My lord had a penniless daughter, on the wrong side of thirty, still unmarried; and it had naturally suggested itself to his mind that her quality was an admirable counterpoise to my father's wealth; and that the luxurious commoner would be unable to resist the temptation of hearing himself and his wife announced as Mr. and Lady Flora Tilden, in the saloons of his London friends.

But those who calculate without their host require two reckonings. The noble lord did not understand my father. That he had resolved never to marry any woman save one of high rank, was perfectly true; but he was also determined that she should do as much credit to his taste as she would do honor to his name; and it was consequently in vain that poor Lady Flora had received that very mysterious injunction, which is frequently given to young ladies under such circumstances, to "make the most of herself;" and [illegible] Miss Margery announced, in close conclave, to her favorite gossips, that a Southron, worth his weight in gold, was coming to the castle to marry her pet niece.

I think I mentioned, when I originally introduced the reader to the earl's family circle, that the Lady Flora was all smiles and welcome: she was doing as she was bid; and, after her first glance at the stranger, she found the task by no means difficult. My father bowed and smiled, and his bow was very graceful, and his smile very gracious, but his eyes had already wandered to a sofa, which was occupied by a beautiful girl and a small lapdog. Having said all that she could well say at such a moment, the Lady Flora suffered Lord Glenfillan to lead his guest toward his other daughter; and the fair vision by which he had already been attracted bent her snowy throat in a mute salutation, worthy of an empress. Something like a mocking smile played for an instant about her mouth; but she did not raise her eyes, as she again fell back upon her cushions, and pursued her occupation of clasping a string of coral about the neck of the spaniel.

She was plainly but richly dressed in deep mourning, which she had never thrown off since the death of her aunt: and the dazzling whiteness of her neck and arms was rendered still more conspicuous from the contrast. I shall enter into no further detail. I have already stated that my mother was eminently beautiful; and, having given the grand outline of the picture, I will leave my reader to wash in the tints as he may see fit.

The curtain had now fairly risen upon the drama which was to be enacted at Glenfillan. Like the renowned Marquis of Carabbas, the earl believed that the world and all its contents, sentient and non-sentient, were created for the comfort and convenience of the aristocracy; while no price could be too high for the plebeian to pay, for the privilege of entering its charmed circle; and, with these sentiments, it is not wonderful that he considered the marriage of his elder daughter as certain as though it had been solemnized at St. George's, Hanover Square, "in the presence of a select circle of distinguished friends." It would be a dignified, and lordly (and convenient) way of repaying all his obligations to his worthy guest: and he resolved that he would do the thing freely, and cordially, and as though he scarcely looked upon it as a condescension.

Oh, delicious self-delusion! In what exquisite mummery does poor human nature occasionally indulge!

For a time my father had no suspicion of the generous intentions of the earl. How should he? It was only by the common and necessary courtesies of life that he was recalled to the fact of Lady Flora's existence. His heart had soon followed the thrall of his eyes. He was passionately in love with the scornful Madelaine; she was precisely what novel-writers call "the realization of his dreams;" and, for the first time in his life, my father began to believe that he had found a woman of whom he was not worthy: for that Lord Glenfillan should have had the audacity to couple him even in thought with his elder daughter, was an idea which could never enter his imagination, until it was driven home to the very head by a determined hand.

Nevertheless, it was easy for lookers-on to perceive that the earl quite considered the rich Englishman (to use a phrase of Madame de Sevigné), as un chou de son jardin. Nothing could exceed his delightful urbanity. In his self-gratulation at having caught such a gudgeon for his first-born, he performed upon himself exactly the same ceremony to which Mr. Pettigrew subjects his mummies. One stiff fold was cautiously unrolled after another, until at length the complete "form and fashion" of his gracious composition was laid bare, and his whole purpose stood revealed to his astonished guest.

Meanwhile, as I have said, the dessous des cartes was palpable enough to all save the preoccupied lover. Every one could at once have laid a finger upon the truth. Lady Madelaine, indeed, was not left to the natural perspicacity of her own nature. She was duly informed by the earl of his lordship's condescending intentions; and, at the moment, she opened wide both her fine eyes and her ruby lips, in intended expostulation; but an instant's reflection decided her to silence. Who shall determine wherefore? I think that I am myself sufficiently cognizant of the impulses and intricacies of a pretty woman's heart to give a shrewd guess—but I forbear.

Miss Margery was radiant with happiness. She had lived long enough in her youth among the involved expedients and manœuvres, to which those housewives devote themselves who act upon the homely old proverb that "a penny saved 's a penny got," to appreciate at its full value the extent of my father's wealth, so far as she was enabled to comprehend it. To be sure, as she remarked more than once to her pet gossip, "her niece Lady Flora Glenfillan had a right to look higher; but 'a fat purse makes lean sorrow;' and if she gained no title by this marriage, she would, at least, not lose her own."

My father had been bidden to the castle for "a few weeks;" and when three of these sectional periods of time had elapsed, desperately as he loved the Lady Madelaine, he felt that as she had "made no sign," despite all his efforts to awaken her from her indifference, it was incumbent upon him to appear occupied with parting intentions, leaving it for awhile to absence and memory to work some miracle in his behalf; but this free flight of the yet unjessed falcon formed no part of the earl's scheme. He could not tell, if he thus launched the noble bird once more into the wide horizon of London society, what quarry he might chance to strike; and, moreover, there were, as I have already hinted, some small pecuniary matters still pending between them, which at that particular moment it was not altogether convenient to himself to investigate; it was, consequently, not surprising that, with such strong reasons on either side to remain together, the importunities of the earl, breathing, as they did, all the disinterestedness of overflowing hospitality, soon convinced my father that the weeks of his residence at Glenfillan might grow into months, without any impropriety on his part; an arrangement which would enable him, in all probability, to ascertain his fate before he parted from Lady Madelaine.

My father was no petulant and peevish lover. He had wisdom enough to feel that if he were indeed compelled to renounce all hope of winning the noble beauty, the sooner he was made conscious of the fact the better; and that he should be less an object of commiseration to himself on his departure, if knowing the truth, even although it should be an unpleasant one, than living on in a state of uncertainty for months; only, perhaps, to be ultimately disappointed, when time had rendered the one engrossing subject of his thoughts essential to the after-happiness of his life.

The only disinterested member of the family was the little Marlborough spaniel, which, as it lay on the sofa beside its mistress, rolled its bright eyes over the group, with an expression of luxurious and languid indifference.

To the hospitable entreaties of the earl that my father would extend his visit, both Lady Flora and Miss Margery added their own; but the younger lady, toward whom the guest glanced anxiously more than once during the discussion, preserved a profound and apparently unobservant silence. Lord Glenfillan was so earnest that he became heated by his own eloquence. Miss Macspleuchan, when she reflected upon the probable consequences of the "rich Southron's" departure, grew positively agitated. She had so long accustomed herself to look upon his marriage with her favorite niece as a matter of course—for the earl had duly informed her also of his gracious purposes, even before my father's arrival at the castle—that she actually felt herself aggrieved; and she sat fuming and fidgeting, like one laboring in silence under an affront which would gladly have revenged itself in words. But Lady Flora surpassed all the other actors in this exciting scene. At first she had mingled her own entreaties with those of her father; then, suddenly, she sank into silence, keeping her eyes steadily and imploringly fixed upon the yielding guest, who had no sooner murmured the assent for which she was so eagerly listening, than, uttering a faint and smothered exclamation, she covered her face with her hands, and rushed from the room.

By a spontaneous movement the earl seized the hand of his guest, and wrung it earnestly, with a most expressive gravity of countenance. Miss Margery rose hastily, in a state of great alarm, and followed her niece; and, it so chanced that, at the same moment, a servant entered to announce that a gentleman who had called by appointment was awaiting Lord Glenfillan in the library.

For the first time since his residence in the castle, the Lady Madelaine and my father were tête-à-tête.

It was a sufficiently perplexing position for the visitor, who could not quite repress his mortification at the studied indifference of his young hostess; nor was the difficulty lessened by the fact that, even when she heard her father summoned from the room, she never raised her eyes from the book upon which she had been engaged throughout the conference. The earl had been enchanted with her dignified reserve, forming, as it did, so admirable a contrast to her sister's emotion; and he had consequently made no effort to obtain her coöperation. Miss Margery considered that, for once, she had acted with proper discretion in not interfering with the prospects of her elder: while Lady Flora herself was so absorbed by her own hopes and fears, that she had utterly forgotten her existence.

Poor Lady Flora, meanwhile, was really an object of pity. She had been pompously instructed by her father to overlook Mr. Tilden's want of rank, when he was first expected, and to accept at once the hand which would assuredly be at her disposal before he left Scotland, and even then she felt no whit inclined to disobey, for her position in her paternal home was by no means hyper-pleasurable. She heard that the Englishman was immensely rich, and unusually handsome; and when the earl admitted that he had reason to believe, from certain words which had dropped from Mr. Tilden himself, that he had been at some period engaged in commerce, he somewhat abruptly reminded her that this fact would by no means render the match a mésalliance, as it would have done in the case of Lady Madelaine; her own mother having, previously to her marriage with himself, occupied a station much less exalted than that of an English merchant.

Lady Flora felt no inclination to contend the question. She was satisfied with complaining of the taunt to her sympathizing aunt. She had almost begun to consider her establishment as hopeless; for even among the petty lairds who were occasionally received at the castle, there was a sufficient taste for youth and beauty to fortify them against the prestige of her rank; and strangers were rarely indeed guests at Glenfillan.

Like many persons whose means have been inadequate to their pretensions, Lady Flora had an inordinate idea of the power of wealth. She could conceive no earthly evil, save death itself, to which it could not afford a remedy—while even to this exception it lent a sort of glory which almost divested it of its bitterness—the glory of lead, and mahogany, and gold-headed nails: of armorial bearings, and velvet, and feathers. The rich man's last sad and solemn mockery!

In this acquiescent mood of mind, she met my father; and what had at first been mere curiosity and self-gratulation, soon grew into a deeper feeling. Although utterly unable to appreciate, as they deserved, either the elegance of his person, or the refinement of his manner, Lady Flora could nevertheless feel that he was, to every man, save her father, with whom she had hitherto been brought into contact, as "Hyperion to a satyr." Assured that she was to become his wife, she made no attempt to check the admiration with which she regarded him; and, from day to day, the feeling grew and strengthened, until she began, for the first time, to indulge in a violent jealousy of her young and beautiful sister.

Despite the remonstrances of Miss Margery, who affected to talk of Lady Madelaine as a froward child, she could not blind herself to the fact that she was a most formidable rival; and it was only the dreaded beauty herself who succeeded in relieving the mind of Lady Flora from its unaccustomed weight. Her coldness, her indifference, her apparent abstraction, ultimately satisfied the more vehement and less refined mind of the bride presumptive that she was perfectly uninterested in the English stranger; and she accordingly pursued the even tenor of her way, arranging with her prime minister, Miss Margery, all her intended movements, when she should have become Lady Flora Tilden, the mistress of countless thousands, and the titled member of an untitled family, who would, as a matter of course, appreciate the honor of her alliance. Miss Margery's projects of housewifery were miraculous, and would have astonished Meg Dodds herself; while those of her niece, although their magnificence did not fail to dazzle the conspirators by whom they were mooted, would have made no very serious inroad upon my father's income.

Singular, meanwhile, had been the transition-state of Lady Madelaine's feelings. When first informed of the expected advent of the English stranger, and the intended purpose of the earl, she only curléd her lip, and murmured something which sounded like "rôturier!" at which Lord Glenfillan laughed, patted her smooth cheek, and bade her remember that it was not herself whom he was anxious to establish. Her own independence of the arrangement she could easily understand; nor was her noble father's anxiety to provide for her plain, and, as Félicie called her, antediluvian sister, at all difficult to comprehend; but the result of the conference was a deep and scornful contempt for the moneyed plebeian, who could thus be disposed of at the will of a titled acquaintance. So utter, indeed, was her disdain, that she never heard his name mentioned without a feeling of annoyance. The unknown guest was her bête noire; and she shuddered as she reflected on the absolute necessity of showing civility to such a brother-in-law.

When they at length met, the graceful, and withal haughty demeanor of my father, in some degree, disturbed her calculations; but as she had a most powerful prejudice to overcome, she almost persuaded herself that she disliked him. The high-bred simplicity of his character, his utter want of value for wealth, save as a mean for the attainment of higher objects, she denounced as a pitiful affectation. How was it possible that a man should under-estimate his only advantage?

Three weeks, as I have already stated, had elapsed from the arrival of my father at Glenfillan Castle, to the morning on which he announced his intention of departure. Why did the volume, upon which the Lady Madelaine appeared to be so earnestly engaged, tremble in her clasp? No, sapient reader! you are wrong. She did not love my father. And yet his threatened evasion affected her powerfully. Here is the word of the enigma. In the first place, Lady Madelaine was a woman: in the next place, she was a pretty woman: and, in the third place, she was young and vain. She had soon suspected that my father loved her: she had penetration and judgment enough to decide that he was a gentleman, and that he was quite conscious of all that was due to himself as such; to all which convictions was superadded the fact that, since her domestication at Glenfillan, she had never previously seen any one on whom it would not have been caviare to expend her brilliant coquetries. There was something piquante, too, in the idea of having, without one poor effort, won the heart which was already considered as "property" by another, although that other did chance to be plain and antediluvian; and there was, par dessus tout, a spice of mortification in being compelled to believe that the net was too frail to hold the capture.

And thus it chanced, gracious reader, that the volume did tremble in the clasp of the Lady Madelaine, when my father announced his intention to depart on the morrow. Lady Flora had, as I have stated, rushed from the room in the attitude of a tragic actress: Miss Margery had followed with more good-will than dignity; his lordship of Glenfillan had been summoned to an interview; and the Lady Madelaine and my father were, for the first time in their lives, tête-à-tête.

For a moment there was silence. My father stood where his host had left him, near the table in the centre of the vast apartment; and the lady sat, half-buried amid her cushions, in a lounging-chair near the open window. The position was embarrassing for the gentleman; but he soon rallied, and, approaching the silent beauty, remarked steadily—

"If I could only flatter myself that the Lady Madelaine was not utterly indifferent to my decision...."

He was met by such a look of scornful wonderment that he was at once answered; for it said, as plainly as a look could say: "How do you imagine that it can have awakened my interest?" and then the large eyes were once more dropped upon the book, and their long, dark lashes rested like a fringe upon the slightly-suffused cheek. My father bowed profoundly, with a haughtiness worthy of Lady Madelaine herself, and turned to leave the room.

"Do not mistake me, sir;" said the sweet voice to which he loved to listen, before he had traversed the floor; "I am happy that Lord Glenfillan should have been enabled to render his residence sufficiently agreeable to his guest, to make him willing to extend his visit; but I have never considered myself privileged to interfere with any of my father's arrangements."

There must have been something infinitely less cold in the tone than in the words of this address; for it is certain that, instead of leaving the room, according to his original intention, my father reversed his movement, and again approached the lady.

This was her first triumph. She felt that she had not deceived herself—that he could not leave her coldly—that he did love her. The conviction brought a bloom to her cheek. Her woman-vanity was satisfied; and she valued his preference the more that she had seen him in the very act of sacrificing his passion to his pride. Accustomed as she had been since her girlhood to admiration, she felt the dreary and monotonous tenor of her life at Glenfillan agreeably relieved by the certainty of a new adorer; and one, too, whom, in her heart of hearts, she was conscious that she could not despise. With these sentiments, nothing could be more natural than that she should be averse to the departure of so eligible an inmate.

Let no rigid moralist decide that this course of action involved treachery to Lady Flora. My mother was well aware, before the Englishman had passed a week in the castle, that her father's project must fail. He was not one of those manageable and will-less beings, who are mere human thistle-down, sailing, without reluctance, along any wind which may chance to blow; and still less did he resemble the mean-spirited parasites who feel security only in the stability of the object to which they cling. She had long been convinced that even had there existed no Lady Madelaine Glenfillan, there would assuredly never have been a Lady Flora Tilden. My father and her sister were, as she at once discovered, the very antipodes of each other; they were oil and water—snow and fire—romance and reality—sentiment and matter-of-fact—the two extremities of a straight line, never destined by any possibility to come together; and, such being the case, her conscience was at ease as regarded her duty to her family, while she felt no inclination to forego the opportunity of relieving her own ennui.

If I go on amplifying my explanation so largely, however, I shall never terminate the tête-à-tête upon which I have ventured to intrude; and I will, therefore, resume it with the second arrival of my father beside the lounging-chair. Pygmalion had at least awakened the statue into life, and he was naturally anxious to ascertain in how far his skill would turn to his own advantage.

"Do you indeed believe, Lady Madelaine," he asked, in the same suppressed voice in which he had first spoken, "that your presence under his lordship's roof can fail to exert a despotic power over all within the sphere of its influence? And am I to be the only unfortunate individual to whom it is forbidden to acknowledge its supremacy? Surely this is somewhat ungenerous!"

"Nay, nay!" exclaimed the lady, with a half-coquettish and all-harmonious laugh, as she extended towards him her small white hand; "you remain here, and we cannot afford, in such a solitude as this, to live together in enmity. At all events, I propose a truce."

"And I accept your terms," said my father, bending his lips upon the hand he held.

"Do you admire Racine?" asked the lady, raising her beautiful eyes to his face for an instant; "with all his monotony of cadence, surely he was a great poet."

"And lived in a great age," was the reply; "great alike in its luxury, its ambition, and its vices. It is, I confess, somewhat difficult to me, as I turn over the pages of his tragic dramas, to figure to myself the author of Andromache deferring the caprices of a court, and the chances of a camp."—(By this time my father had drawn a chair near that of the lady, and established himself comfortably at her side.)—"Nor do I find it more easy to reconcile the pliability of temperament which enabled the man of genius to vie with a group of witless courtiers in flattering a vain and sensual monarch, beyond the bounds of modesty and reason."

"Racine!" exclaimed the Lady Madelaine, interested in spite of herself by the turn which her own question had given to the conversation; "I do not remember to what you allude. Perhaps you will relate the anecdote."

"It is brief and simple," said my father "When Louis XIV. pensioned Racine and Despreaux as the historians of his reign, the war against Germany was still at its height; and a few days after the Marshal de Crequi compelled the Prince of Saxe and Senac to capitulate, the king remarked to them that he regretted their absence from the army upon that occasion, as it would have enabled them to see a little fighting, without much exertion or fatigue; upon which Racine replied, 'Sire, we are two citizens, who have only provided ourselves with a costume suited to peace and study; we had indeed ordered suits more appropriate to the camp, but your majesty takes the places which you attack with such rapidity, that our tailors have not had time to finish them.' Surely this was unworthy of a great genius."

"Paltry and pitiful!" acquiesced the lady, with a contemptuous toss of her little head; "a woman would have spurned so coarse and so fulsome a flattery."

Now I am quite sure that my reader was totally unprepared for such a dialogue as this; and yet, although it progressed in precisely the same manner to its close, and that not one word of gallantry escaped the lips of my father, and not one sentence of encouragement was uttered by those of his companion, both parties were conscious, when the reappearance of the earl broke up the conversation, that each was an object of interest to the other. My father had, by a delicacy of tact natural to him, avoided every opportunity of alarming the pride of the young beauty, and consequently made more progress in her favor than he could have done by a score of idle flatteries. She was indebted to him for an hour of calm and rational enjoyment; and, moreover, she felt she had convinced him that her beauty was not the only quality for which she was worthy to be loved.

CHAPTER IV.

My father's orders were countermanded. His valet somewhat sullenly, and very reluctantly, replaced all the costly toys on the dressing-table, and returned all the linen to the drawers. There was no Lady Madelaine in the servant's hall.

A few days subsequently the earl ceased to address his guest as "Mr. Tilden;" he believed that he had now all the court-cards in his own hand; and it was simply "Tilden," or "my dear fellow." He made no comment upon the fact that both gun and fishing-rod were abandoned, and that my father lounged away all his mornings beside the work-table of the ladies, tuning Lady Madelaine's guitar, or drawing patterns for her sister's worstedwork.

By the by, Lady Flora never looked so completely as though she were fulfilling the end of her creation, as when seen behind her frame, and amid piles of German wool. The laborious idleness of this heating and ponderous employment just suited her capacity. She felt that she was busy, that she appeared industrious; and, moreover, nothing could be more convenient than the fact that when she ventured to take part in a conversation to which she was not competent, and could not readily extricate herself from the consequences of her own temerity, she found a never-failing resource in the "one, two, three, light green—two, dark green—one, two, three, yellow"—and so on, by which she contrived to wind up her periods.

This was, however, a case of "voluntary labor;" for I do not believe that either Lady Madelaine or my father would have remarked the circumstance, even had she strangled every sentence in the utterance.

Miss Margery was the only blot upon this picture of still life. She was so essentially what the French denominate remuante, that she was never quiet in one place for half an hour together. If her niece were born to execute large pieces of worstedwork, which, when they were finished (and very few elaborate undertakings of this nature ever are finished), looked almost as well as squares of indifferently-woven carpet; she was as certainly sent into the world to and, accordingly, her minute avocations were, if not altogether without aim, decidedly without end.

——"chronicle small beer;"

But, alas! this state of things could not last forever. The earl, quite convinced of the wisdom and desirability of his own arrangements, never suffered himself to doubt, for a moment, to which of his daughters Mr. Tilden was devoting himself. Of course, he would not presume to lift his eyes to the Lady Madelaine; and equally of course, the large fortune of the handsome commoner should not be allowed to go out of the family. Nothing, therefore, could have happened better. The Glenfillan star was in the ascendant. Flora would soon be provided for; and he should only have to find a suitable and satisfactory parti for his beautiful Madelaine. In this there could be no difficulty. The climax of his reflections was their most rational feature.

All these fair visions, dovetailing so pleasantly together in his mind, like naturally rendered him anxious to force forward their realization; and my father was accordingly disturbed one morning—just as he was deeply engaged in looking over, with Lady Madelaine, a portfolio of drawings and prints by which he had illustrated his European tour, and accompanying each landscape or costume with some appropriate anecdote—by a message from the earl, requesting, should Mr. Tilden not be otherwise employed, the pleasure of his company in his lordship's study.

"A linked chain of sweetness long drawn out,"

Apropos—What a singular caprice it is on the part of all stupid men to nickname one cosy, snug, sleep-inviting little apartment in their houses by this imposing name; crowding its walls with shelves full of books which they never read, and its tables with paper upon which they never write! I rarely enter one of these calumniated cabinets without thinking of the Bashful Man in the Spectator, who, in helping himself to what he supposed to be a volume of Xenophon, drew down on his unhappy head a ponderous board, leathered and gilt into the fair semblance of a set of classics; and expended upon his best suit the ink of the capacious stand which had been destined to dry up in quiet and undisturbed dignity. He is probably not the only individual who has suffered from a similar mistake.

The request was peculiarly ill-timed, for my father felt that he had never yet been listened to with an attention so marked and flattering. The fair lady had taken so unaffected an interest in the little episodes of his traveling life, and had received with so much genuine pleasure the half-dozen drawings and cameos, which he had ventured to offer to her, that a bright hope sprang up in his heart which he had never before entertained. There was, however, no remedy for the evil. Common politeness compelled his immediate acquiescence in the earl's request; and he closed the portfolio with a little gesture of impatience, easily interpreted by his companion.

"I beseech you, do not run away with it," she said, smilingly; "if you have sufficient confidence in my good taste to believe that it will prove a charming resource for my indolence, while my lord asks your advice on some matter of agricultural interest, or country justice; though I warn you that I may probably lay aside all that strikes my fancy; and condemn you, on your return, to such graphic and legendary illustration as may sorely try your patience."

"I will willingly encounter the risk, hazardous though it be," replied my father as he left the room, with a firm intention to render the period of his absence as short as possible.

His own impression, as, preceded by the grave old butler, he wended his way to the earl's sanctum, was simply that Lord Glenfillan was probably in want of a few additional hundreds, and was about to do him the honor of asking them at his hands; and no idea could possibly have been more agreeable to my father. It would be another link of kindness and goodwill between them; and he was naturally anxious to create these by every means in his power, while this was one of the most ready and easy which he could encounter.

One glance at my lord, as he entered the room, however, sufficed to undeceive him. The earl had by no means the appearance of a man about to ask a loan. There was a self-gratulatory graciousness about him, which for an instant made my father fear that, on the contrary, he was about to rescind that which he had already contracted. But, in this, he was equally at fault.

Lord Glenfillan was in the true study costume: a brocaded silk dressing-gown, yellow morocco slippers, and a velvet skull-cap. He was rubbing his palms together gently and quietly, like a person well-satisfied, who was prepared to be amiable; and when tired of this amusement, he indulged the playfulness of his spirit by twirling the tassels which were attached to the cord that confined his dressing-gown at the waist. He motioned my father to an easy chair with a sweet smile and a graceful wave of the hand; and seated himself opposite to him with much the same air as a monarch assumes when he is about to give audience. He had evidently more trouble in "toning down" his urbanity, than in creating a semblance to the virtue when he had it not. He was, in short, the very embodiment of human sunshine.

He opened the conference with a sapient remark upon the weather. The dense fog which, at daybreak, hung like a dark cloud upon the lake, and made the larches on the opposite hill quite invisible from the windows, had really cleared off in a most extraordinary manner. Indeed, he did not know when he had seen a finer day. It was almost a sin in a young man, like his friend Tilden, to remain mewed up in the house when he might be amid the heather with his gun upon his shoulder. He, however, could not but feel the contrary mode of action as a vast compliment to his family circle; and was delighted to find that there was amusement enough within the castle walls, to satisfy so truant a personage as his present guest.

My father, of course, could only bow, and smile, and declare that he could expect no enjoyment without, even upon the heathery hills, with sport at pleasure, to equal that which he could command within. And then there was a short pause. The guest waited to learn what was to be the subject of the tête-à tête; and the host did not altogether know how to broach it.

At length he assumed his most sunny look, and throwing himself back upon his seat, while he kept his eyes steadily fixed upon an experiment which he was trying, and which consisted in joining the fingers of his two hands at the point; and then, closing the palms slowly and carefully together, as though he were anxious to convince himself that they were both perfectly of a size, he said, in an accent of great benignity—

"I am more than pleased, my dear fellow, that it should be so; for, although no longer young myself, I have not yet quite forgotten that men of your age do not abandon the sports of the field, and the manly exercises to which they are accustomed, without a powerful inducement; and, even delicately situated as I am, I cannot resist telling you, Tilden, how much I rejoice that such should be the case."

And the earl, having by this time satisfied himself that his hands were indubitably fellows, extended one of them to his visitor, with a frankness which was quite beautiful.

My father was somewhat startled, but still more gratified. He eagerly grasped the offered hand, and was about to reply, when, with a nod of intelligence, Lord Glenfillan continued:

"I am the last man in the world, as I am sure that you who know me will concede at once, to approve of female demonstration in delicate affairs of this kind: but still, I am aware that women, even of the purest minds and most refined natures, have certain little occult methods of testifying their preference, of which they are themselves almost unconscious, but which must carry conviction to the mind of the person so distinguished; nor do I fear to have deceived myself, in the belief that you have both experienced and reciprocated these evidences in my dear girl."

"My lord," exclaimed my father, earnestly: "this is indeed noble on your part! For I cannot, I will not affect to misinterpret the generous feeling which has prompted you to speak thus openly. I only fear that your friendship for me has led you to exaggerate in my favor the few slight marks of attention with which the lady has honored me."

"Tush! tush!" coughed his lordship, suppressing under this slight convulsion the smile that was rising to his lips; "I will be your security; and, had I valued you less, either as a man or as a friend, than I actually do, I would not have been so imprudent as to domesticate you for weeks together with my daughters. Had I been merely ambitious for them, I might doubtlessly have married them to rank equal, if not superior, to my own; but I am at once a father, and a man of the world. As the first, I desire only their happiness. As the second, I feel that I shall be more honored in a son-in law like yourself, than in many a titled booby, who has but his ancestry to keep his folly and his vice in countenance. Permit me—" (for my father was about to speak)—"I did not request the pleasure of your presence here this morning in order that we might bandy compliments, but simply that man to man we might speak openly and frankly on equal ground." (Here the emphasis was ponderous; and the earl coughed again, for he felt that he had surpassed himself.) "If I am not deceived, and that you love my daughter, say so unreservedly; and I, on my side, will venture to assure you that you are not indifferent to her."

"My lord," said my father, in considerable agitation, "I do love her, and that with no common affection, but with the whole energy of a heart which had ever hitherto been insensible to the attractions of her sex."

"I rejoice extremely to hear it," replied Lord Glenfillan, "extremely; and rather that, like your own, hers, I can venture to affirm, is also her first love. Such marriages are of rare occurrence in the world at the present day."

And the earl looked intelligent and sententious, and as though he had discovered the nest of the phœnix, and was about to rifle its ashes.

"Will your lordship pardon me," said the visitor, "if, despite the encouragement which your opinion is so well calculated to hold out, I venture to hesitate, ere I yield to the hope of so much happiness; for I cannot conceal from myself the conviction, that the lady has never given me the most remote cause to believe that she entertained any regard for me, save that which she considered to be my due as her noble father's guest."

"And yet, my dear Tilden, I am so well convinced to the contrary," replied the earl, "that we will, if you please, lay aside that consideration this morning, in order to discuss others of more moment. But first" (and once more he extended his hand, with a gesture of affectionate and paternal frankness), "let me tell you that you have made me a happy man—a very happy man. My dear, motherless girls are my greatest treasure on earth; and to feel that, to all human seeming, I have secured the happiness of one of them, is indeed a great comfort. Having premised thus much, however, I consider it due to myself, as a man of honor and a gentleman, to warn you, before the affair is mentioned to my daughter, that I shall be enabled to do little, very little, for her, as regards fortune."

"My dear lord!..."

"Nay, my good sir, do me the favor to hear me out. The failure of a son to succeed to my title and estates, and who would, moreove-have doubtlessly felt it to be his duty to portion his sisters as became their rank, has trammeled me in a painful degree. The future Earl of Glenfillan is a morose recluse, with a needy family of five boys. There is nothing to be expected from him; and the rather, that there has been feud between us for the last twenty years. In fact, we were never friends, even from our boyhood. He was apt to presume upon our relationship; and I, Mr. Tilden, was, on my side, quite willing to forget it. Enough, however, of the future earl. The fortunes which I can offer with my daughters are, consequently, only the fruits of my personal economy; and I am, therefore, anxious that the little which they do possess should be secured to them."

"Suffer me to be equally concise, my lord," said my father, when there was a pause. "I am ready to settle ten thousand a year upon the Lady Madelaine Glenfillan, to be disposed of as she shall see fit at her demise: and—"

"To settle upon whom, sir?" asked the earl, grasping his knees with his hands, and leaning forward in his chair, until his face almost touched that of his companion.

"Upon your lordship's daughter, the Lady Madelaine."

"The Lady Madelaine!" gasped out the bewildered nobleman. "Surely you never imagined, sir, that I was offering to you the hand of the Lady Madelaine!"

"I know not how otherwise to interpret your lordship's words," said my father, with offended dignity; "I cannot suppose that such an interview was intended as a jest."

"Have I not two daughters, sir? Does not a father naturally seek to establish the elder? Is the Lady Flora a cipher! I offered to you, sir, the hand of the Lady Flora."

"In that case, my lord," said the guest, rising from his seat, "our conference is ended. I have the greatest possible respect for Lady Flora Glenfillan; but I must be excused if I decline to become the husband of any woman for whom I could never entertain a warmer feeling. I deeply regret the misunderstanding which has led to so unpleasant a scene; but feel satisfied that both the lady and yourself will exonerate me from blame when you have calmly and in detail passed my conduct in review."

"I have uttered no word of blame, sir," said the earl sullenly, as he also rose: "I confess myself deceived by appearances, by probabilities—perhaps somewhat by the bent of my own wishes."

My father bowed coldly. "Has your lordship any commands for England!"

"Nay, nay, Mr. Tilden, do not be so precipitate," said his host, in a more conciliatory tone. "Because I have confessed that I desired you as a son-in-law, and that you have declined the alliance which I proposed, we need not, in consequence, become strangers—I will not say enemies; for I know my own nature, and have too good an opinion of yours, to believe such an extreme probable."

"You do no more than justice to both of us, my lord," replied my father; "but, my eyes being now opened to the hopelessness of an attachment which I have not scrupled to confess, I will be frank enough to avow, moreover, that, I dare not remain within the influence of the Lady Madelaine's beauty, for the sake of my own peace. I may yet be enabled to overcome the passion which I have conceived for her. I will, at all events, struggle to do so; but the longer I expose myself to the charms of an intercourse, which brings me into constant contact with her lovely person and accomplished mind, the less hope can I rationally entertain of regaining the peace that I have lost. I have, as I believe I may have mentioned to your lordship, occasionally contemplated a voyage to the East. I will now execute that intention. I shall leave none behind to regret me, he my fate what it may."

There was a sadness, almost a bitterness, in the tone with which the last words were uttered, which served as a fair apology for the emotion with which the earl grasped the arm of his companion, as he exclaimed hurriedly—

"For my own sake, for the sake of hospitality, my good sir, I cannot suffer you to leave Glenfillan in such a mood of mind. Surely you have roved about enough, and owe something to your country and your friends."

"My friends are few," was the reply; "and to my country I can be of no service whatever. I have now only to learn to live for myself, and the lesson is scarcely worth the pains that it will cost."

"Nay, nay—the world has too many claims upon you to suffer that you should fall into misanthropy," persisted Lord Glenfillan. "Your very wealth multiplies your duties, while it assures you alike power and enjoyment."

"Do not mock me, my lord," said my father, with increased bitterness; "an hour has not yet elapsed since your own words taught me the amount of each which riches could command. After what has passed between us, I feel that I must necessarily be de trop under your roof, both to the Ladies Glenfillan and to myself."

"Do not wrong them—do not wrong us all, my dear Tilden. Be ruled for once. Again I beg of you not to leave us in such a mood of mind. Indeed we cannot spare you at this moment. You have made several engagements with the ladies, for which they depend on you. Promise me that you will not leave us with a suddenness which may excite surprise, and perhaps remark. I ask this as a favor."

"Your lordship's request is undoubtedly too flattering to be opposed," said my father. "I will not leave the castle, at least, for a day or two, since such is really your wish; but suffer me now to retire to my room, for I feel that I am somewhat agitated, and shall be better alone."

"Ten thousand a year!" muttered the earl, as he again sank into his chair, when my father had left the room: "ten thousand a year, to be disposed of at will, on her demise! and—I wonder what was to follow! Could I have suppressed my annoyance, I might have heard all. Fool that I am! I ought to have foreseen that a fellow as proud as Lucifer, and as rich as Croesus, would never marry Flora. I wonder if Madelaine might be induced to bend her proud spirit to the match. Certain it is, that she will never again have such an opportunity. However, au jour la journée, I must detain him here, and trust to time and fortune for the rest."

And having finished his soliloquy, the earl rang his bell, and desired a servant to summon the Lady Madelaine.

CHAPTER V.

In about ten minutes the Lady Madelaine appeared, followed by her Marlborough spaniel, who, with all the confidence of a spoiled favorite, intruded himself into the conference.

There was an expression of tremor and anxiety about the young beauty, very unusual; and, as she took possession of the chair to which the earl motioned her, she raised her eyes to his face with an earnestness which bespoke at once curiosity and alarm.

"You will never believe, Madelaine," commenced Lord Glenfillan, "that I have requested your presence here on such a subject as the refusal of a commoner to form an alliance with my family."

The cheeks and forehead of the lady grew suddenly crimson, and her eyes flashed; but she did not utter a syllable.

"I see how sensibly—how deeply—you feel this affront," pursued her father; "for which you must have been as unprepared as I myself was; but high birth and noble blood are now at a discount in this country—gold is the great principle with all ranks. Yet I cannot avoid thinking that, after the extreme step which I took in mooting the subject, when I was decidedly the condescending party, Mr. Tilden should have been less abrupt in his negative."

"Surely, my dear father—surely, my lord," said the Lady Madelaine, in a tone of offended dignity, "you did not offer your daughter's hand to Mr. Tilden!"

"Certainly not—decidedly not," was the sententious answer. "Your delicacy alone makes you jump to such a conclusion. I flatter myself that I conducted the affair in a manner at once dignified and diplomatic; and, for a considerable time, I had every reason to conclude that Mr. Tilden was transported with gratitude and happiness—but—in short—can you not imagine how the équivoque arose?—can you not guess in what his rejection of Lady Flora's hand originated?"

His fair daughter had suddenly become singularly interested in disentangling two curls of one of the long and lustrous ears of her little favorite; and she did not immediately reply.

"That Mr. Tilden had become strongly attached to some member of my family, was evident," continued the earl; "and I accordingly never entertained a doubt that my project for the establishment of your sister had fully succeeded. I could not suppose that he had become enamored of Miss Margery Macsplenchan,"—here his lordship smiled at the facetiousness of his own conceit—"and I would not think that he had raised his eyes and his hopes to yourself,"—and here he fixed a long and scrutinizing look upon the young lady—"there was, consequently, no other method of accounting for what I saw; and I acted upon that very rational conclusion. I was wrong, however, my love—wrong in all my premises, save the first. Mr. Tilden has, indeed, become attached—powerfully attached—to a member of my family; but, I fear, hopelessly."

"You fear, my lord!" exclaimed the young lady, suddenly looking up with a flash of her natural haughtiness. At that moment she entirely lost sight of the interesting and refined companion, and saw only the plebeian in her noble father's guest.

"I used the word advisedly, my dear Madelaine. You well know how highly I estimate our proud and ancient blood, as well as your own excelling loveliness and merit; but I have already hinted to you, that for a time our conversation was carried on in mutual misunderstanding. I, very naturally, thought only of your sister; Mr. Tilden, full of his own feelings, thought only of yourself; and thus we discussed the affair without either having named the person of whom he spoke, until, in allusion to the settlement which he proposed to make upon his wife, Mr. Tilden mentioned the Lady Madelaine Glenfillan. You may imagine my astonishment!"

"And is it really possible, my lord," asked the lady, with the pretty scorn of a spoiled beauty, "that, having so long made the acquaintance of this proud commoner, you should have conceived it probable that he would become the husband of Lady Flora?"

"I did, indeed, commit that extravagance," said the earl, somewhat offended by the tone in which the question was put; "nor do I consider it so extreme as it may appear to yourself. Mr. Tilden is no longer a boy; therefore the age of your sister was by no means a fair objection. In other respects, the one precisely possesses what the other needs; for Tilden requires only connection to command every good which this world can offer."

"You would not include the Macspleuchan physiognomy in this list of advantages, I trust, my dear father," laughed the lady; "I thought that you 'had suffered persecution, and learnt mercy!'"

The earl could not resist the contagion of her saucy mirth: he smiled without any symptom of displeasure; and the more cordially that his lovely daughter appeared by no means so much shocked at the presumption of my father as he had anticipated.

"Imagine my delight," he pursued, after a momentary pause, "when I heard, as I supposed, a settlement of ten thousand pounds a year made upon Lady Flora—"

"I can well understand it," said the beauty, quietly.

"Ten thousand a year," repeated his lordship, complacently, "upon a wife whose entire fortune consists of precisely half that amount. Nor, evidently, was this all which Mr. Tilden was about to propose, when, in my astonishment at his mention of your own name, I interrupted him. The offer was certainly most princely."

He paused, not altogether certain how far he might proceed with safety upon this new tack—but he paused in vain; for Lady Madelaine appeared resolved not to come "to the rescue." Why was she thus silent? We can only say, with the German proverb, Das Herz lügt nicht.

"What a splendid figure might be made by a woman of fashion and beauty upon an unencumbered ten thousand a year!" once more declaimed his lordship; "I must again repeat that the offer was princely."

"And intended for myself, if I have understood you rightly, my lord," said Lady Madelaine. "It almost makes me smile, when I remember the marvelous projects of my poor aunt in my favor, that the first suitor who has seriously pretended to my hand should be a commoner, and one, moreover, who has been contaminated by commerce; and that I should say—knowing myself as I do—that I pray you not to precipitate this matter. Of course Mr. Tilden leaves the castle at once."

"Such was his intention," said the earl, who could scarcely conceal his astonishment at the words and bearing of his daughter; "but, in compliance with my request, he has consented to remain for a couple of days longer."

"With any hope of succeeding in his suit?" asked the lady, with a very peculiar expression.

"Without the slightest," replied the earl; "and very reluctantly; but I asked it as a favor, to prevent the possibility of remark among the household."

"You have acted wisely, my dear father, as you ever do," said Lady Madelaine; and she removed the spaniel from her lap, and drew her chair directly opposite to that of the earl, sweeping away as she did so the piles of papers which occupied the table before her; and then she leant her head upon her hand for a time, in an attitude of grave thought. "That I was not quite unprepared for this event," she said at length, after a considerable pause, upon which his bewildered lordship did not attempt to break, "I will at once concede. I could not mistake the manner of Mr. Tilden, guarded as it has been; nor was I blind to the fact that I am not altogether calculated to play respectably the rôle of a nonentity with which your lordship had favored me in this domestic drama. Lady Flora has been de tiers, and not myself. So much for the state of things at home; and now, I will give you a slight sketch of the reasons which have induced me to tolerate the proposal of Mr. Tilden."

As she ceased speaking, she glanced towards the earl, who replied only by a silent inclination of the head. "I know that I am handsome—all the world have so decided, and all the world must be right. I know that my family, on both sides, is unexceptionable, and in antiquity would do no dishonor to a German court; and I am assuredly not of a temperament to consider such advantages as a matter of indifference. But these are not the only truths which the world has taught me. I am young in years, but old in experience. The tuition of Lady Sinclair was able, and I have learnt somewhat of myself. I have been flattered, fêted, and followed; but the mention of my prospects has always hitherto sufficed to cool the passion created by my person. I am haughty and ambitious. Glenfillan is to me exile from all the haunts and habits of my early and brilliant girlhood. You have considerately warned me that I must not hope to revisit London for several years; and I, in my turn, have asked myself what, under existing circumstances, I can hope from another season, when I am crippled in my resources, and have lost my affectionate and skilful chaperone. And now I have, perhaps, my lord, said enough to justify my present apparently capricious conduct with regard to Mr. Tilden."

"I have listened with as much admiration as surprise," exclaimed the earl. "I had fallen into a somewhat similar train of reasoning while awaiting you. But remember, my dear child, that you are still very young, and that you are very beautiful. I will be as frank as yourself, and at once admit that this marriage appears to me to be singularly desirable. Reflect, nevertheless. You have great advantages on your side—youth, beauty, and patrician birth. You are doing great honor to Mr. Tilden, even by this deliberate consideration of his proposal."

"I am not insensible to the fact, my lord; nor, I have reason to believe, will he be so. I do not profess to love Mr. Tilden. The thing is impossible under the circumstances; but I respect his intellect, and admire his person. He is, in short, perfectly presentable; and, when you have ascertained that his fortune is as it has been represented to you by others, I will engage to permit his addresses;—and the rather," added her ladyship, with a little of the sententiousness of her father, "that, as you did me the honor to confide to me, you are at present under some pecuniary engagement to the gentleman."

As she ceased speaking, she rose, and having bent her head gracefully to the earl, glided out of the room.

And thus it came to pass, gentle reader, that at the end of three months, my father became the delighted husband of the lovely, the young, the high-born Lady Madelaine; the brilliancy of whose presentation at court during the ensuing season was the theme of universal comment and envy.

Lady Madelaine Tilden's jewels, Lady Madelaine Tilden's equipages, and town house, her beauty, her rank, and her perfect high-breeding were the "lion" of the day; and when, at the close of the spring, she retired with her husband to a magnificent estate in the west of England, situated within six miles of the county town, and in the very centre of a fastidious and aristocratic neighborhood (a purchase made by my father from a bankrupt duke), she carried away with her the hearts of all the men, and the hatred of half the women. She felt that she had not lived in vain!

And what of Lady Flora?

Little, and yet much. Her sister's parting present was the bequest of Lady Sinclair to herself. Lady Flora was a sort of heiress at Glenfillan, and a match for a laird! She wept over her disappointment, but she did not break her heart; she only sat still closer to her worstedwork, and executed with great rapidity and precision a series of blue parrots, geranium-colored ladies, and knights in armor, with pea-green gauntlets, and swords somewhat taller than themselves.

Miss Margery was furious. Even the annuity did not console her; and she became so garrulous and vehement in her displeasure, that the earl found it necessary to dispatch from his study to her apartment a very concise and lordly letter, sealed with his seal of office when the missive so ably performed its duty that the thunders of Miss Margery's wrath suddenly died away in low growls of ill-suppressed indignation.

And what of my Lord Glenfillan himself?

Like his daughter, he felt all the mortification of Mr. Tilden's plebeianility; but like her he had also very readily mit le chat en poche, and satisfied himself that she was not altogether to be pitied. His own little money matters were arranged with his son-in-law by a cordial shake of the hand; and when, as he lounged in his dressing-gown and slippers in his study, with the "Morning Post" in his hand, he read, with sparkling eyes and gratified pride, of all his fair and wealthy daughter's triumphs, he was much in the same mood of mind as he who sang on a somewhat similar occasion:

> "'Tis a very fine thing to be father-in-law
> To a very magnificent three-tailed bashaw."

CHAPTER VI.

The newly-married couple had, as I have already stated, at the close of the London season, repaired to the west of England, to take possession of their new estate; whither they were to be followed in August by a numerous party of sporting men and pretty women. It had been my father's first earnest request to his beautiful young bride that they should proceed there alone. It was his only rational prospect of a quiet month with the fair creature whom he now called his wife; and she conceded the point, although with considerable reluctance. She remembered Glenfillan, and considered that she had already sacrificed sufficiently to duty in that way. Moreover, Sir James Dornton was the best riding companion in the world, and Mr. De Clifford was to teach her billiards, and she wanted the second of Lord Otterford in her new duets; and it was very vexatious to suffer dictation on the subject of filling her own house; but, as she was not yet the wife of a year, she determined to yield; and having come to this virtuous resolution, she was too high-bred, and too conscious of what was due to her own dignity, to do so sullenly, and like a pouting school-miss. She only asked herself, with something like a shudder, how long the month was likely to endure, which she was destined to pass in solitude with Mr. Tilden?

As for my father, he was still deeply and passionately in love with his young bride. He would not believe that either pride or indifference was the root of the unswerving coldness, the calm, fashionable placidity, with which she met all the ardor of his generous and self-abnegating affection. No, no. Since their marriage, they had been in one constant whirl of dissipation and frivolity. Her heart had not had time to speak—poor, self-deluding reasoner! as though the heart were not independent of all such secondary influences. They were not yet thoroughly acquainted. He had not hitherto been essential to her happiness. When they were left for awhile alone, among the lawns and glades of Rooksley, nature would speak out in tenderness, and they should become everything to each other.

A wit, celebrated during the regency, amused himself by advising the newly-married to beware of exhausting all their stock of heart-enthusiasm during the solitude of the honeymoon, and to avoid the peril of the > "Long probationary week

> Of close retirement, as profound
> As if they both were underground;"

warning them of the consequences likely to accrue from entire and uninterrupted mutual dependence.

> "Be counseled.—Stir not, near or far,
> But stay, I charge you, where you are.
> The dream of passion, soon or late,
> Is broken—don't anticipate.
> Haste not to lose your hopes in fears,
> Stark mad for moments, dull for years;
> Devour not, for your comfort's sake,
> At once, like children, all your cake;
> Truth (on your memory well engrave it)
> Whispers, you cannot eat and have it.
> Gold is too precious—lay it not
> So thickly on a single spot;
> But beat the bullion—husbands, wives—
> And spread it over all your lives."

My mother's worldly sense had been prophetic of this counsel. Married quietly and unostentatiously at Glenfillan—for, as both she and the earl agreed, the less parade made on the occasion of becoming the wife of a commoner, the better—it was not for them to seem to invite congratulations—the journey to town had occupied a sufficient space of time to enable Lady Madelaine to announce herself at once to the gay world, and to rally around her all the hundred and one friends whom she had left, grief-stricken, when she was last compelled to abandon "London and its dear delights." The anticipation of coming pleasures—the foretaste of anticipated triumphs—the newly-insured possession of affluence and independence—all conduced to make the mood of the lovely bride sunny and sweet as the most exacting bridegroom could desire; while the pleasant languor arising from a long journey so luxuriously and deliberately performed as to make fatigue impossible, rendered the anxious and tender attentions of the newly-made husband alike well-timed and welcome; and they were consequently so gracefully and graciously received that my father was enraptured with the brightness of his destiny.

From the hour in which they reached town, all was changed. The splendidly-mounted mansion, which had been carefully prepared for the occupation of its young mistress, startled her into an exclamation of delighted acknowledgment. Her boudoir, lined with plate-glass, and draperied with pale-blue silk; her toilet, covered with costly toys; her morning-room, where pictures by the old masters were paneled into walls hung with crimson velvet, and exquisite statuettes, mounted on pedestals of ormolu, filled up the niches; the spacious reception-rooms, over whose arrangement the hand of wealth and elegance had successfully presided; all these flattered the pride, and satisfied the ambition of the earl's daughter. The better feelings of her nature were awakened by the effort, everywhere visible, which had been made to gratify her peculiar tastes and wishes; and the first evening "at home" was spent tête-à-tête by my father and his patrician bride in harmony and happiness.

There was so much to examine—so much to admire—and when, on touching the spring of a casket which stood upon her toilet, as the lid flew up, my mother discovered a set of diamonds which a monarch might have envied, she forgot her morgue for a moment, and gave loose to all the sincere delight inspired by the princely present.

My father was, as a matter of course, overpaid for all; and he believed, unhappily for him, that this was but the commencement of a long life of love and confidence. No friendly voice had whispered in his ear that the beautiful Lady Madelaine Glenfillan had considered it necessary to apologize to her own pride for her condescension in becoming his wife; and that his magnificence gratified her the more because it tended to show her that, at whatever sacrifice of dignity, she had done right. He believed that they had met upon equal terms. The earl was a needy man, to whom the retention of the slender portion destined to his daughter was an object of great and serious importance—he had asked only the hand and heart, and not the portion, of that daughter. The first had been ceded to him readily and gracefully; he had yet to learn in how far he had secured the other.

Lady Madelaine Tilden had taken her measures skilfully, and like a good tactician. The first evening of her arrival in Grosvenor Square was the last which she was compelled to spend alone with her husband, and perhaps it was better so; for these compulsatory matrimonial duets are more frequently cases of moral dos-à-dos than tête-à-tête; and it is difficult to decide, when this occurs, which individual of the conjugal duo is the best entitled to commiseration.

A woman, however pretty and graceful she may be at other times, when once she has resolved on investing her spirit in its wrapping-gown and papillotes; and a man, however intellectual and fascinating in society, who determines on permitting his higher faculties to appear at home in the easy negligence of a robe de chambre and slippers, are each apt to appear considerably less attractive to the one looker-on, for whose peculiar benefit the scene has been got up, than may be altogether desirable. Certain it is that the system of "hanging up the fiddle at home" is a somewhat dangerous one for the performer, who is accustomed to "discourse eloquent music" elsewhere.

Here, then, was another peril from which Lady Madelaine wisely resolved to deliver herself at once. It was out of the question that she, young, handsome, highly-born, and fashionable, should hide her advantages from a world which she was so well calculated both to enjoy and to adorn, in order to shut herself up with Mr. Tilden, even in a room lined with plate-glass and draperied with pale-blue silk; and, acting upon this principle, she had been careful to apprise her friends of the probable period of her arrival in town.

The season was just commencing. The race of idleness and folly had scarcely begun. The arrival of the beautiful bride of the wealthy Mr. Tilden (the fame of whose large fortune had reached London, through the medium of the earl, some weeks before) was an agreeable event; and not the least pleasurable emotion which she had experienced on taking possession of her new home flushed the cheek of my mother, as she saw the table in her morning-room covered with minute notes, and upheaped with visiting tickets.

She had no sooner examined them on the morrow than she found herself in the very vortex of dissipation. Admiration in some, and curiosity in others, had combined to send "all the world" to Lady Madelaine's door, and each had some engagement in which she was included. Her eye brightened, and her lip smiled, as she threw aside each note after a hasty perusal, until she opened one upon which she dwelt long and earnestly, with a heightened color and a beating pulse, and which she consigned to her reticule as soon as she had, for the second time, reached its conclusion.

Here it is:—

"Eureka! you are really, then, once more on your way to town, ma toute belle! I am enchanted, and so is Sir Herbert. Of Otterford I say nothing, save that I have not been able to trust him out of my sight, since the news arrived. Al buon intendidore, poche parole bastano! Can you condescend to the opera before Easter? I shall reserve a seat in my box for Saturday, as perhaps you may not yet be montée there; at all events, let me have you the first night! Pray make my baisemains to il marito, and say how much I regret that I cannot make room for him; but I have been persecuted since this French danseuse made her appearance, about whom all the men in the world, save one, have gone mad; and I have not moral courage enough to say 'no,' so long as I have a chair left. She goes to Milan next week, so don't fail me for your own sake. How did you leave Lord Glenfillan?

"Toute-à-vous!

"SYDNEY DEVEREUX."

And this was Saturday. This was her first day under her husband's roof. For a moment she hesitated. Mr. Tilden might think it ungracious were she to leave him the first evening in a house as strange to himself as to her. He might not approve of her appearing for the first time in public under any protection but his own. But then the French dancer, whom she might never see at all, if she missed her to-night! It was very provoking that there should be no room in the box for Mr. Tilden. To whom could Lady Devereux have promised all her ivories? It was a strange question for my mother to ask herself, as she had been so long absent from town; but nevertheless, she did begin guessing who were to be the occupants of the box. No more women, she knew. Lady Devereux was far too fastidious to hold a parliament of petticoats at the king's theatre. Sir Herbert detested all places save the pit. (There was no omnibus in my mother's time.) And the result of her self-questioning upon the subject was—Lord Otterford.

Lady Madelaine threw herself back among the satin cushions of her bergère, and fell into a fit of deep musing. Lord Otterford had worshiped her for a whole year. Her aunt had looked forward with confidence to their marriage. They had sung, danced, and rode together. Otterford was very handsome, with large, almond-shaped black eyes, a well-formed and prominent nose, fine teeth, and a graceful figure. Had there been any mind under the mask, he would have been eminently handsome. As it was, Otterford was only a musician and a roué. He had pursued the Lady Madelaine until he discovered that she was nearly penniless; when, having bestowed upon her, in a fit of sentimental regret, the title of la belle mal dotée, he quietly withdrew his pretensions to her hand, and left it to be sought by others with fewer wants and more resources than himself.

Lady Madelaine felt his secession severely. It was not that she loved him, for she had at once discovered his mental deficiencies, while his moral lapses had been more than once hinted at in her presence; but he was well-looking, fashionable, and heir to an earldom; and she had, moreover, become accustomed to his assiduities, and conscious of his admiration. Among the defections of this nature, which we elsewhere hinted to have been comprised in the early experiences of the flattered beauty, she had been less insensible to that of Lord Otterford than to those of many more wealthy, and, in the acceptation of the world, more eligible admirers.

The lip of Lady Madelaine curled, as, in thinking of the past, she remembered how her flatterers had likened her to a new and brilliant sun in the hemisphere of fashion; and how truly they had borne out their own hyperbole, by melting away like snow-wreaths under her influence, when they discovered that she had little beyond her beauty and her high birth, with which to compensate their homage; and as the memory came back upon her, she instinctively suffered her eye to wander over the magnificent accessories of her married home. But with these reminiscences of her first triumphs came also the dangerous recollection, that Lord Otterford had been the last and the most reluctant to withdraw his pretensions, and that, in truth, his expensive habits and comparatively slender resources had left him without an alternative; for Lady Madelaine had no conception of the beautiful self-abnegation, which will occasionally lead a man who truly loves to divest himself of his own tastes, and to "cleanse his bosom of the perilous stuff" which separates him from the object of his affection.

Her first impulse, after these reflections, was to show the note of Lady Devereux to her husband, and to claim, upon the score of her old attachment to her friend, his indulgence on the present occasion; but, on recurring to the note itself, it struck her that it was not exactly calculated to afford him any particular satisfaction; or to impress him with any great prejudice in favor of the fair writer; and then her two besetting sins came to her aid. Her pride told her that she owed it to herself not to appear to shrink from a meeting with her former admirer, who would be an eligible acquaintance for Mr. Tilden, and who could, of course, never again be more to herself: while her haughtiness reminded her that it was unworthy of Lady Madelaine Glenfillan to suffer herself to be trammeled in her social arrangements by any one, simply because that "any one" had been honored by her hand.

Just as she had arrived at this conclusion, a curricle drove to the door, and a footman shortly afterwards put a card into her hand, with an intimation that Lord Otterford was at the door, but would not intrude upon her at so unseemly an hour; having merely called at the desire of his cousin, Lady Devereux, to request a verbal reply to the note which had been left some days previously, in order to save her ladyship the trouble of a written answer so immediately upon her arrival. My mother hesitated for an instant—the position was sufficiently perplexing—but, in the next, an affirmative reply was given, and the well-appointed curricle drove off.

The rubicon was passed. At whatever cost of annoyance to her husband, the engagement must be kept; and the haughty lady practiced her first lesson in dissimulation, by tearing the little note of her giddy and thoughtless friend into minute pieces, and throwing them into the superb basket of Sevres porcelain, which stood under her writing-table.

Mr. Tilden returned to dinner at eight o'clock, having been engaged during the morning at the Heralds' Office, in the agreeable occupation of superintending the quartering of the Glenfillan arms into his own shield, and in selecting a superb parure of pearls for his beautiful young wife. He was somewhat surprised, but infinitely more flattered, by the exquisite toilet in which he was received; and hastened, after a brief and eager greeting, to fasten upon the throat and arms of the young beauty the ornaments of which he was the bearer, and which he tenderly denominated "her welcome home." They could not have been presented more apropos, for they gave the last touch of elegance to the simple and rich costume which she had selected; although it is equally certain that they, at the same time, rendered the ungracious act which she was about to commit tenfold more difficult.

It was, however, necessary that an immediate explanation should be given, as Lady Madelaine had ordered her carriage at nine o'clock; and she accordingly mentioned her engagement with as much insouciance as she could command; dwelling principally upon the French dancer, and the regret of Lady Devereux that, on this occasion, she was unable to offer Mr. Tilden a seat in her box; and winding up her communication by entreating, with the sweetest smile in the world, that he would not trouble himself to dress, as she had not a moment to spare, and would therefore, for her own sake, overlook the solecism.

The astonishment with which my father listened requires no comment. He was stung to the very soul; and had Lady Madelaine raised her eyes to his countenance as he left the room, she would have been at no loss to understand the effect which her words had produced; but she was already too good a tactician to expose herself to unnecessary annoyance, and she consequently kept them riveted upon her bracelet.

My father was no longer a young man, and he loved for the first time. It is, therefore, scarcely to be wondered at, that before he descended from his dressing closet, after a hasty and imperfect toilet, to conduct his bride to the dining-room, he had found what he endeavored to believe were sufficient excuses for her thoughtlessness. She was so young, and so admired—here he involuntarily winced a little, but soon recovered himself. She had been so isolated at Glenfillan; and now she was again among the friends of her early youth, and the scenes of her first girlish happiness: such a circumstance would not, in all probability, occur again. She had been taken by surprise, and could not properly be blamed for wanting the consideration which a married woman, considerably her senior, had not deemed it necessary to display towards himself. Still, it was provoking; and when he had fancied, too, that the becoming and careful toilet had been made for him!

There was, however, no possibility of showing even the shadow of harshness to so beautiful a being—the bride of two weeks only—and so—most gracious reader! my father reentered the drawing-room, in which he was to spend his solitary evening, with a smile upon his lips, and thus taught his fair wife a lesson on her own power, which she never afterwards unlearned; and, at the close of a constrained and hurried dinner, handed her carefully to her carriage, to feel, as she drove towards the Haymarket, that, after all, Mr. Tilden was really less unreasonable than many men whom she had known; and to wonder whether Lord Otterford would be glad to meet her again.

She was not long left in suspense; for, as her carriage stopped at the Opera House, the subject of her thoughts stood at the portal, ready to assist her to alight, and to conduct her to Lady Devereux's box. She at once saw, however, that he was no longer the laughing, joyous rattle, from whom she had parted a few months before. There was a tremor in his voice as he addressed her; an unsteadiness in the arm which he intended for her support; an evident effort in the cold and brief congratulations which he terminated with a smothered sigh, as though their utterance had cost him a pang; and his manner was altogether so contagious, that Lady Madelaine felt confused and uncomfortable in her turn; and was glad to find herself in the box of her friend, as though the presence of a third person were necessary to restore her self-possession and composure.

As the carriage drove off, my father lighted a cigar, and strolled into the square; and when he was weary of this amusement, he returned to his splendid home. The two footmen who had attended "my lady" were already in the hall, and he knew that she had arrived safely at her destination. When he reached the drawing-room, he took up a book, but he could not read. Disguise it as he would from himself, he was wounded to the heart. He knew nothing of Lord Otterford—how should he? but he could not avoid feeling that he had been treated, if not exactly with contempt by his wife, at least with a want of courtesy eminently galling to a proud spirit like his. In short, his reverie was anything but pleasant; and he was glad when, at midnight, he heard the carriage once more drive from the door to fetch home his truant wife.

On this occasion he, for the first time, paid the penalty of his wealth; for his establishment was formed on so extensive a scale, that it was impossible for him to relieve the tedium of his solitude by making one affectionate arrangement to welcome her return. There was nothing which he could do that would not be tenfold better done by her maid or her footman; so he amused himself by walking up and down the spacious apartment, and accommodating his paces to the pattern of the carpet, in order that, at least, he might not appear weary when she came in.

But amusements, even as intellectual as that which he had selected, will not interest forever; and my father had omitted to remember, that the departure of a carriage did not necessarily involve the return of its mistress; and so it proved in this case; for Lady Devereux had a petit souper after the opera, and she declared, and Lord Otterford looked, the impossibility of consuming chickens and champagné without their long-lost friend; while Lady Madelaine was so delighted with the admiration which she had elicited "from all parts of the house," and was so bewildered by the strange and unaccountable melancholy of the once gay and brilliant man who had stood throughout the evening behind her chair, taking no share in the lively conversation of his cousin, but assiduous in his silent attentions to herself, that she could not forbear a feeling of curiosity as to its cause; so she resolved to join the supper, and to take an opportunity of questioning Lady Devereux upon the subject.

There is assuredly a spell in those Opera suppers; and this particular one was enchanting! As she left the house, Lady Devereux was besieged by entreaties for permission to accompany her home, but, having formed her party, she was obdurate. "Not to-night, my lord—not to-night, my dear sir.—Impossible, Sir James; I never exceed a dozen"—formed the running accompaniment to her retreat; and when Lady Madelaine drove off in her friend's chariot, her own was ordered to follow her to Portland Place.

Half-past two o'clock on Sunday morning had chimed, when once more the knocker of the hall door sent its staccato thunder through the house; but, loud and prolonged as it was, it failed to awaken my father, who, worn out with watching, had, an hour previously, flung himself upon a sofa, and fallen into a deep sleep.

Lady Madelaine, pale and exhausted, hurried to her dressing-room, and, having urged her Abigail to expedition, soon was, or seemed to be, buried in as profound a slumber as that which had overtaken her husband.

And so ended their second night in town.

CHAPTER VII.

The last ball had been given; the last dinner eaten; the last lounger had departed, or, faute de mieux, had declared himself gone, and become temporarily invisible; the belle of five seasons had reluctantly admitted to herself, and been reminded by her chaperone, that another chance was lost, and had despairingly betaken herself to a cheap watering-place, to recruit alike her health and her finances, and to sigh over the past; the last benefit was over; the drive was dusty and deserted; a few who had announced that they were "off to the continent" had been compelled to content themselves with crossing the water in the neighborhood of the Borough; pedestrians could venture upon passing from the pavement of one great thoroughfare to another, without risking their necks; tradesmen began to reckon up their profits, and fathers of families to reflect upon their bills; in short, "London itself was out of town," and still my mother lingered. Rooksley, and a matrimonial tête-à-tête of a month's duration, were more than she had courage to contemplate, after the brilliant and triumphant début which she had made. There was, however, no alternative. The season was at an end. Lady Madelaine Tilden had been the fashion. Royalty had eulogized her beauty and her grace; diners-out had decided on the excellence of her chef; sour dowagers had sneered at her mésalliance; and budding beauties had intrigued and entreated for invitations to her ball; where

> "——' Wreathed smiles' went round, and speeches
> Fine, forced, and plentiful—as peaches;
> And costly wines on every side
> Poured their bright current far and wide."

And what rôle, it may be asked, did my father enact in this brilliant drama? I am proud to answer, that it was one so dignified and irreproachable, that Lady Madelaine herself, had she had time to remark it, must have felt how greatly her own consequence was enhanced by the noble bearing of her husband. They were occasionally seen together in public; especially at the Opera, where she had secured a box next to that of Lady Devereux; and, on these occasions, the manly beauty and graceful bearing of Mr. Tilden never failed to elicit both comment and curiosity. Who was he? Where did his money come from? These were the two principal queries; and, although they were frequently answered, it was always by inference or surmise; for the "set" into which his marriage had introduced him, were as little likely to know anything of the late firm of Osbaldiston and Co., as of the leading tea-mart at Pekin. That he was a man of refined tastes and fastidious habits was visible at once—there was nothing of the parvenu about him. Half a dozen titled acquaintance volunteered to propose him at their respective clubs; a few accommodating friends were anxious to transfer to him some of the best horses in England; but they quickly discovered that Mr. Tilden knew as much of horse-flesh as themselves, although he might not condescend to make his talent quite so profitable; and, in short, it was soon evident to every body who was anybody, and these composed Lady Madelaine's visiting list, that Mr. Tilden, be he who he might, was not a man who could either be "shelved" or "done."

And now, a circumstance has just struck me, which, from my own knowledge of the veracity of my narrative, never before presented itself to my mind; but which may very fairly have induced some doubt in those of such of my readers as may feel disposed to be difficult and hypercritical.

I have made repeated allusions to the refined mind and elegant tastes of my father, and there may be individuals, who, themselves highly-born and elaborately educated, may revert to the early training and occupation of the young merchant with a feeling of fastidiousness and contempt; and please themselves by believing in the impossibility of so utter a change as that which I have represented, and in comparatively so short a space of time. They have only, however, to remember that human will is a most powerful engine; and that where it was worked by ambition, pride, and self-respect, it was urged on by three of the great impulses of our nature. Nor was the social conversion of my father a sudden miracle, wrought by the mere possession of wealth; it was the slowly and steadily attained result of time, and distance, and application. I have myself not spared the satisfied ignorance of the traveled novice, who, anxious to assume the attributes of a connoisseur, dabbled in doubtful originals, and consigned to the address of his agent in England a case or two of worthless pictures: but those follies were the early mistakes of his inexperience, by which he had far too much sense and discrimination to be long misled. A total estrangement from the scenes, the associates, and the pursuits of his early manhood, threw the active mind of my father upon the individuals and habits of those by whom he was surrounded; and the same steady and strong will which had initiated him into the complicated mysteries of commerce, soon provided him with an open sesame to the more easily-attained conventionalisms of general society. Wherever he paused during his travels, he applied himself strenuously to the examination and comprehension of all that fell under his notice; while he was careful to select his casual society among that description of persons with whom he was desirous thenceforth to associate on equal terms. His evident wealth and total want of pretension rendered this by no means so difficult a matter as at first sight it may appear. Long voyages at sea, in the infancy of steam, and the generalizing accommodations of foreign posting houses, were able aids to his design. But who that has traveled, even of late years, has not experienced the truth which I am here endeavoring to enforce! Suffice it that my father did succeed to the full extent of his wishes; and that at the period of his marriage with Lady Madelaine Glenhillan he was at once a finished gentleman and a complete man of the world; and perhaps he had the more readily adopted the tastes and usages of the noble and the wealthy, because in the outset of his career of ambition he had nothing to undo.

It is only those who have trammeled themselves with low-bred associates, and degraded their own minds by low-bred habits, who cannot rise with their fortunes; and this is a fact which the narrow-minded insolence of the "exclusive" would do well to learn, instead of affecting to believe that his "order" came into the world after "every god had set his seal" upon it, while all other classes of society were branded with the mark of Cain.

To this, my reader's first possible objection, not only to the positive veracity, but even to the verisimilitude of my family sketch, he may also advance the improbability of the decision and the world-wisdom of which I have shown my mother to be possessed at so early an age as nineteen; but, should he indeed do so, he can know little of woman's nature. With women, I do not hesitate to affirm that intellect, strong will, and extraordinary powers of perspicacity and fitness, are of no particular age. Watch an intelligent girl as she passes from childhood into youth, and my argument will be at once borne out. I am hazarding no rash opinion. The assertion is founded upon extensive experience. Generally speaking, the youth at sixteen is still a boy, absorbed by his lexicon, his boat, and his pony; but the girl who at sixteen is not a woman, alike in intellect and in heart, bids fair to die a child or a simpleton at the close of a long life. All children, particularly those who are banished to the nursery, and consigned to the companionship of hirelings, necessarily hear many things which they are not supposed to remark, far less to understand; but the young are peculiarly susceptible to all that is passing about them, and nothing falls to the ground unheeded which is brought under their observation.

In comparative infancy boys experience this external influence far less than their sisters. Their habits, at once boisterous and active, afford to them fewer opportunities of hearing discussions, and arguments, and inferences, relating to social ties and social usages. The sedentary amusements of girls lend themselves, on the contrary, not only to momentary attention, but to after-speculation. Jemima, as she trims her frock, is frequently employed in wondering what mamma meant last night by telling Mrs. Smith that Miss Jones had jilted Mr. Brown, because she discovered that Mr. Robinson was a richer man; and when the frock is completed a day or two afterwards, she is very probably still occupied in wondering whether, when she is a little older, she shall ever jilt any one, and if it is a pleasant amusement, and what it really means. Fanny, as she dresses her doll, bids her be good and quiet, and then she shall have a rich husband, and ride in a carriage, and do just as she likes; for mamma told papa yesterday, when he was angry with her, that she would do as she liked—while the girl of thirteen already begins to criticise her mother's beauty, and to ask herself what will be the probable effects produced by her own.

Where there are strong powers of mind, these are merely subordinate speculations. The intellect, as it awakens, is insatiable; and it seizes upon every aliment within its reach. How often do we all witness instances of this fact? How often do we see the really clever and intelligent girl sink into the dull and mindless woman! Woe be to them by whom the holy lamp of intelligence was suffered to flicker and go out!

Gifted with extraordinary powers of perception, of retention, and of analysis, my mother, under the able tuition of the world-worshiping Lady Sinclair, was at fifteen a woman in tact and fashion. She fully understood the privileges of her high birth, the advantages of her extreme beauty, and the necessity of making both contribute to her after-establishment. These were her aunt's lessons. The world itself, ere long, taught her others. Intoxicated by the adulation of the men and the envy of the women, she might have become insolent, had she not felt the impolicy of such a weakness; and the same admirable tact which preserved her in this instance, saved her a second time, when, as her flatterers fell away, "each after each," on discovering the slender amount of her dowry, she learnt that even she—the highly-born and the beautiful—could be put into a humiliating competition with — money! Then, again, her woman-wit lent its aid; and, where a weaker mind would have become bitter, she only became wise. Her after-fate confirmed this wisdom. In the seclusion of her father's castle, and rendered painfully aware of that father's trammeled position, she had time to revert to the past. She began to concede that the fortune-hunting adorers, by whom she had been first worshiped and then deserted, might advance a valid excuse for their apostacy—she began to discover that there was wisdom as well as wit in the old song, which declares that and—she married my father.

"Not even love can live on flowers;"

Lady Madelaine Tilden had not studied for the nine long years of awakening womanhood under such able tutors as the world and Lady Sinclair; she had not suffered mortification and disappointment; she had not felt her pride prostrated, her self-love wounded, and her heart made the toy of idle and interested foplings; she had not been suddenly withdrawn from the giddy vortex of fashion and celebrity, and buried alive in the Highlands, to muse over the motives, the impulses, the feelings, and the weaknesses of those among whom she had previously lived, to reappear in the same bright and busy world a woman in stature, but a child at heart.

Remembering my mother vividly, as I still do, I feel satisfied that, with the same experience (had that been possible), she would have played at fifteen the same cold, and haughty, and decisive part. Age has no influence upon principles, and feelings, and prejudices, like those of Lady Madelaine Tilden.

The season was at an end. The woods and glades of Rooksley were in all their beauty. The domain was extensive, and in admirable taste. If a fault could be found, it existed in the absence of all ancient timber — the leafy honors of Rooksley Chace had been stricken down by the hammer of the auctioneer. It is true, that great skill had been evinced in repairing this evil, in so far as it was susceptible of reparation; but the antique grandeur of the mansion seemed to frown forth, in haughty scorn of the new generation of forest timber that was growing up about it.

Lady Devereux, on her first visit to the Chace, laughingly told her cousin that the new acquisition of Mr. Tilden reminded her of himself: it was very stately and very magnificent, but it wanted time!

"At last, my sweet Madelaine," said her husband, as for the second time they sat tête-à-tête by lamplight under their own roof, "at last you are all my own, and I have time to ask you a thousand questions, which you, more strangely still, have time to answer. And, first, how do you like Rooksley?"

"It is impossible not to like a place upon which the Duke of Dorchester prided himself so much," replied my mother, who had never been surprised out of her nil admirari since her arrival in Grosvenor Square; "but it sadly wants timber."

'Our woods are very promising, and we must have patience," said my father, in whose voice there was a slight tone of disappointment.

"And you must excuse me if I add, Mr. Tilden, that the house as sadly requires—inmates. We are positively lost here alone."

"But just now, my dear Madelaine, repose and quiet are so essential to you. Your roses have waned fearfully during the past season. I shall not be happy until I see them bloom again."

"Have we any neighborhood?" asked the young wife in her turn.

"I have not yet made the inquiry. I only fear that we shall ascertain the fact too soon. In so fine a sporting country, there can be little doubt that we shall find many resident families, who will not fail to seize so admirable an opportunity of making the acquaintance of the fair and fashionable Lady Madelaine Tilden."

"Provided that they prove visitable, it will be a blessing;" said my mother, as she suppressed a yawn; "Glenfillan has perfectly disgusted me with empty, echoing, overgrown family houses."

My father walked to the open window, and drawing back the curtain, looked out upon the beautiful expanse of wood and water, which lay steeped in moonlight, beyond the lawn. The deer were lying in groups upon the soft green sward of the home-park, and their long shadows formed fantastic outlines upon the grass. The nightingales were answering each other from the leaf-laden boughs. At intervals a hare started from the underwood, and scudded across the open glades, brushing away the heavy drops of dew which fringed the blades of the long grass; and the peculiar cry of the pheasants broke the silence for an instant, as it rose from the more distant preserves.

It was a scene of rich and tranquil English landscape beauty; and as my father mentally ran over the various and vaunted spots which he had visited during his wanderings, he could recall nothing by which it seemed to him to be rivaled in pure and placid loveliness.

After having contemplated the enchanting view for a time in silence, he could not refrain from expatiating upon its extreme beauty to Lady Madelaine, who rose languidly from her chair, as if rather with a courteous desire to give him pleasure, than from an idea of receiving any herself. My mother was no whit a sentimentalist: she had never been taught to consider the country otherwise than as the most correct refuge after the season, and that portion of the British empire in which the flowers were grown that composed her bouquets. But even she was not altogether proof against the spell of the quiet holiness of nature: and, for a time, she gazed long and silently on the clear glory of that summer night; watched the reflection of the bright stars, as they appeared to dance upon the undulating ripple of the lake; and then sent her long and searching glances deep into the blue and cloudless sky, over which they were strown like diamond-studs upon a regal mantle: while the moon, that lay lovingly upon the open glades, and on the glittering waters, only touched the summits of the tall trees, and crowned them with silver, leaving broad masses of shadow about and beneath them, which lent a mysterious indistinctness to the distance.

Hers was not, however, a nature to remain long thus absorbed. The very beauty of the scene soon suggested other and more worldly ideas. She began to think how admirably the park lent itself to the idea of a brilliant fête champêtre. Fireworks would have a delightful effect, if let off from the island on the lake. Nothing could be prettier! And two or three boats, gaily decked with streamers and colored lights, would be fairy-like and magical, as they appeared and disappeared among the overhanging willows. Then she peopled the lawn with dancing booths, marquees, and parti-colored groups; and then she heaved a sigh, as she remembered that they were utter strangers in the county, and that, to do all this, the few friends whom they expected would not suffice; while, even for the advent of those few, she had yet a weary month to wait.

"Is it not calm and lovely?" asked my father at length, as with affectionate anxiety he threw a shawl over her shoulders, and passed his arm about her waist. "The long, deep sigh, to which you just now gave utterance, awoke me, my sweet wife, from the most delicious train of thought in which I had ever indulged. Dare I tell you what was its subject?"

"As it would seem that we were similarly engaged, we have alike done treason to the beauty upon which we looked;" was the reply; "for in me, also, it induced a château en Espagne, that was not without its charms."

"Will you not confide it to me?"

"I see no reason why I should refuse. I was picturing to myself how beautiful a fête we might give here, and how well everything would tell, for no natural accessory is wanted; when I suddenly remembered that we knew no one, and that, consequently, I could do nothing, save console myself with the Italian proverb, Soffri il male, e aspetta il bene."

"And I," said the husband, as he looked down fondly, and yet somewhat mournfully, upon the beautiful face, on which the moonlight shed its clear, calm radiance; "I was thinking with how proud a heart I might one day see you lead forth our child to gambol on that velvet lawn, and to sport beside those glittering waters. I was thinking—"

"I beseech you, do not read me a homily;" said my mother, withdrawing herself from his clasp with a slight shudder, and returning to her seat: "that is a subject which I by no means wish to dwell on. I assure you, Mr. Tilden, that to a young and fashionable woman such a prospect is by no means a pleasant one."

"But to a wife, Madelaine—"

"Ha, that is the text of another homily. Fifteen years hence I shall myself, perhaps, babble of maternal duties; at present I do not affect to understand them, and am only thankful that, at all events, such things have been created as nursery-maids and governesses."

"One day I trust that you will feel differently," said my father, forcing a smile.

"Perhaps;" was the cold reply; "but at present I will only ask you to ring for the chessboard."

CHAPTER VIII.

The dreaded month went by more rapidly than the Lady Madelaine had anticipated. It was impossible to be thrown entirely upon my father's society without appreciating his many admirable qualities; and had not the twelve previous weeks of dissipation, coquetry, and folly, thoroughly unhinged the mind, and perverted the feelings of the young wife, she might, possibly, have learnt to love her husband as he deserved. But, alas! those twelve short weeks had been sufficient to destroy this hope forever.

Let it not be thought that my mother wilfully, and with her eyes open, plunged herself into positions of difficulty, and resolved to indulge her own predilections conte qui conte. Far from it. Had she imagined that Lord Otterford was a deliberate and cold-blooded profligate, who was amusing himself at the expense of her vanity and inexperience, she would have shrunk from him with horror. It was that very vanity and inexperience which blinded her. Had she gone a step further, and suspected that he had yet darker and more guilty designs, she would, in all probability, have sought for protection and refuge in the affection of the man to whom she had given her hand; but no such idea ever crossed the pure mind of Lady Madelaine. She was vain, imprudent, and exacting. She required homage, but she never dreamt of paying it by a return. The haughtiness of her natural disposition made her jealous of all interference on the part of her husband; and the line of conduct which she had adopted immediately after her marriage had so thoroughly emancipated her from his control, that she soon ceased to understand that he had any right to exert it. It was true—as her friend Lady Devereux had sententiously observed, in one of those hours of female confidence which are productive, at times, of a vast amount of evil—that Mr. Tilden had rescued her from the monotonous exile of Glenfillan, and surrounded her with magnificence; but what had she not done for him? Look at her rank—her connexion—her beauty! Was he not almost old enough to be her father? And—her dear Madelaine must forgive her for speaking frankly—was he not, before their marriage, a nobody!

All this was undeniable—and upon these premises my mother acted. There can be no doubt that there must have been moments in which the question would arise in her own heart, in how far her renewal of intimacy with Lord Otterford was either desirable or correct; but, if it were so, the extreme pride, which was her besetting sin, must equally in those moments have proved her worst enemy, by blinding her to the danger she had so thoughtlessly evoked.

Be all this, however, as it may, the month of matrimonial domestication wore away swiftly; the neighborhood proving not only visitable but sociable. My father's surmise was a correct one. The fame of the dashing Lady Madelaine Tilden had preceded her, and all the country were anxious to be numbered among her acquaintance. The men were prepared to lose their hearts, and the women to profit by so admirable an opportunity of imitating the dress and style of a celebrated beauty. It is true, that the extremely cold and sometimes arrogant bearing of my mother, led a few of the most important families to doubt whether, after all, the long-talked-of Tildens would prove any very great acquisition; and to contrast the haughty and indolent courtesies of their new neighbor with the easy and winning manners of the Ladies Trevor; but, as the frank politeness of my father offered an agreeable relief from the supercilious insouciance of his wife, and invariably healed the wounds which her indifference had inflicted on the self-love of their visitors, no decided affront was given to the female portion of the guests; while the extreme beauty and inherent love of admiration which made my mother so attractive to the other sex, sufficiently propitiated their husbands and brothers, to induce them to believe and to declare that Lady Madelaine Tilden was an angel!

As a matter of course, invitations poured in at Rooksley; and among the rest, came one from the Vernons, whose estate joined that of my father. Mrs. Vernon was a widow, whose husband had represented the county in parliament; and who, although he had been dead for several years, had never quite recovered her loss. She was a gentle, amiable woman, still possessing the remains of great beauty, but thoroughly indifferent to everything, save the happiness of her son and daughter, at whose entreaty she had emerged from retirement, to make the acquaintance of the new owners of Rooksley.

Frederick Vernon was a fine young man of six-and-twenty, with a full appreciation of his personal and worldly advantages; which latter attribute I mention rather to give a proof of his consistency, than from conceiving it to be an extraordinary feature of his history which required to be put on record. He had recently returned from a tour of Europe, and was strongly tinged with foreign habits and ideas. To him the sojourn of Vernon Priory, beautiful as it was, would have been insupportable, had not the extreme affection which he bore to his mother and sister made every spot which they inhabited not only bearable, but pleasant to him. Frederic Vernon was not constituted for retirement. His talents were dazzling, but by no means solid; his acquirements were barely respectable; but he had the tact to appear far wiser than he was—a secret more generally diffused in society than it is supposed to be, and particularly easy to practice by a handsome young man of good property, whom no one is vastly disposed to criticise with severity. His success abroad had been considerable; and it was even rumored that he had been requested to quit the territories of a petty Italian Duca within twenty-four hours, although it had never occurred to Mr. Vernon to have any political opinion out of his own country; but he had danced, and sighed, and looked love-lorn in a quarter where such proceedings were not admissible; and he accordingly obeyed without demur the obliging suggestion of the official who waited upon him at his hotel; and passed out of the duchy on the following morning, carrying away with him a heavy heart and an exceedingly magnificent brilliant ring.

No one could exactly decide how this traveling adventure became whispered in England, as his valet was, of course, as secret as the grave; and the affair was altogether too delicate to have borne mention from himself; but, nevertheless, it was whispered; and it is, therefore, not surprising that Mr. Frederic Vernon was considered, and considered himself to be, the hero of the county. He had fits of abstraction—in society; occasionally started painfully as his eye fell upon the ring; sung one particular and pathetic Italian ballad with peculiar pathos and expression to his guitar; and was, in short, a drawing-room Corydon.

Emily Vernon was a charming girl of eighteen. Tall, and fair, and gentle; tenderly attached to her widowed mother, and devotedly fond of her handsome and sentimental brother; without one thought of self, or one craving for admiration.

Mr. Tilden had been from home when the Vernons called, and my mother had returned the visit without him, by leaving cards at their lodge-gate during her drive; nor had she considered it necessary to mention the circumstance, until the arrival of the dinner-card; when she carelessly inquired of my father if he considered it expedient to accept the invitation.

"Since you request my opinion, I should say decidedly yes;" was the reply. "On passing their place, a day or two since, I inquired to whom it belonged, and was informed that the late proprietor represented the county during several sessions, and that the ladies of the family were almost domesticated at Rooksley, with the daughters of the duke!"

"And Félicie tells me," followed up my mother, "that Mrs. Vernon's son, who is now at the Priory, is a sort of hero de roman, who eloped with an Italian Principessa, fought a duel with the prince, and was expelled the country by the pope himself—a personage, in short, who is contraband over half Europe."

"Ha, indeed! Is it so? Am I fated to find my old traveling comrade, Frederic Vernon, in my nearest neighbor?" said my father with a smile. "The name was not sufficiently uncommon to strike me: but the affair with the Italian Duchessa settles the point."

"And was he really involved in a duel, and afterwards expelled the country?" asked my mother, roused for a moment into a feeling of interest.

"So it was said; and it is certain that his disparition from the duchy was so sudden that he did not favor his friends by any leave-taking. There was decidedly some mystery attached to him; but as we never afterwards chanced to meet, I am unable to afford any precise information on the subject."

"We will dine with the Vernons, at all events," said the bride; "I will cancel my acceptance to Lady O'Halloran; the hall is at least four miles from hence; and the Vernons live nearly at the park gate; the fatigue will be much lessened by the change."

And having so decided, my mother once more bent her fair head over her desk; gave the note which she had already written to Lady O'Halloran to her spaniel for a plaything; wrote an acceptance to Mrs. Vernon with her best crowquill; and then threw herself back among her cushions, to wonder what effect her own beauty would produce upon a man who had been expelled from an Italian duchy, to save the honor of its female sovereign.

For the first time since her arrival in the country, Lady Madelaine took considerable interest in the operations of Félicie, on the evening of Mrs. Vernon's dinner. She resolutely resisted all the endeavors of her attendant to induce her to make her début in the country en grande dame: refused to wear any ornament; and, notwithstanding the voluble horror and visible mortification of the scabrette, declared her intention of eschewing all coiffure save her own magnificent hair. Félicie urged, entreated, and eventually wept over the extraordinary resolution of her mistress; and closed drawers and caskets with a series of gestures of offended dignity which were quite indescribable; although she afterwards conceded to Mrs. Lockall, the housekeeper, that it was a comfort to know, in spite of the caprice which induced Milady to go out for the first time in a costume better suited to a petite fille, than to the wife of a millionaire, that she had seldom seen her look so well; and therefore, it was easy to imagine how she would have looked had she been mise comme il faut!

It was, however, as I need scarcely explain, no part of Lady Madelaine's system to owe admiration to a ribbon or a set of baubles. If she could not command it by the graces of her person, she scorned to win it by the magnificence of her attire; or to share it with diamonds and gauzes. That she had judged wisely, in the present instance, she at once perceived by the expression of her husband's countenance, as she joined him in the library, previous to their departure for Vernon Priory. She had indeed, as Felicie wisely remarked, seldom looked so beautiful. There was an utter absence of pretension in her whole appearance; a dignified simplicity in her dress and bearing, which delighted my father. She had evidently no intention of overawing her new acquaintance by the power of her wealth—that most undertoned of all ambition—and her extreme loveliness was so conspicuous in the utter absence of extraneous ornament, that, as he raised her hand to his lips, he could not resist the utterance of a compliment more lover-like than matrimonial.

Five minutes' drive from their own park gate brought them to that of Mrs. Vernon; and even in the twilight my father could not forbear remarking the magnificence of the old avenue through which they approached the house, which was surrounded on all sides by elms and beeches of stately growth. The building itself appeared to be coeval with the timber. A great portion of the exterior was overgrown with ivy, amid which the lofty lancet-headed windows, streaming with light, produced at that hour a magical effect; while the deep perspective of the principal entrance, whose receding arches were terminated by massive doors of iron-studded oak, gave an antique stateliness to the edifice, and heightened its monastic character.

Considerably less extensive than Rooksley, Vernon Priory was infinitely more attractive to a stranger. No woodman's axe had ever sounded in that quiet spot. It was easy to see that sire and son had alike respected the place of their birth, and the home of their ancestors. When a giant tree lay prone within the limits of the moss-grown fences, it was because time had eaten away its stout heart, and relaxed its weakened roots; and while the scattered rooks cawed their hoarse requiem over the prostrate ruin, it conveyed no reproach to the lords of the soil. No croupier's rake had ever swept away the leafy honors of the Vernon woods; no dice box had ever rattled its triumph over their sturdy trunks. Like the treasure of the pre-adamite sultans, to which travelers tell us that every monarch is compelled to add his share, while none are permitted to withdraw any portion of that already hoarded, so did every succeeding Vernon plant his saplings in the soil of his ancestors; while each would have considered it as sacrilege to destroy the work, or counteract the intention of his predecessor.

When my father and Lady Madelaine entered Mrs. Vernon's drawing-room, the party, which was by no means a large one, had already assembled; the hostess received her stranger guests with a quiet elegance of demeanor which accorded well with her stately although faded beauty, and her deep mourning dress; and after having presented her son and daughter, proceeded to introduce my mother to the lady who occupied a portion of the sofa to which she led her, while my father renewed his acquaintance with Mr. Vernon.

This lady, who chanced to be Lady O'Halloran, found an immediate topic of conversation, in her regret that Mrs Vernon should have proved more fortunate than herself, in being the first to receive their new neighbor; and then she proceeded to congratulate herself on having at least so agreeable an opportunity of making her acquaintance. Lady Madelaine bowed and smiled, although she felt greatly disposed to yawn; but she found the volubility of her new friend less importunate when she discovered that there was no necessity for her to offer any reply; so she continued to bow and smile at intervals during the five minutes which preceded dinner; and she had scarcely left her seat, and taken the arm of Mr. Vernon on its announcement, ere Lady O'Halloran assured Dr. James, the rector, under whose escort she was preparing to follow, that Lady Madelaine Tilden had been cruelly misrepresented by her correspondent, Mrs. Gordon, for that she had seldom met with a more simply-mannered or sensible person. The worthy gentlewoman was not aware, or had forgotten that "the beard does not make the philosopher;" and that it was very possible for a fashionable beauty to be all that she had heard, when she felt it expedient to assert herself; and yet patiently to suffer the garrulous civility of an elderly gentlewoman where she was anxious to disarm local criticism.

Lady O'Halloran was, accordingly, by no means the only person whose golden opinion my mother won that evening. Mrs. Vernon was delighted at the prospect of obtaining such a friend for her gentle Emily; who, on her part, was enchanted with the quiet grace and high-breeding of the new mistress of Rooksley. But of all those whom she thralled, not one was so thoroughly the slave of her fascinations as Mr. Frederic Vernon. He assured Mrs. Alexander, who sat on his left hand, that Lady Madelaine Tilden reminded him almost painfully of a woman of high rank whom he had known abroad; and then he sighed, and glanced down upon his brilliant ring, and fell into a fit of abstraction; during which his dark blue eyes were riveted on the table-cloth, and he looked like one who lived rather upon the memory of the past, than the realities of the present.

When the ladies retired to the drawing-room, my mother turned the light of her most sunny smiles upon Emily Vernon. She was precisely the person calculated to please a handsome young married woman of high fashion. Strikingly pretty, and highly accomplished, she was nevertheless so gentle and so new to the world, that her attractions were veiled by her extreme timidity—she had not within her the elements of a rival! Nothing could have been so fortunate; and, acting upon this conviction, Lady Madelaine, instead of closing her eyes, and throwing herself upon a sofa to await the reappearance of the gentlemen, at once entered into conversation with her young hostess; and ere twenty minutes had elapsed, she was seated at Miss Vernon's harp, explaining to her a difficult passage in a popular piece of music; after which, as enthusiastically as though she had only that one delighted auditor, she swept the chords with a master hand, and electrified the assembled party by her brilliant execution; and then, suddenly suffering the strings to vibrate into silence, once more established herself beside the astonished and delighted girl, and resumed the conversation which the music had interrupted.

"You know Rooksley well, I understand," she said in a subdued voice.

"Oh, very well—too well. It was almost as much my home as this, before the duke's"—She paused, not knowing how best to shape her meaning.

"I understand;" said Lady Madelaine as she laid her own beautiful hand upon that of her companion; "but, Miss Vernon, you must cease to say 'too well,' or I shall despair of making it again agreeable to you. Remember that you are my nearest neighbor, and that I shall depend greatly upon your kindness. Doubtlessly you had your own apartment at Rooksley; you must come back, and take possession once more"

Tears swelled in the mild eyes of her listener.

"Mr Tilden and I are at present tristes comme des bonnets de nuit," pursued my mother; "but we promise to behave better ere long. I am supposed to be worn out by the London season, and am consequently sentenced to a month's quiet. I shall not regret it so much if you consent occasionally to share my solitude We expect a shooting party in August, and Mr. Tilden is already full of anxiety about his preserves,—in fact, he is endeavoring to become a respectable country gentleman; which is, I imagine, quite correct under the circumstances."

"His Grace of Dorchester was immensely popular," said the eldest, over-dressed, Miss Alexander, who sat near them.

My mother turned upon her a freezing look of non-recognition, and then calmly withdrew her eyes.

"You are not, I believe, Lady Madelaine Tilden, acquainted with Miss Alexander," said Emily Vernon, whose cheek was crimson with confusion. "Will you permit me to present her?"

The ladies bowed; and at the conclusion of the ceremony my mother threw herself back upon the sofa, and made no reply to the remark of Miss Alexander, that her mother had done herself the honor of calling at Rooksley. It was no part of her system to be condescending and approachable to all the county.

The gentlemen and the coffee appeared together; and Mrs. Vernon hastened to make known to her new neighbors Dr. James, the worthy rector of the parish, and chaplain to his grace the Duke of Dorchester. Nothing could be more amiable than the reception which he met with from my mother; and Miss Alexander was once more compelled to feel how charming Lady Madelaine Tilden could make herself when she pleased, and how exceedingly ill-bred she was when she thought proper to be so. Indeed, as Dr. James afterwards remarked, the Lady Madelaine Tilden not only met him in the most charming spirit in the world, but even summoned her husband, who was at the moment in deep conversation with young Vernon, in order that he might reiterate her own friendly assurances of a universal welcome at Rooksley.

And Dr. James was quite correct in this statement. When he was led up to my mother, Miss Vernon was summoned to her harp; and, when Miss Vernon obeyed the summons, the reverend doctor remained standing before his fair and smiling interlocutor, until a gesture brought her husband to her side, leaving Mr. Vernon planté in the centre of the room; who, as a matter of course, no sooner saw the doctor engrossed by Mr. Tilden, than he hastened to establish himself in the seat which had been vacated by his sister.

It was a feeling compounded of coquetry and curiosity, which led my mother to exert her utmost fascinations against Mr. Vernon. She was not new enough to flattery and adulation to value them for their own sake; but her vanity was piqued in this instance, and she was at present thrown upon every passing folly for amusement. She did not even remark (as she did subsequently) that Frederic Vernon was amazingly handsome, and that he had the sweetest voice and the whitest hand in the world; she only thought of the Duchessa, and was anxious to see if, indeed, as Félicie had informed her, "il n'avoit plus de gout pour le sexe."

Need I say that she had arrived at a totally different decision before her carriage was announced; or that, as he handed her up the steps, and saw Mr. Tilden take his place beside her, Mr. Vernon believed himself to be once more desperately in love?

My mother left one heavy heart behind her when she quitted Vernon Priory; and that heart beat in the bosom of Miss Caroline Alexander. She had long loved the truant knight, who had evidently become the slave of the beautiful and fashionable stranger; while Mr. Vernon, on his side, had ever, previously to this evening, appeared more happy in her society than in that of any other marriageable young lady in the county; and, with that unfortunate facility common to good-looking and well-dowried girls, who are frequently thrown into the society of handsome and idle men of sentimental tendencies, she had very readily allowed herself to believe that the inclination was mutual; an opinion strongly supported by her mother, a dashing widow, who was quite willing to see her daughters established; and by her elder sister, who being a year or two Mr. Vernon's senior, had no designs upon him on her own account.

It will be easily understood, therefore, that the undisguised admiration of Mr. Vernon for my mother, sent a pang to the heart of Caroline Alexander; and when, on his return to the drawing-room, he proceeded at once to the instrument where his sister had again taken up her station, instead of sharing the lounge upon which she was herself seated alone, she had great difficulty in suppressing the tears which rose to her eyes. She had dreaded, during his absence from the room, that on his reappearance she should be condemned to listen to his admiration of the new star which had risen in their hemisphere; but she did expect that she should have been the auditor whom he would select; and she accordingly comforted herself with the recollection that Lady Madelaine Tilden was a married woman; very heroically compelled herself to join in the comments which were made upon her grace and beauty directly she had taken leave; and had also quite determined on agreeing with her recreant lover (for such she believed him to be) in every particular, however provoking his hyperbole might prove.

The unexpected movement which he had made, however, on entering the room, and his utter silence on the subject of the departed guest, counteracted all her projects; and as she watched him, half buried in a large chair, with his eyes fixed upon the carpet, and the thick masses of his auburn hair falling partially over his face, she for the first time felt a bitter pang of jealousy and doubt. The memory of the Duchessa did not affect her—but the apparition of my mother rendered her wretched; and the rather as she was compelled to acknowledge to herself that it was an effect produced without effort. Nothing could be more unpretending than Lady Madelaine's manner; nothing more simple than her costume. What would it be should Frederic be fated to see her in all the magnificence of dress and fashion, as she had been described in Mrs. Gordon's letter to Lady O'Halloran! Poor Caroline looked down upon her own elaborate toilet, and could have wept. It was a relief to her overcharged heart when her mother's carriage was announced, and they, in their turn, departed from the Priory, which had so long been the centre of all her hopes and of all her ambition.

Nothing could be more simple than that the Vernons, who, in addition to their near neighborhood, claimed, through the gentlemen, a previous acquaintance, should become speedily intimate at Rooksley. The fair Emily proved an admirable cicerone to my mother through the mysteries and beauties of her own domain; while she soon discovered that Mr. Vernon rode as well as Sir James Dornton, and was even more careful. Under these circumstances, the time ceased to hang so heavy indeed, when in addition to her new inmates, for such they nearly were, Lady Madelaine found herself absorbed in a never-ending round of dinner engagements, she had no longer a moment unemployed.

My father, through the medium of Mr. Vernon, soon made acquaintance with all the gentry on his own side of the county; and was prevailed upon to make some extensive purchases in land, which brought him into close contact with the farming interest. His old habits of business enabled him to do this at less loss than generally attends upon such speculations; and he derived perpetual amusement from his schemes of improvement and amelioration. At the suggestion of Emily Vernon, my mother adopted the schools which had been established by the Ladies Trevor, under the sanction of the duke, and spared no expense in rendering them "model-schools." The children wore the prettiest of all pretty uniforms; they had a dinner in the servants' hall at Rooksley every Sunday; the teachers were amply supplied with books of every description; and, in short, the gentle Emily was rejoiced to see all the schemes carried out which had been the day-dream of her former friends. But the Ladies Trevor, nevertheless, had done for these local schools what my mother was by no means inclined to imitate: they had watched over the individual welfare and progress of their little scholars; and, through the medium of their artless communications, they had ascertained the necessities and struggles of many a deserving family, and had thus been enabled to relieve their wants with judgment as well as kindness.

Into the detail of the establishment, my mother was, on the contrary, quite incompetent to enter. Her ideas of poverty did not extend beyond the deprivation of particular luxuries, or, at worst, comforts; but she liked to see the children looking pretty and well-dressed in church on the Sunday; and it was pleasant to feel that it was her own work. She really felt glad, too, when Miss Vernon suggested that the school-house, which stood on the verge of the Rooksley estate, was in a dilapidated condition; and that on driving out with her friend to look at it, she discovered that it was an unsightly barn-like building, which had been erected with a view to do the greatest possible good at the smallest possible amount of outlay. This was a charming circumstance; and before they left the village, a cottage, which chanced to be untenanted, was at once secured by Lady Madelaine for the use of the children until their own school-house could be rebuilt; and, immediately on their return home, my father was commissioned to write to town for architectural drawings, from which a design might be selected to replace the present building.

No proposition could more thoroughly have delighted Mr. Tilden. He was rejoiced to see so wholesome a taste superseding the frivolous pursuits by which his beautiful wife had hitherto been totally engrossed; and, as he lost not a moment in complying with her desire, the plans soon arrived, and were at once submitted to the fair speculators.

After great deliberation, the choice of Miss Vernon was absolutely negatived. It was too small, too plain, and too insignificant. Lady Madelaine was anxious for an erection which should be at once imposing and picturesque; and, when my father smiled at her earnestness, she looked serious, and talked of improving the estate. Mr Vernon agreed with her in every particular; and they accordingly proceeded together, and selected a spot at the entrance of the village, where a handsome gothic edifice was soon in progress, wherein all the poor children in the county might have been commodiously lodged and taught. Such being the case, the centre was appropriated to the schools, and the wings were fitted up as alms-houses; an arrangement which at once rendered Lady Madelaine popular throughout the parish. The respectable inhabitants got up an address of thanks, which was presented by Dr. James; and the sensation was so new and so delightful, that for a time my mother was engrossed by this novel occupation; but, unfortunately, just as the walls began to show themselves above the ground, Rooksley suddenly became full of guests, and the thoughts of la dame Châtelaine suffered a serious revulsion.

The first arrivals were Sir Herbert and Lady Devereux, who had, as her ladyship expressed it, been stupifying at their place in Kent, until the happy moment when they should fly to Rooksley. She cast a surprised and rather chilling glance upon Miss Vernon, whom she found calmly employed at her embroidery-frame in my mother's morning-room; and, the necessary introduction over, threw herself upon a sofa near her hostess, and forthwith plunged into a stream of fashionable jargon totally unintelligible to the simple-minded Emily.

"And now, cara!" she continued, after a momentary pause, "how have you managed to exist so long alone in the country? You really deserve to be canonized! So idolized as you are in the world, your virtue must have been Spartan to bear you up. I am well aware that cosa nuova sempre piace, but this of yours was really an extreme case. What have you done! Where have you been? I am not cruel enough to taunt you by asking—whom have you seen? I suppose you have a parson in the parish. I believe there always is one where there is a church, and I saw yours on my way here—et après?"

"Après," was the reply; "there is our neighbor—our near neighbor, Mrs. Vernon—the mother of my young friend here;" (Lady Devereux) drew her eyebrows together, and again glanced at Emily) "her daughter and her son, who is now walking with Mr. Tilden:—then there are half a score of county families within twenty miles, with all of whom we have made a sort of acquaintance."

"Ah, yes—I perceive. Will you allow me to ring for my maid, and change my dress?"

"I will accompany you," said my mother, rising as she spoke. "I am quite sure that Miss Vernon will excuse me."

"Otterford will be here to dinner," observed Lady Devereux, as she lounged out of the room. "Sir Herbert wished him to accompany us; but he was not proof against a journey with Damon and Phillis; that is, after their loves had been rendered dull and legitimate by matrimony." And she disappeared, followed by my mother.

"And is this the chosen friend of Lady Madelaine Tilden?" murmured Emily Vernon to herself, as her eye followed their retiring figures. "Alas! alas! how unfavorable is the impression which she has made on me, beautiful as she is!"

CHAPTER IX.

The distaste which Miss Vernon instinctively felt towards Lady Devereux was returned with interest by Lord Otterford towards her brother. When they met, there was a mutual feeling of distrust and suspicion. The handsome person, insinuating manners, and romantic reputation of Mr. Vernon, had rendered him highly acceptable to my mother; while to my father, comparatively in a land of strangers, he had stood in the position of an old friend—a link between the past and the present. I have already hinted that he was a vain man; and I am bound in justice to add that he had become passionately attached to my mother, although she had never for a moment suspected that such was the case. His quiet but zealous attentions had flattered her vanity; his evident admiration had gratified her self-love; he had amused her idleness, and piqued her curiosity—but that was all.

Nor had Frederic Vernon any ulterior designs in his adoration of the beautiful wife of his friend. He loved her ardently, but he never looked beyond the moment. He was jealous of every hour that was spent out of her presence; happy under the influence of her smiles; proud of the confidence with which she honored him; and anxious to render himself necessary to her by every means in his power. Had he been suddenly deprived of her friendship, he would have felt it bitterly. It would have been to him a far more severe trial than his romantic separation from the Duchessa; but he never suffered himself to speculate upon such a contingency, and so lived on, au jour la journée, occupied only in devising new methods of giving pleasure to the bright object of his homage.

But, as Lord Otterford could only form his judgment of others from his experience of himself, and of his own motives and impulses, so he could not for a moment imagine such a state of things as this. He saw before him a man eminently handsome, evidently well-bred, and palpably established as l'ami de la maison. He watched him closely for five minutes, and thenceforward honored him with his hatred. Lord Otterford patronized no half measures.

Was it not enough that throughout his sojourn at Rooksley, he should have Mr. Tilden for ever in his path? Before the party separated for the night, he had vowed vengeance against this new intruder. But how to accomplish it? "An idle brain is the devil's workshop," says a quaint old proverb; and man seldom prepares the anvil, that his satanic majesty fails to provide the hammer!

From the period of Lady Devereux's advent at Rooksley, each day witnessed some new arrival, until the expected party was complete. The gentle Emily was nearly domesticated with her new friends, and became completely so, when important business suddenly and unexpectedly called Mrs. Vernon to town. After having duly escorted his mother on her journey, and seen her safely established in the house of her sister, Frederic returned in all haste to the Priory; for his local knowledge and his ready kindness had rendered him so indispensable to my father, that they saw each other daily, almost hourly. His moments of active usefulness were given to Mr. Tilden; while those of relaxation and feeling were all devoted to his wife.

Rooksley became the scene of perpetual dissipation and amusement. The game had been well preserved, and the prowess of the sportsmen was sufficiently murderous to merit mention in the county paper. Nor was the slaughter within doors inferior to that without. Bright eyes did as certain execution as patent fowling pieces; and the wet days and the long evenings were perhaps more full of peril to the said sportsmen than was their own aim to the partridges and pheasants. More than one of them ere long abandoned the sport altogether, beneath the influence of some more potent attraction. Among the first—the ladies called them "rationals," and the gentlemen "deserters"—was Lord Otterford, at whose special instigation the party had originally been made. The sportsman, par excellence, whose admirable tenue and skilful shot might have suggested the description of a witty poet of more recent times—

> "——Ne'er was such a brown and green
> In gaiters or in jacket seen.
> Indeed no partridge could do less
> Than tremble at the shooting-dress,
> In which, through all the livelong day,
> Fresh and untired, he blazed away,
> Scrambling through bush and briar to trace
> Haply, but half another brace;
> Till, near the house, one might remark
> From both his barrels, just at dark,
> Two short, smart pops—ill-omened sound,
> Echoed o'er many a turnip-ground,
> Where coveys fed, in fear and sorrow,
> Prophetic of their fate to-morrow."

His secession was, under the circumstances, matter of amazement to all parties. Sir Herbert Devereux, who lived only during the hunting and shooting seasons, and contrived unaccountably to exist, he never thoroughly understood how, for the rest of the year, was unsparing in his sarcasms and comments; all of which produced upon his friend much the same impression as pumice flung against a rock. Lord Otterford was decidedly a man of character.

Surrounded by a phalanx of her own friends, and thus secure from all undue neighborly familiarity, my mother issued continual invitations to the families who had left their names at Rooksley; while she held herself excused from all return visits by the guests whom she was compelled to entertain at home; and among those who never failed to obey her summons were Mrs. Alexander and her daughters. The lady herself had a passion for making new acquaintance. She was never happy save in a crowd. The elder Miss Alexander, tall, dressy, showy, and perfectly self-possessed, felt that, at eight and twenty, there was no time for her to throw away in solitude, if she ever contemplated an establishment; while poor Caroline was eager to find herself in a house in which she was but too well aware that Frederic Vernon spent two-thirds of his time.

To Lady O'Halloran, the great attraction of Rooksley was the table. She was at once gourmette and gourmande. During her lord's life they had kept open house in the county Kildare; a fact which had compelled her, as a widow, to close her doors. The family estate was, at this period, "at nurse" for her son; and, as she herself declared, "the lawyers proved very sorry dry-nurses indeed." Lady O'Halloran was universally popular; she was earnest in everything, and thoroughly good-natured; frank to a fault, accommodating, facile à vivre and of a temper proof against all trial. To my mother, she was, however, notwithstanding al. these social qualifications, displeasing in an imminent degree. To her, the earnest frankness and joyous good-humor of the Irish widow conveyed nothing but vulgarity and coarseness; but as she had no plausible pretext for declining her society, and as she was certain to find her in every visitable house in the neighborhood, she contented herself by expressing her disgust to her own immediate friends, and suffered her laughing ladyship to be included in every invitation which collected at Rooksley her particular intimates.

Since I have grown old, and have been compelled to make home-avocations, I have found a great resource in novel-reading. I have a few sententious associates, who tell me that such a pursuit is too trifling for my years; but I let them say on, and read not a volume the less. My retrospective vanity is flattered by the graceful fictions, which so often make power, wealth, and even virtue itself, bow down before the omnipotence of beauty. I love to identify myself with the bright-eyed heroine; to live over again, in her company, past experiences of triumph; and, although all this may, in point of fact, be trifling, it is only the more consistent, and worthily winds up the life of a pretty woman. Of art, doubtlessly I have had my share in my time: the only science which I ever understood was the science of pleasing; how then was I to gainsay in my old age the pursuits of my whole life?

My motive for this apparent digression is to remark that if, in the said works of fiction, it be admissible for the author, who has all the unities at his control, and who may take what liberties he pleases, both with times, places, and persons, to put ten or twenty years into a parenthesis, I may well be excused for arrogating to myself a similar liberty in writing my own veritable memoirs. All that I have yet placed upon record was, of course, in my case merely traditionary; but I felt it to be necessary that my readers should know my father and mother "in their habits as they lived, with the habits they'd acquired," before I introduced that more important personage—myself; and, as I was born within eighteen months after the marriage of my parents, all reasonable readers must at once concede that I have availed myself of my privilege with singular discretion. I shall therefore make no apology, my conscience being at peace.

It may be as well, however, to premise that, in the interval, the school-house was completed, and that its expanded wings afforded shelter to twenty aged paupers. The ceremony of the "opening" was a festival for the neighborhood; there were drums and fiddles, and beer and beef, for the poorer classes; and a procession, in which the children appeared in new uniforms, the old men in blue coats and gray worsted stockings, and the old women in brown gowns and scarlet cloaks. These having been duly installed in their pinnacled and picturesque domicile, the "gentry" were, in their turn, entertained at Rooksley, where a splendid ball succeeded a sumptuous dinner, and where many speeches were made, on the disappearance of the ladies, tending to impress upon my father the extent of his worth, and the many virtues of his wife; for which he, deeply impressed by the unexpected (!) honor done to Lady Madelaine and himself, returned thanks in a speech eulogistic of the friend who had made himself this "bright honor's monthpiece," and begged to propose the health of some one else then present, who did the same in his turn, until, at length, the whole company presented the spectacle of "a suit of ditto's;" after which, there remaining nothing of importance to detain them longer, they joined the guests, who were already rapidly filling the ball-room.

This was the great starting-point of my father's popularity in the county.

It is true that the Duke of Dorchester had not only given the land upon which the original school-house stood, but built the house itself; while his amiable daughters had clothed the children, and, as I have already shown, moreover made them the medium of far more extensive charities; but the duke had a very expensive family, and had been involved by his sons to an extent which compelled him to sell off a portion of his estates, and to retire into Italy with his daughters for a few years, in order to give him time to retrieve himself.

Now it was, perhaps, somewhat unreasonable in his Grace of Dorchester, when he disposed of Rooksley, to consider that he had done quite sufficient for the parish, in giving them the said land and house in perpetuity. He should have remembered that the parochial authorities had a claim upon him. He had built the school-house for his own gratification, and it had been a great amusement to the ladies of his family; and such was the opinion of the vestry, when an intimation was made to them at one of their meetings, that some repairs were needed to the building. They very naturally decided that, had not the Duke of Dorchester thought proper, at his own instigation, and on his own authority, to build the said school-house, the parish would not have been burdened with its repairs: the children learnt very well previously in Margery Drake's cottage; and it was perfectly clear that if noblemen and gentlemen had a fancy for building schools, it was their duty to endow them, and to prevent their becoming a burden to the parish.

In short, the neat, plain, appropriate little tenement, which had been the admiration of the churchwardens and other local authorities, when it replaced the brick-paved kitchen in which the young ideas in —— had previously been taught to shoot, and for which profuse thanks had been lavished upon his grace on its erection, was no sooner discovered to need some trifling reparation, than it was decided to be "a burden on the parish;" and as, under such circumstances, the conscientious members of the "select vestry" would have considered it a dereliction of principle to apply the parochial funds, where it was so clear and self-evident that the Duke of Dorchester was the responsible person, it was unanimously agreed that an official letter should be written to his grace, representing the state of the building; and suggesting, at the same time, that as the number of scholars had greatly increased of late, some additional forms and desks would be very acceptable. This luminous idea was at once acted upon; but the letter superscribed "Imme date," in order that their noble correspondent might not keep them in unnecessary suspense by attending to any irrelevant personal affairs before he replied to it, never received any answer, having been forwarded to Florence from the duke's town-house, and lost on the way.

My mother, at the suggestion of Emily Vernon, took the affair into her own hands, at the most fortunate moment in the world. The slight dilapidations, which, had they been immediately attended to, might have been effectually checked, had increased greatly during the progress of a long and wet winter. The relatives of the children, anxious to preserve them as long as possible from the weather, had patched and pieced the roof during a stray leisure hour, but the great evil remained unremedied; and, as I have already stated, my mother, in the first burst of her philanthropy, found herself compelled to hire a cottage even for the temporary accommodation of her little protégées, before the great work of building the new edifice commenced.

Nothing could have been better timed. The intention alone afforded conversation to the whole neighborhood; and, when half a score of carpenters and masons, who had been for some weeks out of employ, found themselves once more in full work, and that the result of their labors began to show itself above ground, the county-paper spread the news far and wide. Paragraphs, headed, "PRINCELY LIBERALITY!" "GENEROUS MUNIFICENCE!" and "NOBLE EXAMPLE TO LANDED PROPRIETORS!" appeared in weekly succession. The festival of the "opening" settled the business. Not a man got drunk upon my father's strong ale that day, who ever remembered such a gentleman, or who had ever seen such a lady. And when, in the midst of all this excitement, it was ascertained that my father had purchased some extensive farms in the neighborhood, every individual present was ready, glass in hand, to work upon them for nothing; an arrangement which would, no doubt, have proved extremely economical, had it ever been acted upon.

Most political reader! do you not discover the embryo M. P. under all this popularity, and all this acquisition of land? Of course, you do. Will it be objected that my father was new in the county, and that there were old ties and old sympathies still existing, and still dear to true hearts and fast memories? Pooh, pooh! the Marquis of Portintown, the duke's elder son, had, it is true, represented the county during three sessions; but his noble father was no longer a resident; and it had been evident, even at the last election, that the marquis did not "bleed" so freely as formerly; and as to the letter which he wrote on the dissolution of parliament, stating his perfect reliance on the stedfastness, good-faith, and old attachment of the "worthy and independent electors of ——," it was, of course, "nothing but proper, and what they had a right to expect, seeing what they had done for him;" but, unfortunately, straightforward, manly letters, even written by the sons of dukes, will not suffice to pay bills, or to supply "unlimited refreshments" at the Angel or the George—and my father was known to be very rich.

The Marquis of Portintown was a superb young man, whose aristocracy was written on his brow; and he was, moreover, affable, and polite, and considerate. The women were, one and all, in his favor; but my father had a handsome wife; and, although the ladies might have the voices, their husbands had the votes.

And thus it occurred that my birth took place on the close of a contested election, during which money, and heavy dinners, and still heavier speeches had been at a discount, although "bribery and corruption" had been scrupulously eschewed. A few small landholders got their farms that year for a peppercorn rent. The times were hard, and my father's agent was a man of intense feeling. There was an immense display of new gowns and showy ribbons at church for the next month. My mother was a philanthropist, and liked to see happy faces about her. The circumstances of certain families changed in a sudden and extraordinary manner; but who requires to be reminded of the unaccountable mutations of fortune? The school-children, wearing the Tilden colors, paraded the streets with banners, and created a general feeling of generous enthusiasm; for, when they appeared, they not only reminded the local authorities of what the new candidate had done, but of what the father of the old one had left undone, which was better still.

In short, my father's gold, his agent's tact, and my mother's beauty, carried the day. All the old ducal virtue, and liberality, and munificence were forgotten; but still, it must be said, in my father's praise, that so thoroughly satisfied was the marquis with the frank and manly bearing of his adversary in the struggle, that he consented, at the close of the election, to become a guest at Rooksley for a couple of days, while he arranged certain matters of local business; and where the family tradition declares that the bright eyes of my mother so thralled him, that he extended his visit to a week, and ultimately took his departure on the best possible terms with his successor in senatorial honors.

My birth followed closely upon his retreat. Extreme fatigue and excitement had overtasked the strength of my mother; and the establishment was still sens dessus dessous, when I appeared to claim some share of the public attention.

CHAPTER X.

My first tangible memory attaches itself to a frock of white muslin, looped on the shoulders with strings of jet. I was supposed to be in mourning for my maternal grandfather, the Right Honorable Alexander Duncan, Earl of Glenfillan. My name was Eveleen, and I was the pet and plaything of a party of ladies, who passed me from one lap to another, and from one pair of white arms to a second quite as handsome, under the light of a superb chandelier. I believe that this was my début in polished society, and that I was indebted for my early honors to Lord Otterford; who, having met me by accident in one of the galleries, when returning from a walk in the park with my nurse, was so enchanted with my likeness to my mother, that he petitioned for my immediate presentation in the drawing-room.

I have said that this was my first tangible memory, but I had many others, misty, indistinct, dreamlike, yet nevertheless far more delightful. Memories of tender endearments lavished on me by day and night, amid my nursery sports, and over my little bed. The endearments of a fond father, bestowed, in all their tender profusion, upon his first-born. And yet, surely I must have been a breathing disappointment to that fond father, who had doubtlessly sighed for a son and heir, an inheritor of his name; which, however insignificant it might have appeared to my mother, her friend Lady Devereux, and id genus omne, was without doubt a matter of interest to himself. If such indeed I were, however, it was a fact which I never learned. The apparition of my father was to me the signal for a scream of joy; his presence always brought delight; but it was not until I grew to girlhood, and was compelled to feel its loss, that I learnt to appreciate his value, both as a father and a man.

The noise, the glare, and the novelty of the drawing-room delighted me. It is probable that, half unconsciously, I looked around for my good genius in this scene of enchantment; but, be that as it may, it is certain that my father was not there; while it so chanced that, satisfied with feeling that my nurse was near me, I exhibited no fear, I uttered no cry; and thus I was transferred from each to each, receiving from every one in turn a word of delighted commendation.

"What an angel!" exclaimed one. "What a lovely creature!" said another. "What a perfect image of Lady Madelaine!" apostrophized a third. "What a miniature of perfection!" expatiated a fourth; and then I was rekissed, rehugged, and dismissed to the unknown regions in which the nurseries were situated.

This opening scene of my little drama of existence is the more forcibly impressed upon my mind, from the unpleasant effect of the transition which immediately supervened. The head-nurse, on arriving in her own dominions, forthwith gave me over to the tender mercies of a deputy, while she doffed her best cap and collar, exclaiming loudly against the new caprice which had at once broken up her evening nap, and delayed her tea-drinking.

The voice of murmuring and complaint, coming so directly after the pleasant whisperings of adulation and endearment, produced an uncomfortable contrast, to which, young as I was, I was nevertheless fully susceptible; and accordingly, while Mrs. Harris retired to her private apartment to deposit her finery, I commenced a feu de joie of screams and lisping entreaties to be carried back to the beautiful ladies. I might as well have asked for the moon. I was first soothed, and then threatened, and then shook, until my feeble breath came gaspingly from my little heart, and ultimately put into the corner, with a chair before me to prevent my escape, and left to sob as I pleased, while my guardian resumed her novel. This was, however, hurriedly restored to her pocket, and myself once more caught up in her arms on the reappearance of her principal.

Of course a renewal of shrieks broke up the quiet of the nursery, and the "miniature perfection" of the drawing-room was suddenly transferred into the "brat" of the north wing, in which the apartments of myself and my dependents were situated.

But the ice was broken. My vain and beautiful mother was, it appeared, herself struck by my infantile loveliness, to which she had previously paid no attention; the reflected compliments induced by my appearance were pleasing from their novelty; and the caresses which I lavished upon her were an agreeable variety in her daily existence. Thenceforward I became her frequent companion. My childish attractions were enhanced by all the auxiliaries of dress. I was one of the "lions" of Rooksley: while to its mistress I was a new toy, an animated plaything.

Alas! I was destined to outgrow this character; nor was such an amusement suited long to satisfy the tastes of a young and fashionable woman, surrounded by flatterers, greedy of pleasure, and devoted to dissipation.

Abandoned, as a matter of course under such circumstances, to the care of hirelings during three-fourths of the day, I imbibed instinctively and unconsciously the germ of the many defects which my after-life so sadly developed. Nor did the violent transition from the high-breeding and luxury of my mother's circle to the sordid and interested tactics of the nursery tend to improve my natural disposition. I came, with my mother's kiss still warm upon my cheek, into my own apartments, to hear the dress, the temper, and, above all, the liberality of her guests freely canvassed. I was so very a child, that all was discussed unhesitatingly before me; and although I understood much of what I heard, it was probably fortunate for me that my perception was not more extensive; for the morals of my mother's intimates met, at times, with quite as little quarter as their manners.

The first lesson which I learnt, and it was by no means inculcated with gentleness, was the necessity of utter silence upon all that occurred in the nursery: I was neither to repeat what I heard there, nor to mention who were its visitors. No wonder that, when I began to be conscious that I understood a great deal which I was not supposed to hear, far less to comprehend, I should instinctively keep this secret as well as the other. I saw much, in caricature, in my own apartments, which I witnessed in high comedy in the saloon of my mother. If Lord Otterford or Frederic Vernon kissed the hand of Lady Madelaine, so did my father's "gentleman" kiss the cheek of Mrs. Harris. There were the same coquetries, the same grimaces, the same interchange of unmeaning follies; the only difference existed in the fact, that, in one instance, the canvas was touched by the pencil of a master, and in the other, daubed by the brush of a sign-painter.

At six years old I was provided with a French governess. She was a sister of Félicie, who had, like herself, been destined to the honors of the dressing-room, but who had not evinced sufficient talent to be intrusted with the toilet of a woman of rank, and who naturally could not condescend to serve a bourgeoise.

When my mother decided upon this appendage to my individual establishment, she named it, as a matter of course, to her attendant, who immediately, like an affectionate sister, recommended Mademoiselle Joséphine, who, as she assured her lady, "avait des talents extraordinaires pour l'éducation!" Such an assurance from such a quarter settled the affair at once; my mother merely stipulating that she must "look at" mademoiselle before she was definitively engaged; and as Félicie felt that nothing could be more reasonable, her extraordinarily talented sister, who was too dull to dress hair and "get up" point-lace, was immediately summoned; and being very pretty, very graceful, and remarkably well-dressed, was secured at once by Lady Madelaine at a high salary, to form my manners and direct my mind.

Her installation in her new dignities followed within a month; the day-nursery was duly promoted into a school-room; and Mrs. Harris, not with the best grace in the world, subsided into vice-president.

Soon after the arrival of Mademoiselle Joséphine we removed to Grosvenor Square. Parliament had assembled, and my father was at his post. It took two or three weeks to settle my mother comfortably for the season. Her arrangements were minute and complicated. During this period I saw but little of her. The rooms appropriated to myself and my preceptress were situated at the back of the house; and save that my father generally came into my sleeping chamber on tiptoe, on his return from St. Stephen's, to kiss me as I slept, and that I was informed of the circumstance on the morrow by my maid, I might well have believed myself to be forgotten.

Nevertheless, mademoiselle did not participate in my ennui. The transition from a home of penury, where she had been daily reproached with a want of common capacity, which threatened to make her a burden upon her family, to a situation of authority and trust in the mansion of Lady Madelaine Tilden, was of itself happiness; but when to this circumstance was superadded the control of a carriage which was called mine, and a liveried lackey, nicknamed in like manner, she was intoxicated with her good-fortune.

How I hated the everlasting Park, where we drove slowly to and fro, amid dust, and noise, and clatter! It used to make my head swim, and my eyes ache. It had, however, a far different effect upon my companion. She was too pretty to pass unobserved. Her identity was soon ascertained; and Miss Tilden's governess was, ere long, as well known to the horsemen as the Serpentine itself. But if the drives were thus distasteful to me, the walks were a hundredfold worse. I remembered the woods and glades of Rooksley, its glancing lights and shifting shadows, and contrasted them in sadness with the dreary and monotonous garden of the Square, and the unfamiliar and people-thronged avenues of Kensington Gardens. In time, however, I became reconciled to both, and thus the last touch of nature was removed from my heart.

My mother's personal arrangements once made, she turned her attention to myself, and masters of every description were forthwith provided for me. The exertions of mademoiselle had already commenced. It was decided that, short as had been the period of her dictatorship, I was undeniably improved—in appearance. I made a more graceful courtesy, had got rid of my shyness, and did not, by any unladylike demonstrations of energy, disturb the propriety of my dress.

Nothing could be better! Compliments were showered upon mademoiselle, and praises upon myself; after which we each made a lower and more elegant courtesy than before, and with drew to our ultima Thule.

Under the care of this invaluable preceptress I learnt to apply the apothegm which has since been (falsely) attributed to her distinguished countryman Prince Talleyrand, that "words were given to us to disguise our thoughts."—By the way, how frequently it occurs that the world fastens upon an acknowledged wit, a shrewd saying to which he has never given utterance! It would appear that individuals who occasionally stumble upon a good thing, of which they themselves do not perhaps appreciate the full merit, anxious that it should not be lost, terminate it with "as so and so said;" and in this manner, in order to save their saying, sacrifice themselves. Even so, I should imagine, was the really profound and diplomatic "saw" which I have just quoted fastened upon the modern Machiavel, who, nevertheless, disclaimed its parentage.

I learnt, also, to agree—at least in words—with every one upon every subject, and never to betray my own sentiments and opinions; to look upon everything through the medium of expediency; and to appreciate rank and riches beyond all other human attributes.

In this manner, and under this guidance, I alternated between Grosvenor Square and Rooksley, until I had reached eleven years of age. I had been told incidentally that I had a sister, who was born twelve months after myself, but I had never seen her. The reason for this extraordinary fact, as I afterwards ascertained, existed in the circumstance that her birth nearly cost the life of my mother, who continued for many months afterward a confirmed invalid; while, pour comble de malheur, the infant proved so sickly and so irreclaimably plain that Lady Madelaine could not endure its presence; and it was consequently, at the instigation of my father, sent down to Scotland under the charge of a trusty nurse, and placed in the care of Lady Flora Glenfillan.

I well remember that my first sensation on hearing I had a sister was one of intense delight. I longed to fold her in my arms, to clasp her to my heart. I felt the blood rush into my face, and the tears into my eyes. For a moment my whole being overflowed with love. But these highly-wrought feelings were soon repressed by Mademoiselle Joséphine; who, not being herself troubled with any particular sentiment toward her own sister, save one of intense jealousy, was at a loss to understand the meaning of my emotion; and who most effectually rebuked it by reminding me that had miladi considered this invisible sister as so great a blessing, she would not have been exiled from her paternal home; that I should be more reasonable if I gave myself the trouble to recollect that my fortune would be diminished one-half by the birth of this sister, whom I was prepared to love so ardently; and who, being both ugly and sickly, would, of course, be constantly envious of my beauty and grace.

No argument was ever more effective. I dried my tears, stilled the beating of my heart, and sat down to think! What subjects of reflection were these for a pure young mind! No marvel, trained as I had been, that the evil seed took root quickly; and that, at the close of the longest fit of musing in which I had ever indulged, I almost loved Mademoiselle Joséphine for the generous devotion to my interests, which made her so vehement against my unknown sister.

It was provoking that I, certain as I was of creating a sensation by my beauty, should be robbed of half my wealth by one so greatly my inferior. Mademoiselle was right. This unwished-for and unloved younger sister was better away. This was my conviction at eleven years of age; and as my mother had never in her life mentioned to me the existence of her second child, I had no difficulty in avoiding the subject.

Of my father I saw less than ever. As a public man he was popular and powerful, but at home he was a cipher. No voice had ever been raised against Lady Madelaine; no murmur low but deep had ever turned toward her the eye of suspicion or the finger of scorn; but my father was no less a wretched man. Fortunate indeed was it for him that ambition was the most powerful principle of his nature; for it enabled him to pass by without comment or expostulation those thousand small and minute indications of indifference and supercilious coldness which characterized the bearing of my mother. He felt that they were touched so lightly and so skilfully, that, taken individually, they would be almost imperceptible to a common observer, and that the world could have no sympathy with such sorrows. He therefore folded them closely in his heart; and, satisfied that the very egotism of my mother's nature was his best safeguard against dishonor, endeavored to forget, in the vortex of political excitement, that he had ever formed dearer visions of happiness.

Many who were acquainted with public men and public measures upwards of half a century ago, will have little trouble in deciding the identity of my father.

I have already said that I had attained my eleventh year. I had naturally quick talents, and great powers of observation; it was consequently not wonderful that my progress in all womanly accomplishments was rapid. My masters spoke of me in flattering terms; my mother's guests fondled and praised the "show-child" who relieved their high-bred weariness with her harp or with her voice; and forgot that the same instinct which awoke in me the power of combination and exertion in the one instance, was not likely to lie dormant where my own personal feelings were still more active and acute.

Young as I was, I required no prompter to point out to me that my mother lived only for admiration, and that among the most devoted of her slaves were Lord Otterford and Mr. Frederic Vernon; but I also discovered more than this. I saw that the sweet and dove-eyed Emily—she, whose caresses were to me the most welcome, and whose praises were the most judicious and well-timed—loved the selfish and cold-hearted nobleman who wore my mother's chains. How often did I long to clasp my arms about her neck, and tell her how, in my young spirit, I loathed—I knew not, nor cared not wherefore—that polished hypocrite! But I had studied in too false a school to give way to so natural and pure an impulse; and so I looked on, and marveled, and reasoned with myself, as children will do, upon the social phenomena that were taking place about me.

I was not then aware of the vow taken by Otterford on his first meeting with Frederic Vernon; or in the pale cheek and aching heart of the fair and innocent girl before me, I might have traced the operations of his vengeance.

How well do I remember a certain evening in August! The first dressing-bell had rung, and all the Rooksley guests had obeyed its summons. As I was, of course, excluded by my tender age from my mother's table, it conveyed no warning to me, and I consequently lingered in the drawing-room after it was deserted. For a time I amused myself among the costly toys which were scattered in all directions; but, as they were familiar to me, I soon wearied of an occupation so devoid of novelty; and being attracted by an unusually brilliant sunset, I sauntered into a smaller apartment formed in one of the turrets, and known as the octagon-room; a place of comparative retreat occasionally sought by those of the company to whom, from some passing cause, the movement and hilarity of the more public reception-room were for a moment distasteful. The large bayed window stood invitingly open, and I approached it, and leant out, watching the rich and changeful colors of the western sky, unconscious that I was screened from observation by the ample crimson curtain which was drawn partially across the recess.

How long I had been thus engaged I know not, when I was aware of voices in the adjoining apartment, and immediately afterward, of steps approaching the spot on which I stood. My first impulse was to discover myself, but a feeling of false shame—a fear of appearing to have overheard what had been already said—deterred me; and I drew still farther back behind the folds of the damask drapery. Perhaps, had another moment been left to me for decision, I might have obeyed the better prompting which had suggested my first thought, but the hesitation of an instant had rendered this impossible. My heart beat painfully. Accustomed as I had been to mean and unworthy theories, I had never yet reduced them to practice; and I consequently shrank like a coward from the bare semblance of a dishonesty which I had still nerve enough to execute.

The voices became more distinct—they were those of Miss Vernon and Lord Otterford. There was a tender persuasiveness in his tones, which struck me on the instant. I had heard him gay, and sententious, and sentimental, and even eloquent; but this was an inflection of his voice altogether new to me. They entered the room—they paused beside the window, just beyond the curtain, where the last beam of the rapidly descending sun sent a ray of brightness to the brow of Emily, and made her luxuriant hair glitter like threads of gold. She was hanging upon the arm of her companion, heavily, languidly, like one who rather sought than needed his support.

I was still a mere child, but I had already read her secret—she loved him!

What a rush of thought swept across my brain! I was bewildered. I had seen him look into my mother's eyes, as though he knew no other light. I had seen him bow to her slightest caprice, as though her will invested it with reason: and yet there could be no doubt that he loved my best friend, my gentle, indulgent Emily. I was lost in difficulty. Had I even doubted the latter fact, I should at once have had that doubt removed when he next spoke, and that I could distinguish his words.

"You are ungenerous, Emily," he said, in an accent of tender reproach; "you accord nothing to the difficulty of my position. Why will you thus persist in misinterpreting my every word and action?"

A deep and painful sigh was the only answer.

"Look dispassionately at my very delicate and peculiar position in this family, my sweet girl," resumed his lordship. "You are well aware that my cousin Lady Devereux is Lady Madelaine's chosen friend; that I have known her for years; and that, in short, like all spoiled beauties, she exacts unlimited devotion from her male acquaintance. See your own brother, for example! Has he eyes, ears, or senses, for any woman save our fair and haughty hostess? And yet, do you believe that if his heart were to speak in opposition to his fancy, his reason would not soon sever the idle links which bind him now? Fie! fie! You are a child, my dear one, and must be schooled into more sober judgment."

"But Frederic," faltered Miss Vernon, "never knew, never loved Lady Madelaine before her marriage; and I have heard—"

"What!" interposed her companion, impetuously; "that, in all probability, I did both. Why, this is still more idle! I did know this vain beauty in her first youth—in all the insolent glory of her opening loveliness; and yet you see that I have survived her union with Mr. Tilden. Think you that, had I willed she should be mine, she, with her haughty and imperious spirit, would have rejected me, to give her noble hand to a commoner! Surely you know her better."

"All this may be, my lord," was the reply; "and yet I feel degraded by the part which I am now playing. To me your suit can but bring honor, and surely to yourself it can convey no disgrace. I also am a commoner, the titleless daughter of a gentleman, but one of no mean race, and of no tarnished memory. I have done wrong, very wrong, in so long permitting you to talk to me on such a subject, without the knowledge of my mother. While you are present, I find a thousand excuses for my weakness; but when I am alone, my reflections are one long reproach."

"These refinements, Emily," said the wily voice of her lover, "are unworthy of you—of both of us. If you believe that there never existed a man insensible to the spells of this wedded Circe, then must I frankly tell you that you argue from your perfect ignorance of the world, and in the very wantonness of your own over-susceptible nature. Am I too bold if I ask more even-handed justice?"

"It may be as you say," replied Miss Vernon; "but as the Circe—since you see fit so to designate your friend and mine—is the wife of another, why should there exist a necessity for the mystery which you have flung over our mutual affection? The ambition of my own mother would have been satisfied with less. She asks for my husband only a gentleman, and a man of honor; and her principle is to me sacred. Do me justice, my lord; I am no love-sick girl. That I esteem you—that I—in short—I scarcely know what I meant to say; but of this be assured, that if, since the moment of enthusiasm which prompted you to tell me that you loved me, you have seen cause to regret the impulse; if, in calmer hours, you have thought it probable that a union with myself would not realize the hopes of your family—your own views in life—or the interests of your ambition, speak frankly. Be assured that, far from reproaching, I shall honor you, and reverence your truth. There are some things, my lord, which are often learned too late for all parties concerned."

There was an instant's pause. His habitually fluent lordship was evidently probed to the quick, but he soon rallied.

"I see—I see it all," he said, with a light and bitter laugh. "You are kind, you are generous, Miss Vernon, to open my eyes at once. It saves suspense—it spares the necessity of doubt. And now, perhaps, in this moment of overweening confidence, you will even intrust me with the whole secret, and tell me who is the happy man by whom I am so suddenly supplanted. Sir James Dornton is, as I am well aware, an Apollo in the eyes of your sex; and De Clifford is a millionaire. I must abide my fate."

"My lord," said Emily, haughtily, as she raised her drooping head, and withdrew her hand from his supporting arm, "you outrage me, and I have not deserved this insult. But I appeal to yourself—to your own ideas of justice and propriety—whether the silence which you have imposed upon me, on the most important measure of my whole life, is either womanly or correct? I would be respected as well as loved."

"You are both—on my soul, both!" exclaimed Lord Otterford, repossessing himself of the hand that she had withdrawn; "but, for the moment, all mention of our mutual attachment would be inexpedient in the highest degree. Can you not trust me? Have you, rigid moralist as you are, given your heart to a man in whose good faith you have no confidence? I will not—I dare not believe it. I ask only for time, and I ask it for my own sake, fondly hoping that I can urge no stronger plea."

"But surely to my mother—" murmured the soft and tremulous voice of the agitated girl.

"I have done," said his lordship, coldly, in his turn. "I have deceived myself, and have no desire to blame you in what has taken place. I have perhaps merited no better treatment."

The sound of low and suffocating sobs succeeded.

"Nay, nay; do not distress yourself, Miss Vernon," pursued Lord Otterford; "we will mutually forget and forgive. You will probably hear of me occasionally, and you shall have no reason to deprecate the period of our friendship—of our intimacy—of our—"

"I cannot bear this, my lord; indeed I cannot bear it," wept his victim. "Why will you so wilfully misunderstand me! Do not confound me with the heartless coquets of fashionable life. Remember that I have been educated in retirement—that I am unused to the world's ways—that I am but as a child in your hands."

"Only swear to me that you love me."

Again there was an instant of deep silence.

"Do you really love me, Emily?"

"Deeply—devotedly!"

The murmuring lips were silenced by a kiss. I heard it—I felt it—and I hated him thenceforward with a tenfold hatred.

"And you will trust me?"

"As my own soul."

And once more she hung upon his arm; her hand was clasped in his; and his breath trembled in her hair. They stood thus for several minutes, and then it was the voice of Emily which broke the stillness.

"Only promise me that you will be less engrossed by Lady Madelaine. I love her. She is my friend. I am ashamed of my own weakness; but when I see you devoting your every care, your every thought to her, I feel as though my heart would break."

I heard a sudden movement. I leaned forward. I saw Miss Vernon clasped to the heart of her lover. Her head rested on his shoulder; her lovely face was hidden in his breast; but it was only for a moment. By a sudden and determined action she liberated herself from his grasp, and I saw the tears stealing silently down her cheeks.

"You are answered, Emily," said Lord Otterford, as he stood tenderly beside her. "Is it possible that you—you, young, pure, innocent, and lovely, can be jealous of the meretricious attractions of a practiced woman of the world!—How little do you know our sex! How little are you able to appreciate the merits of your own! Should you indeed require the assurance that I more value the clasp of this small white hand than all the blandishments that can be lavished upon me by a Lady Madelaine Tilden."

"Yet, why, why do I feel so self-reproached."

"Because, dear girl, you love for the first time, and love is born of fear. See, now, how very a coward it can make of me! I shall not approach her splendid ladyship to-night, without the dread of seeing tears in the deep blue eyes which may be turned upon me."

"Not tears, my lord!"

"Yes, tears, my little lady. Traitorous tears, springing from want of faith where faith is due. Know you not that such faith will be your bounden duty, when—"

"Enough, enough," said his companion; and the tones of her voice were rich and mellow with happiness; "I will promise to be less weak."

"I must have a pledge."

"My honor," said Miss Vernon, almost gaily.

Lord Otterford laughed. The laugh grated unpleasantly upon my ear.

"Shylock, who was learned in bonds and mortgages, refused so untangible a deposit. I must have better security."

"My bracelet"—laughed Miss Vernon—in her turn, but in a different spirit, as she affected to unclasp the jewel from her arm.

"Your lips!" whispered her lover; and once more he pressed them to his own His peace was made.

Voices were heard in the next room. Twilight had fallen over the earth. The servants were busied in lighting the lamps; and, ere long, the dinner-bell rang out. The supposed solitude of the lovers was over; yet still they stood an instant side by side, and hand in hand. They spoke no more. There was no need of words.

A light laugh in the drawing-room heralded the reëntrance of Lady Devereux, and her cousin immediately sauntered forth to meet her, after one long, last look into the eyes of Emily. For a moment she believed herself alone. She stood where he had left her, motionless. Gradually, her head sank upon her bosom; and a deep sigh, drawn from the very depths of her spirit, fell sadly on the silence. After a time she rallied, but it was evidently by a violent and painful effort: a slight shiver passed over her graceful limbs; and then she hastily approached the window, and leaned out, as if greedy of the refreshing breeze which swept into the apartment.

Need I say that I shrank into the most remote corner of my retreat! I felt as though I should expire upon the spot. My brow burned; my heart beat almost to bursting; my clenched hands were rigid in their tension. I had heard my mother mocked at—made the theme of scorn and banter—branded as a Circe!—and, although I knew not then the precise meaning of the appellation, the tone in which it had been applied had left me little doubt that it was one which reflected slight honor upon her own.

And still Emily Vernon stood there, and I had no opportunity of escape. I thought that I was suddenly smitten with fever. I felt the curtain quiver with the trembling of my limbs. My tongue was parched, and I had set my teeth so hard, that I heard the laboring breath as it escaped from between them. But she heard nothing. She was alone in that still hour of darkness, with her love, and with her doubts. Ay, they were there still—hushed, but not annihilated; for she sighed, and at intervals swept from her cheeks the tears which had gathered there, and shuddered, as if some vision darker than the night had risen upon her spirit. Poor Emily! Even in the paroxysm of my rage I pitied her. There was a prophet whisper in her ear that told of ills to come!

When she at length withdrew her head from the window, smoothed her bright hair, and slowly prepared to leave the room, the sound of voices was loud in the next apartment. There was no other egress from the retreat that she had chosen; and accordingly, after shrinking back into the darkness more than once, she eventually disappeared; and then I threw myself upon a sofa, and wept bitterly.

CHAPTER XI.

HAD I been differently constituted, or had I been differently educated, I should probably at once have made my way to my mother's dressing-room, and, in the frank and overflowing confidence of girlhood, have told her all. No such idea, however, crossed my brain even for a moment. I had never been a child. I had sprung from the infant into the woman, as the hothouse flower is forced into premature blossom by unnatural warmth. The examples by which I was surrounded, the spirit in which I was tutored, the self-appreciation in which I was encouraged, all tended to the same point. I felt as if upon me, and me only, devolved the duty of revenging the affront offered to my parent.

The vengeance of a girl of eleven years of age appears absurd, and no doubt generally is so. I know one tall hoyden, of about that period of life, whose ideas of mischief to others were all concentrated in throwing stones at them; and laughable as this may seem, it is doubtlessly quite as rational as many other methods of revenge adopted by children of the same age; but such is not universally the case. All we adults and centenarians may rest assured that there are many instances of precocious thought as well as of precocious action; and we should be wise to remember that there is a small species of worm in existence, which has frequently destroyed a three-decker.

Had I been able to appreciate my father's real character, it is also probable that I might have unveiled to him the true moral qualities of my mother's favorite guest: but with the close of my infancy came also the cessation of that demonstrative paternal tenderness which had made the joy of my baby-life. I no sooner degenerated into the plaything of the drawing-room, differing only in stature from those about me; engrossed by the same vanities, encouraging the same selfishness, and eager after the same adulation, than my father seemed altogether to have forgotten my existence. He visited my little bed no more. When we accidentally met, he had always a kind word and a hasty kiss for me; but neither his voice nor his caress was what it had once been; and as occasionally, when more hurried than common, instead of pressing his lips to mine, he merely greeted me with, "Ha, Eveleen, is that you?" and patted me on the head without stopping, my dignity took offence, and I universally returned the salutation by, "Really, papa, you are too bad; you derange my hair in a shocking manner!"

My poor father! How, as I look back upon these things, I can now understand what closed his once loving heart against his home, making a cold and careless world the shrine at which he knelt, and that world's smile his idol.

Under all circumstances, it cannot, however, be matter of surprise that I confided not my secret to any one. In about half an hour, during which time coffee had been served in the drawing-room, and my retreat hau continued uninvaded, I contrived to overcome my agitation; and, creeping once more to the fatal window, I turned my hot brow and my aching eyes toward the sweet evening wind that was lifting the leaves of the trees and the buds of the flowers, and weaving a double web of perfume and melody over the bosom of nature. I had, however, at the moment, no such poetical association with the said wind. All I sought was that it should restore the freshness to my forehead and the brightness to my eyes. that it should, in short, be an efficient aid in my first grand essay in hypocrisy. And it was so; the fair, full cheek and the sparkling eye of early youth do not tell their tale of suffering like the worn features of after-years. The green and vigorous leaves of June, moistened though they may be by the thunder-shower, are restored to vigor and to beauty by the next gush of sunshine; but those which have outlived the summer months, are scattered by the raindrops, less heavy, perhaps, but more frequent, to which they are exposed.

Even so was it with me. Ten minutes after I had mastered my emotion, and sought in the sweet influences of nature for the relief I needed, I was once more perfectly presentable; and did not hesitate to join my mother's guests: but I reëntered not that luxurious drawing-room as I had left it. The best and purest moral remnant of my girlhood had been torn away. I hau learnt that even my own proud and beautiful mother had descended from her pedestal, and could be spoken of in other terms than those of adoration. Emily, too, the mild, the loving, the gentle Emily, whom hitherto I had considered faultless, she had also her secret sin—her cherished hypocrisy—her dangerous mystery. As for Otterford, words have no power to tell how bitterly, how utterly I loathed him.

As I passed into the saloon, I saw him, as I had seen him a hundred times before, lolling over the back of the large lounging-chair which was sacred to Lady Madelaine. The company were scattered in groups over the room; Lady Devereux and Frederic Vernon occupied the same Persian couch, and were almost lost among the yielding cushions. I had grown an age in experience within the last two hours; and the first-fruits of my awakened perceptions might have been discovered in the fixed and almost stern attention with which I observed these two friends of my mother. Lady Devereux was languidly, but not the less assiduously, endeavoring to appropriate the thoughts and glances of the handsome young man beside her. Her magnificent arm, half-veiled by rich black lace, lay, in all its rounded beauty, upon the pillow against which he leant. The ample folds of her black velvet dress were confined by a plain girdle, clasped with jewels, which drew the eye to the smallness of her waist, and the fulness of her beautifully-moulded neck. Her little feet were coquettishly grouped together upon a cushion, and were visible beneath the embroidered stockings even to the well-turned ancle. There was an arch smile playing about her lips, and a languid softness glistening in her eyes, which rendered her more beautiful than I had ever previously believed her to be.

As I advanced up the room, I saw that she was speaking playfully, almost tenderly, though I could not hear her words; but a single glance sufficed to show me that her companion little heeded their import. His look was riveted upon my mother; not fully and freely, but with all the caution of one who cares not that his secret should be read by idle eyes—and how full of misery was that look!

I followed its direction. The triumph of unstriving and undoubting vanity sat on my mother's brow, and flushed her cheek. Her eyes were closed, but the play of her rich lips, and the frequent motion of her small head, showed that she did not listen unheedingly to the low murmur that fell upon her ear. And Lord Otterford? He it was who was breathing those honeyed sounds; but, though he bent over Lady Madelaine, his gaze was turned elsewhere. Emily Vernon stood near the harp, which she had been engaged in tuning and at her side was Mr. De Clifford. To those who, unlike myself, were not in the secret of Miss Vernon's heart, she must have appeared all calmness and mental repose. The tears had been dried, the pulse had ceased its tumultuous throbbings, the flush had faded from the fevered brow; she was graceful, easy, and self-possessed. Her taper fingers wantoned among the chords of the instrument; her small foot pressed down the yielding pedals: and ultimately, at the close of a brilliant prelude, she shook back her long ringlets, and looked up with a smile in reply to a remark of De Clifford's, when her eye chancing to wander further, I saw her suddenly falter and turn pale; the smile fled from her lips, and the light from her countenance; while at the same moment Lord Otterford started from his position near my mother, and, passing rapidly beside her, I heard the word "Woman!" breathed bitterly from between his clenched teeth.

Here, then, was another coil of the reptile; for, in my present excited and suspicious state of feeling, I was at no loss to read, in the alarmed expression of De Clifford's face, as he marked the change which had so suddenly come over his fair companion, a more lively interest than mere friendship would have inspired. He loved her—but the serpent had already made its way into his Eden; his dream was nearly over.

Lady O'Halloran was asleep. Miss Alexander was endeavoring to draw the fashionable and fastidious Sir James Dornton into a flirtation; and her sister sat apart, beyond the more busy guests, with her eyes riveted on Frederic Vernon. Mrs. Alexander, all blonde and bracelets, was doing her utmost to appear interested in a political discussion which was going on between my father and Lord Cornbury, a brother member; while good old Dr. James, more sincere, and already outwearied by their prolixity, had settled himself comfortably in an ample fauteuil, and was half-way to the land of dreams.

How false, how hollow, and how tedious, everything appeared to me, child as I was! I felt saddened, disappointed, dissatisfied. I had indeed succeeded in subduing all trace of the violent emotion which I had lately undergone; but I soon discovered that I had by no means resumed my ordinary manner, from the expression of my father's eye, as, during a pause in his conversation, it chanced to turn upon me.

"You are unwell, Eveleen," he said, tenderly, as he approached and took my hand. "Your cheek is pale, my poor child; these hours and these habits are undermining your health. Would that I could see it otherwise!"

I felt a deep blush rise to my brow. "Indeed, I am well, quite well," I answered, hurriedly. "I have been annoyed—agitated—but it is all over now."

"And may a grave, middle-aged, old-fashioned individual, like myself," said Lord Cornbury, in a tone of quiet sarcasm, as he also approached and seated himself upon the sofa beside me, "venture to inquire what event can have occurred of sufficient importance to 'agitate' and 'annoy' the charming Miss Tilden, the embryo beauty, he precocious wit, and the envied heiress?"

It was the first time that I had ever been addressed in such an accent, and my indignation fully equaled my surprise; nor was it by any means diminished, when, on glancing towards my father, as though I looked to him to revenge the insult, I saw a quiet smile dancing in his eye, and playing about the corners of his mouth. I was petrified. I could not have spoken, had my earthly happiness depended on the exertion: but I felt my form dilate, and a frown of offended dignity gather upon my brow.

"What is the meaning of this, Eveleen?" asked my father, somewhat severely, after a moment's pause. "Did you not hear Lord Cornbury address you? and have you forgotten—quite!—" and he sighed as he spoke, "that you are yet a child, and should be grateful for the notice which is accorded to you?"

I hesitated for an instant, and then, turning calmly towards the astonished nobleman, I said, with all the composure I could command, "Since Lord Cornbury is obliging enough to take so evident an interest in my joys and sorrows, and since it is my father's wish that I should do so, I feel bound to inform him that I have been 'annoyed' to find falsehood where I looked for truth, and 'agitated' to discover hypocrisy where nothing but sincerity should have existed." And, as I ceased speaking, I rose from the sofa, courtesied ceremoniously to my father and his companion, and moved away.

"An extraordinary girl, that, Tilden, i'faith," I heard his lordship exclaim, as I crossed the floor. My father's reply I could not catch; and the rather that, as I approached Miss Alexander (who was just in the act of commencing a laborious sonata to Mr. De Clifford's flute accompaniment, evidently much to her own annoyance, and equally to the relief of Sir James Dornton, whose flirting vocabulary was fairly at its close, in so far as it regarded herself), I saw poor Emily, half-concealed behind the folds of an Indian screen, pale, listless, and drooping. Otterford, meanwhile, had resumed his station near my mother, and they were supposed to be deeply engaged in a game of chess.

It must not be imagined that, at so early an age, I was able to estimate, or even wise enough to glance at the probable results to my mother's reputation, of the heedless and reckless loose which she was thus giving to her vanity. My only and absorbing feeling was one of haughty indignation against the man who had dared to love another, while he professed to be her slave; nor can I deny that a considerable portion of this displeasure was reflected upon Emily herself. I knew nothing then of the tyranny of an awakened passion. I looked not beyond the visible homage which, from the moment of my dmission to my mother's circle, had been the immediate object of my ambition. I had believed it to be real and genuine—a spontaneous offering at the shrine of beauty—and I was by no means prepared to find that it was a mere pleasing delusion—a shadow upon the wall—a vapor! I had heard at least twenty times a day of my own loveliness; for, when it became the fashion in the saloon to enumerate all my childish attractions, I was forthwith the admired idol of the servants' hall. Not a footman passed me on my way from the nurseries to the drawing-room, who did not assume a countenance of wondering admiration as he stepped aside; not a female servant, from the housekeeper to the laundry-maid, who did not utter a whispered comment loud enough to meet my ear, and flattering enough to make my little heart beat more quickly; while my inestimable governess, as time went by, buckled on the armor of her ignorance in quiet, satisfied that with my beauty, and my six masters—(there were no professors then for young ladies!) I was quite independent of her teaching; and she was frank enough to tell me so.

The understanding was a comfortable one, as, being under no obligation to mademoiselle, even for doing her best, which I must have been, at least morally, had she made a stand against her own ignorance, and struggled to do her duty, I was thus enabled to despise her at my ease; which I accordingly did, at an age when I should not yet have been permitted to form an opinion of those about me.

Sycophants, paid and unpaid, how little do ye reflect upon the pernicious consequences of your time-serving and degrading condescension, especially upon the minds of the young!

Years have passed—long, and weary, and eventful years, since the evening which I am now endeavoring to describe; since that first awakening of doubt, and suspicion, and hatred, in my girlish heart; and yet is all as distinct and fresh about me, even as when the moments were speeding by. It was a dark lesson, which I was never to unlearn. It taught me to muse, to reason, and to combine upon subjects ill-fitted to my age. It laid a false foundation for my after-life.

I roused Miss Vernon from her reverie. At first my conversation was evidently irksome to her; but, as she strove against her preoccupation, it became a palpable relief. I watched her narrowly. At times she sighed, even when we were speaking on the most indifferent subjects; and at others her eyes wandered to the chess-table, and she answered, as if unconsciously and quite irrelevantly, to my questions. Had she loved any other than Lord Otterford, I could have wept over her!

I once read a quaint German story, in which the secret marriage of a wealthy young widow, whose fortune was to be forfeited in the event of her disposing of her hand a second time, was betrayed to the watchful eyes of the heirs-at-law, by the fact of her dropping her fan in society, while in conversation with her new husband, and picking it up herself without his interference. I was then ignorant of the tale; but assuredly, judging from such premises, my mother was as free as air. Her slightest gesture was sufficient. One would have thought that Otterford could read her heart, and that speech was, in her case, supererogatory.

Six weeks afterward my mother returned to Grosvenor Square for the season; and for the first time I was left at Rooksley, under the very satisfactory and efficient charge of Mademoiselle Joséphine. My pride was wounded: I had begun to believe that I was necessary to the happiness of Lady Madelaine. It was a natural mistake. In her drawing-room in the country I was an attractive ornament. I created conversation, and I afforded to the guests in the house numerous and happy opportunities of flattering my mother, both directly and inferentially. I was a miniature representative of the prevailing fashion, however outrée; thus proving to the initiated that if the beautiful wife of Mr. Tilden clung to the graceful and the becoming, it was purely from taste, and not from lack of acquaintance with the reigning mode. My flippancy had been elevated into wit; and as children are naturally fearless, I had more than once spoken with a point well calculated to amuse all, save those who were the sufferers; while my whole education had been conducted on a system of surface and display, which made me a welcome plaything to the idle and the unthinking.

Religion I had none. Mademoiselle tried the village church, and the preaching of good Dr. James, on one solitary occasion, and then pleaded her conscience as an excuse for absenting herself thenceforward. I had occasionally accompanied my mother and her party; but as the family pew was closely curtained round with heavy damask, and I sat on a cushion beside the fire, amusing myself with the richly-illustrated prayer-books, and catching fragments of their conversation, which out of respect for the place was carried on in soft whispers, and thereby only rendered the more attractive, I seldom heard more than the responses, and the extremely inharmonious singing of the children of Lady Madelaine's schools, which, even at that early age, used to set my teeth on edge.

My notions of religion were consequently of a very vague and unformed description. When, as I sometimes saw my mother and her guests preparing to attend the morning service with undisguised and even acknowledged reluctance, I ventured to inquire for what reason she submitted to an annoyance which it was in her power to avoid, she answered me very sententiously that she went to church "for the sake of example"—that "it was necessary that the lower orders should see persons of station uphold the clergy, or they might presume to absent themselves in their turn, which was a thing not to be thought of." She did not explain for what reason, nor did I inquire, for she was evidently weary of the subject; while I, on my side, felt no particular interest in its continuance. I was accordingly quite satisfied from that time forth, whenever I swelled the train of my mother on this septenary duty, that I was setting an example to the "lower orders," and was consequently a person of considerable importance both to Dr. James and his parish.

Such was I, in body and mind, at the close of my eleventh year. My entrance into the twelfth was unwitnessed by any save my own attendants; for, as I have already stated, I was left at Rooksley on the next departure of the family for town.

I pouted for eight-and-forty hours after their departure. My father had kissed me hurriedly, and put five guineas into my hand, as he stepped into his chariot. My mother had pressed her lips to my brow, and then turned away to desire mademoiselle not to suffer me to spoil my complexion over the fire. Lady Devereux had saluted me with an injunction not to grow any taller, lest in a year or two I should oblige Lady Madelaine to shut me up, and keep me out of sight; while the gentlemen were all so much occupied in final arrangements about their dogs, their horses, and their guns, that they overlooked my existence altogether.

Emily Vernon was the only individual of the party who embraced me with effusion and evident regret. She was to be Lady Madelaine's traveling companion to town, and then to join her mother in Curzon Street. What a long, sad, wistful gaze she turned upon all the familiar objects from which she was about to separate! She visited the octagon-room more than once: it had, doubtless, been the locality of many similar scenes to that which I had witnessed; and in what had they terminated so far? Even I could read the riddle on her pure young brow—in uncertainty and doubt, in anxiety and heart-sickness. Poor Emily! and amid all her sorrow, she was the only one who thought of me.

My heart swelled with resentment as I saw the party disappear; and I retreated to my room, fully resolved to tax the patience of Mademoiselle Joséphine to the utmost, by the manifestations of my virtuous indignation. But, alas! I had no opportunity of so doing, for during two hours no mademoiselle made her appearance. I was totally abandoned. This was, indeed, a new phase of my existence! Had not the little French clock upon my mantlepiece convinced me that my solitude had endured no longer than the said hundred and twenty minutes, I should have computed it at a day, so sad, and weary, and desolate did it appear. I rang the bell. It was answered by my own footman; and even he, as he opened the door, was evidently working himself into his coat, as though he had drawn it on hurriedly. I inquired for mademoiselle. She was just then particularly engaged with the housekeeper. Did I want anything? I replied that I did not think proper to be left any longer alone; and I was met by the remark that my harp-master would be with me in less than twenty minutes; at the close of which obliging and pleasant piece of information the man hastily withdrew, before I could make any rejoinder.

This was the commencement of my new mode of existence; and such, with very slight variations, it continued. The visits of my several tutors broke in, agreeably rather than the reverse, upon the daily monotony; and, moreover, a sudden fancy for carriage-exercise seized upon my preceptress. It is true that, eschewing all the romantic cross-roads which had hitherto been familiar to us, we no longer drove in any other direction than to the post-town, where mademoiselle lounged from one shop to the other, making purchases of the most heterogeneous description, and collecting all the gossip of the neighborhood.

To me, young as I was, these hitherto forbidden excursions were disagreeable to an extreme degree. I had never forgotten the malicious inuendos and withering witticisms which formed the staple conversation of my nursery; and, since I had become habituated to the polished elegance and epigrammatic wit of my mother's circle, the female cackle to which I was occasionally condemned in my own apartments was absolutely abhorrent. It may well be supposed, therefore, that I in no wise interfered with the new vocation of Mademoiselle Joséphine; and it was while she was collecting her "shreds and patches" for the edification of the housekeeper's room, that I first imbibed that love of books, to which I am indebted for some of the happiest hours in my stormy existence.

It will be readily understood that I had not been idle during the fortnight which intervened between the eventful evening last described and the departure of the family for town. I had closely watched the chief actors in the "Comedy of Errors," represented at Rooksley. The more narrowly I observed my mother, the more plainly I discovered that her vanity was a shrine, before which she required that a lamp should be constantly burning; but that her affections were quite independent of her self-esteem. Now as there existed nothing upon earth half so attractive in my eyes as my mother, and as children ever seek to imitate those whom they admire, so my scrutiny only made me the more stedfastly resolve to emulate the Lady Madelaine in all things. That I resembled her in person had been so endlessly repeated in my presence, that I was already aware of my natural advantages. Merely to be the object of general comment and admiration did not, however, satisfy me; I felt that there was a marked and unpleasant distinction between the homage paid to my mother, and the caresses lavished upon myself; and for some time, as I pondered over this fact in my enforced solitude, I was unable to comprehend it.

For a while my vanity had been gratified by the flatteries and blandishments poured out upon me; but, the feeling once awakened, that I was not worshiped like my mother, thenceforward rendered the triumph incomplete; and my pride was wounded as I remembered that, while I had merely been the pet and plaything of the idle and thoughtless, Lady Madelaine was an object of deep and exclusive devotion; making the happiness of one worshiper, and the misery of another. Why was this?

I was on the threshold of my twelfth year. I had been the almost constant companion of a young, giddy, flirting, and ignorant French governess since I emerged from the nursery, the remainder of my life having been spent in the society of my mother and her friends. Is it then matter of surprise that I soon discovered the solution of the enigma? "My mother is loved!" I whispered to myself; "and I—they look upon me still as a child, but this will not last forever. Emily Vernon is younger than Lady Madelaine, and yet Lord Otterford loves her—ay, and better than he loves my mother; for did he not, to make Miss Vernon smile, call her a Circe! I will know what he meant."

I seized my dictionary, but I sought in vain. I was in despair; when, as a forlorn hope, I appealed to mademoiselle. "Circé, Circé! mais certainement," said she, as a sudden recollection came upon her, "Circé, c'est une déesse. I remember an old schoolfellow of mine, qui fit un très beau mariage. She became a modiste fort distinguée, Rue Richelieu, and her enseigne was A LA CIRCE. C'était une tête charmante, et admirablement coiffée."

This hint sufficed. My mythology completed the information. Mine was not the age of deduction, inference, or analysis; and I accordingly laid aside the volume, murmuring to myself, "and I too will be a Circe!"

I wearied in a week or two of my school-room volumes. I had many hours of solitude at home, many in the carriage; and, as Mademoiselle Joséphine and I appeared, as I have before remarked, to have entered into a tacit agreement to interfere as little as possible with each other, she made no comment when she saw me surrounded by books withdrawn from my mother's library. It were needless to do more than to observe that they were invariably novels and romances; and that, through their medium, I soon began to comprehend more perfectly both my own position and that of my mother.

I remember that I threw aside Sir Charles Grandison in disgust. It appeared to me cold, formal, and tedious. I had no taste for the tender passion treated mathematically; and I found many other works upon the same shelves which revenged me upon his monotony. From my first admittance to the drawing-room, I had heard the subject of love constantly discussed—my presence was unheeded; children are commonly overlooked at such moments; and yet upon children nothing is lost. Several arguments and opinions, of which I had thus become an auditor, remained impressed upon my memory; and now, when I began to reason and to reflect, they returned vividly to my recollection.

The example of my mother imprinted them on my heart.

CHAPTER XII.

UNHAPPILY for myself, I was abandoned to this existence of perverted taste and unwholesome occupation for upward of a long, weary year. At the close of the season, Lady Devereux, whose beauty was on the wane, and whose coquetry became only the more exacting in consequence, persuaded my mother to travel. My father's approbation was requested as a matter of form, and yielded as listlessly as it was asked. He could always establish a genial home at his club; and he had, moreover, the good sense to feel that what must ultimately be conceded was better unopposed.

To Paris, accordingly, the party proceeded; consisting of my mother, and her friend Lady Devereux, Sir Herbert, Lord Otterford, Frederic Vernon, and his sister. Thence they progressed to Rome, and ultimately to Sicily; returning to winter in Paris, where the elegance and beauty of Lady Madelaine created an intense sensation at the French court. The pure, pale loveliness of Miss Vernon also produced its effect, but her health was undermined—that precious health, to produce whose restoration her anxious mother had alone been prevailed upon to permit her absence; and her spirits were strangely depressed.

Nevertheless, as they traveled en grands seigneurs, and met with neither obstacle nor accident, the twelve months passed rapidly away; and the ladies returned to London for the season, renovated in health and refulgent in fashion.

I had meanwhile, ere their reappearance at Rooksley, entered my fourteenth year.

I have often since, after experiencing in myself the chances and changes of the world, looked back in wonder at the tenacity with which my mother's coterie held together. It is extremely probable that, were I aware of the personal motives and interests which conduced to this result, it might be no longer matter of marvel; but, with no other guide than my own bitter recollections, it is still to me a subject of unceasing wonder. True it is, that it was composed of individuals whose worldly position placed them beyond the hazard of requiring deep sympathy or serious assistance the one from the other. They were all butterflies, sporting in the sunshine of fortune. There was more matter than mind in the bond which held them together; and I have lived too long to place any reliance on the soi-disant friendship, which is alimented by the popularity or the worldly qualities of its object. Let one party be exposed to the pressure of circumstances; let health fail; let necessities sicken the heart and depress the energies; and, on the other side, let modish fools lisp lightly of a tie which they are unable to comprehend; let new pursuits, new flatterers, and new prospects supervene, and what becomes of the sick, the sad, the suffering absentee? There is still verbal pity—there is still lip-deep regret—where all good feeling is not utterly annihilated; but there is also more than this. There is a want, there is a necessity, for the favorite of fortune, first to conceal, and ere long to throw off these inconvenient feelings. The race of pleasure must be run; the path must be made easy, and the journey light; the shadow of another's sufferings breaks the comfortable and self-caressing progress of the better dowried child of chance; and it is accordingly swept aside, or passed by unheeded. Little think or reck they whose chariots press forward in the race, of the over burdened hearts which they assist to break!

But, pshaw! Complaint is not my purpose. I know the world. The lesson is, perchance, difficult to learn; but, once well conned, it is one which is never forgotten; and, after all, philosophy teaches us that we were born to trial; while a better faith points to a still more valuable truth.

And now, let me revert to myself as I was.

A year and a half of desultory, and in many cases of pernicious reading; of partial solitude, broken only by still more ill-boding companionship, at a period of life when the mind works out its self-development, and searches eagerly for subjects of interest and excitement; coupled with a disposition naturally precocious and observant, had done its silent, but no less certain work upon me, mentally and morally; now had it failed to produce also its physical effect. I needed no prompter to whisper this. The looking-glass at which, on the departure of my mother, I could only satisfy myself of the propriety of my head-dress, now reflected my whole face; nor was I, by any means, inclined to quarrel with the reflection. One of my favorite amusements was to compare my features with those of a magnificent full-length portrait of my mother, which was suspended above the mantle of the library; and I was perfectly satisfied with the results of my scrutiny; while my heart bounded, as I remembered (thanks to Lady Madelaine's book shelves!) that my triumph was but beginning, while hers would be, ere long, upon the wane! Still I was conscious that there was a charm, a spell, about my mother, wanting to my unformed and neglected girlhood; and as I had treasured her looks, and tones, and caprices in my memory, I forthwith began to practice them, to the great annoyance of Mademoiselle Joséphine and my maid. I was unable to appreciate her better qualities, and therefore they escaped me; while I clung to her defects, with a tenacity which soon made them perfectly my own.

The next step was one which may appear exaggerated and unnatural. Let those who so esteem it reflect ere they affect to doubt; for they can know little of a woman's nature. It is a common assertion that events have been preordained—I had been prēēducated, in that most uncertain of all mysteries, the intricacies of the heart. And therefore—my next step was jealousy of the homage which my mother had hitherto engrossed. I had been often told of my beauty, of my grace, of my attractions, but it was in another tone. The child had been petted and pampered as a child; but the vanity of the girl could no longer be satisfied with such questionable worship.

When I made my first appearance in the drawing-room, on the evening of my mother's return to Rooksley—for she had not previously found a leisure moment in which to receive me—I remarked that a look of vague wonder followed my steps as I crossed the floor; but, as I felt that my appearance was unexceptionable, I consequently interpreted the sensation which I had created in a way well suited to gratify my vanity; although it received a very severe shock in the extreme coldness of my mother's recognition. She looked for a moment as though she really doubted my identity; and then a slight flush spread over her brow, and she turned her head aside, as if anxious to shut out an object that was disagreeable.

Resolved to follow up the effect which I had produced upon her circle, I had no sooner made the circuit of the room, and exchanged greetings with the guests, than I seated myself unbidden at the harp; and as this had been my favorite study, impelled as I was to exertion by a knowledge of the admiration which Lady Madelaine had always commanded when performing upon that showy and graceful instrument, my proficiency was, as I have reason to believe, something extraordinary; while it is probable that its effect was enhanced by the listless and unsettled mood of my hearers, who had not yet recovered the dissipations and exactions of London life.

Be that as it may, however, it is certain that exclamations of wonder and delight resounded on all sides; and that I engrossed, for full five minutes, the entire attention of the company. My father was not present. He was attending his parliamentary duties. It was well that I enjoyed my triumph freely and fully, for it was not destined to be soon repeated.

On the morrow, during the progress of my mother's toilet, Mademoiselle Joséphine was summoned to her dressing-room, to make a report of my mental and moral progress; and ten minutes afterward I was myself bidden to the conference.

Assuredly, Lady Madelaine was very beautiful; and on this particular occasion I was more than ever impressed by the fact. She was seated in a large lounging-chair, her fine hair falling in masses over her shoulders, her graceful figure loosely draped by the soft folds of a wrapping-gown of pale blue cashmere; and the extremities of her small feet thrust into a pair of crimson velvet slippers, edged with swansdown. Immediately opposite, and reflecting the whole of her person, stood a cheval glass of immense proportions, set into a frame of or-molu; upon which, after her first brief salutation on my entrance, the eyes of my mother were riveted with great complacency.

"What is this, Miss Tilden, that I hear of you?" she exclaimed, with a harshness of which, had I ever reflected upon the subject, I should have considered her incapable; "mademoiselle informs me that your vanity is so great, and so troublesome, that your maid has repeatedly complained of late both of your caprice and of your violence."

"Indeed!" I replied, with all the composure that I could assume; "I was not aware that mademoiselle considered it as a part of her duty to enter into the details of our late proceedings; but, since such is the case, I may probably, on my side, be enabled to afford your ladyship some interesting information."

My mother was evidently petrified at my audacity, while the frown and the blush which simultaneously spread over the brow and cheeks of the conscious Frenchwoman turned her complexion purple. I kept my eye steadily fixed upon her; she knew that she was in my power; and I never, thereafter, suffered her to overlook the fact.

"What is the meaning of this, Eveleen?" asked my mother, after a momentary silence.

"Much, or nothing, as Mademoiselle Joséphine may consider best," I answered, quietly.

"If you expect, Miss Tilden," pursued Lady Madelaine, evidently highly provoked, but endeavoring to conceal her annoyance, "that I shall consent to waste my time upon your criminations and recriminations, I beg you at once to undeceive yourself. Thus much, however, I feel it my duty to remark—that, had mademoiselle acted fearlessly and energetically, and as I had every right, from the recommendations upon which she was received into this family, to hope that she would have done—these complaints against my daughter never could have occurred."

No wonder that Félicie tossed her little head, and snuffed the air with an expression of virtuous indignation and outraged dignity, when she remembered that it was by her own unassisted cleverness that "cette bête de Joséphine" had been so pleasantly established.

"Vanity!" continued Lady Madelaine in a tone of contemptuous mockery, which, looking upon her at that moment, was quite an epigram; "can there be a more despicable, a more unworthy vice! Félicie, I am really weary of telling you that I will not have my ringlets so massed together! Scatter them, in order that the lines of the forehead may be traced in profile; and do not let me have to remind you of this again.—Then I have been compelled to hear of your violence, Miss Tilden. Upon my word! Your education has progressed in less than two years, since you have learned within that period to strike your maid."

I own that I did now feel considerably ashamed. The rebuke which I had just received for my vanity rather amused than disconcerted me. My mother was off her guard; she forgot that I was two years older in time since we parted, and she had yet to learn that I was ten years older in knowledge of the world, or rather in that shrewd and active observation by which it is the most easily attained. The second charge brought against me was less easily excused to my own heart. I was as proud as Lady Madelaine herself; and when my transgression was thus abruptly laid before me, there was a coarseness about it by which I was revolted.

Well had it been had my mother dismissed me at that moment, while a wholesome feeling of compunction planted a burning flush upon my cheek—well, alike for the respect which I owed to her, and for the effect produced upon my own character. But this was not to be. Lady Madelaine, who detested the exertion which she considered herself in this instance called upon to make, and who had evidently determined to avoid, if possible, all chance of its recurrence, had yet a few more "last words" to deliver; and I was still standing silently beside her, self-condemned and humbled in my own eyes, when Félicie, who was, unfortunately for herself, much more intent upon the conversation that was going on about her, than upon her own occupation, and who had just commenced operations on the other side of her lady's ringlets, began once more to pile the glossy curls thickly together; when the taper fingers of the angry beauty suddenly wound themselves about the handle of the brush, and wresting it from her hand, flung it violently into her face, whence it bounded off, and falling upon a table on which stood a breakfast service of Nankin china, brought the cup and saucer about to be used by my mother to the floor, where they lay scattered in fragments; at the same instant when Félicie, with a faint shriek, raised her black silk apron to her face, to stanch the blood which was flowing from her nose.

I remained for an instant aghast and motionless, and then I fear that, despite my better reason, I smiled. I imagine that I must have done so, for at that very moment, as the eyes of my mother and my own chanced to meet, I saw a cloud gather upon her brow. Her little hand instinctively clenched itself, and her slippered foot beat against the floor, as she exclaimed hurriedly "Leave the room, Miss Tilden! Have you not the good taste to leave the room?"

Had I been in the Presence, I could not have made a more punctilious courtesy than that with which I withdrew, followed by the shrinking and trembling Joséphine. I turned one look upon the unhappy delinquent, who was standing apart, crying bitterly with mingled pain and passion; but I have no doubt that she was easily consoled, for I saw her on the following Sunday, glorious in a dress of violet lutestring, which I remembered to have once noticed upon my mother.

Need I say that no particularly high moral effect was produced upon me by the interview which had been so strangely terminated. I was no longer a child—I felt my power. My own mother had shrunk from my observation. I forgot all that she had uttered, both in reproach and warning; but the action which had succeeded the words was, for months afterward, still vividly before me. Example is a hundred fold more potent than precept upon the spirit of the young. When the hour came at which I had formerly been in the habit of joining my mother's circle, I was already deep in doubt between a dress of white muslin, and a frock of blue brocade, when mademoiselle very sententiously informed me that miladi would dispense with my presence, and that I was not again to present myself en société, until I had received instructions to that effect.

A week before—even a day before—such a message would have made me furious; now, I received it with perfect calmness; and desiring that my maid would replace the rival dresses in my wardrobe, I flung myself upon a sofa, and was soon, to all appearance, deeply engaged in the last volume of Fielding's Amelia. I could see that my unquestioning resignation astonished both my governess and my waiting-woman; they exchanged glances of surprise which did not escape me, and which was just what I desired; but they had no sooner left me to myself than I laid aside the book, and began, as was now my invariable custom, to search for the explanation of my mother's conduct. I asked myself why she, who had been formerly so blind to my faults, so demonstrative in her affection, so indulgent in her rule when I was a mere mindless child, should suddenly have become cold, repelling, and even harsh in her bearing, now that I had attained a more companionable age, and was more capable of appreciating kindness? The simple banishment from her immediate circle I could at once, and without difficulty, have attributed to her annoyance at my presence during the scene of the morning, and her anxiety that the impression should have time to become fainter ere we again met. I did not waste a moment upon that phase of the affair. It was the abrupt, uncompromising dictatorial tone which she had assumed at that very interview, which struck me as incongruous and inexplicable. That she had listened to the complaints made against me, and to the circumstances which had called them forth, was evident from the spirit of her rebuke; but that she should not condescend to make some appeal to me individually, and thus enable me to excuse or to justify myself, was the great subject of my bewilderment.

Had I not for years been encouraged and applauded whenever I endeavored to imitate her either in air or manner? Had I not been praised and petted when I succeeded in aping a tone or a gesture with sufficient accuracy to insure its immediate recognition? Had she not frequently chidden me for the disorder of a stray ringlet, or the discomposure of a ruffled flounce? Had I not received repeated injunctions not to spread the muscles of my hands, by attempting to grasp objects too large for them, and to be careful to tread evenly, lest I should spoil the turn of my ancle? Was not her parting command to Mademoiselle Joséphine connected with the preservation of my complexion? and were not all these cases so many incentives to vanity? My reason answered "Yes;" and I felt that herein at least I was entitled to the highest commendation for my implicit and unvarying obedience.

I walked to the glass. There could be no doubt that on this point my mother had every reason to be satisfied. She had given me a text, and I had composed a whole volume upon that single sentence. There could be no doubt, I say, upon the subject. I was decidedly a beauty, and it was beauty of a very high order. I tried my head in several positions, and it came triumphantly through every ordeal. I was tall, too; I felt it was extremely probable that in two years more I should be as tall as Lady Madelaine herself; and in two years I should be sixteen. How many of my most cherished heroines had been fenced in by lovers at sixteen! I wondered whether this fact had ever struck her; she must have known it, for I learnt it from her own books.

Decidedly she could not have been disappointed with my appearance. Wherein then could lie the cause of my disgrace? I was satisfied that my masters would report well of my progress, one and all; and, indeed, I had already afforded to Lady Madelaine herself the opportunity of estimating my musical proficiency. I had excited not only attention, but even astonishment. Here again I was consequently blameless. I could find no clue to the enigma.

CHAPTER XIII.

On one point I was, at the close of my deliberations, absolutely determined; and this was to endure the maternal caprice, for simply as such did I consider it, in dignified silence. I would not condescend to complain. I was no longer a child to be chidden without a cause. In two years I should be sixteen, and there was to me impunity and emancipation in the very thought.

As I resolved, so I acted. That I suffered deeply I will not deny; for, greedy of admiration, and accustomed to indulgence, I could not think of the brilliant circle collected in the other wing of the house, without severe mortification; but I suffered in silence. I did not relax a tittle in my application to the various accomplishments which formed my duties. I pursued my reading with the same avidity as ever; but I was now driven to the general library, for I dared no longer invade the bookshelves of Lady Madelaine. I found, however, an ample store of fiction even there, although, fortunately for me, it was of a higher class. Still, I had many unoccupied moments, and these were invariably employed in speculating upon my mother's extraordinary change of feeling; and in building some very magnificent "castles in the air," of which I was one day to become the tenant.

Things remained in this position for a fortnight, at the end of which time my father arrived from town; and with this information was coupled the command of Lady Madelaine, that I should take my coffee, as I had formerly done, in the drawing-room. I obeyed with the same composure as on the occasion of my banishment. In vain did mademoiselle, who condescended to superintend my toilet, endeavor to elicit from me some expression of surprise or curiosity; for, although I studiously tried the patience both of herself and my attendant, and three times changed my dress when they supposed me ready to join my mother's guests, not a syllable did I suffer to escape my lips upon the subject which actually engrossed my mind. At length their toil was over, I confessed myself satisfied—gave a last look at the glass—arranged a stray hair—and descended to the drawing-room, if not with the same feeling, at least with the same appearance of composure as though I had never been exiled from its gaieties.

As I anticipated, my father was the first who greeted me on my entrance. Absorbed by public business, as my mother had been by pleasure; and, moreover, with little cause to hope that my companionship would repay him for personal inconvenience, he had never once visited Rooksley during the whole period of her absence; and I observed that he appeared no less struck by the change in my person than Lady Madelaine and her friends had been upon the former occasion; but his surprise was evidently pleasurable. There was a proud expression in his eyes as they lingered upon my face, and a deep tenderness in the tone with which he addressed me; nor was I slow to remark that, mingled with that tenderness, there was a courteous deference of manner, of which a really high-bred man can never divest himself when conversing with a woman, but which I had never before observed in him when speaking to myself.

The conviction gave me courage. "In my father's eyes I am no longer a child!" I whispered proudly to my own heart; and, after having lingered for a moment at his side, I slowly approached the lounging-chair of Lady Madelaine, without looking either to the right or left, but making my way with all the grace and self-possession of which I was capable. When I stood before her, my mother gave me a slight nod, and a faint smile, just what would have been a graceful and becoming acknowledgment of my propriety of bearing, had we only parted an hour or two previously: and who, save myself, was aware that it was not so!

This ceremony over, I found my hand clasped in that of Miss Vernon, who, drawing me aside, began eagerly to explain that Lady Madelaine had peremptorily forbidden all invasion of the school room, or that she should have shared my solitude frequently, very frequently. I thanked her with a beaming smile and a heightened color; but it was not her affection ete address which had elicited either the one or the other. At the very moment that she was speaking, I heard the voice of Sir James Dornton, who exclaimed, in an accent loud enough to reach my ear—

"Can it be possible that the beautiful girl I see yonder is Miss Tilden!—the little Eveleen of a few months ago! Egad, in a year or two my Lady Madelaine herself must look to her laurels."

I had never thought the fastidious baronet half so agreeable; and was glad when he soon afterward approached me, and I found that he had just arrived from town with my father.

"We traveled en tiers, Miss Tilden," he said, affecting intense disgust; "which is what no one should do who is not prepared to risk all the consequences, however fatal; and this alarming fact I considerately laid before your senatorial papa; but he gave no heed to my remonstrance; and accordingly, after we had each possessed ourselves of a corner of the chariot, the process was completed by the application of a human wedge in the shape of that tall young gentleman, who is now lounging against the mantle-piece, and staring most impertinently into the face of a young lady with whom I have the honor of being in conversation."

I instinctively looked in the direction which he indicated; and as I did so, even rapidly as he withdrew his gaze, my eyes met those of the stranger for an instant. I had never before seen such eyes; so large, so dark, and so soft in their expression. Tall, and slight, but with an air of fashion, and a gracefulness of attitude which appeared to realize all the fabled perfection of the heroes of my imagination, I saw at the first glance that the new guest was a mere stripling; but I dared not pursue my scrutiny: and the pause was consequently brief, which I terminated by inquiring his identity.

"That very fortunate young gentleman," said Sir James, "is the only child of your mother's pet friend, Lady Devereux—que voilà, showing her pretty foot to the insensible Frederic Vernon—and he is consequently the sole heir of Sir Herbert, who, I have been confidently assured, loves him almost as well as his favorite hunter. Think of that, Miss Tilden! and emulate his perfections. The joli garçon has just left college; and as his lady-mother is of opinion that black and scarlet blend very harmoniously, she has coaxed his unwilling papa—whose principal study is, as you are probably aware, how to do the least possible good in the longest possible time: or, perhaps, I should rather say, to live out his life without doing anything—to allow her darling to go into the Guards; and, such as you see him, he is actually and bona fide, at this moment, one of the defenders of his country, and has run down to Rooksley to 'kiss hands' on the momentous occasion."

"He appears to be very young," I hazarded in reply.

"He completed his seventeenth year a day or two since; but you must venture no remark upon his juvenility; horse-guardsmen of that age being wonderfully punctilious on the matter of their manliness."

The words were scarcely uttered when my father, followed by young Devereux, advanced to the sofa, upon which we were seated, when the subject of our conversation was made known to me; and Sir James, with a sarcastic ceremony, for which at the moment I detested him, rose, and resigned his place beside me to the stranger, who, however, possessed himself of it with a composure and good faith which soon restored my complacency.

I felt as though I now saw one of my favorite novels in action, and that I was to become the heroine of a plot full of romance and interest. I required no prompting to teach me that he admired my person; and I had been too long prepared for a similar event, to be found wanting in the attempt to display my perfections in the most favorable light. I closed my eyes languidly, after the fashion of my mother; and when the long lashes had produced their effect, I raised them suddenly to the face of my companion, only to avert them in the same haste. My triumph was great as I remarked his growing interest. He was evidently unsuspicious of artifice; and as all my mother's lady-guests were absorbed in their own peculiar partialities and avocations, no comment was made upon the fact of our continuing in conversation throughout the evening, and parting only when mademoiselle entered to reclaim what she was pleased to call her pupil.

As my father's public duties would not permit of his remaining long absent from town, it was intimated to me, that, with the exception of those hours which were habitually dedicated to my several masters, my time and movements were at my own disposal. I had suddenly attained to happiness! I was free to come and to go. I was beloved—this, above all, was the thought which gave a new charm to my existence; nor did I suffer myself to doubt that it must be so. It is true that at the end of a week I began to have some misgivings of the progress of the devoted attachment of which I was resolved to become the object. Engrossed by my own vanity, the idea of the conquest which I had made was ever present to me; nor could I force myself to feel an interest in any other subject. I did not reflect that it was far otherwise with young Devereux. He might admire me as a pretty girl, and find a pleasure in conversing with one who treated his sentiments and attentions with respect; but he had also other contemplations even more agreeable. He had just escaped the trammels of college, and taken a decided and honorable position in society. Bright visions of the future mingled, therefore, with his enjoyment of the present; and it is probable that long after I argued myself into the belief that I held his happiness in my hands, the placid reveries in which he loved to indulge were full of gold lace and thorough-bred chargers, instead of bright eyes and well-turned ankles.

This coldness did not, however, long continue. He was dazzled by the showiness of my accomplishments, flattered by the pleasure which I did not attempt to conceal when we met, and surrounded by an atmosphere redolent of gallantry and dissipation. Nevertheless, Herbert Devereux was a greater novice than myself in the language of admiration. Timid, wholly unconscious of his personal advantages, and deeply imbued with respect for the sex, he was guarded in every word and look. He lived in perpetual fear of offending, and took alarm, more than once, at the very means which I adopted to give him confidence. Time and opportunity, however, were my best allies. My father returned to town, leaving the young soldier quietly domesticated under his roof: and thus the only watchful and wary eye which might have detected our childish folly was withdrawn.

Sir James Dornton was the first person who directed attention to the precocious flirtation in which we were engaged; but as he did so in merry mockery rather than in prudent warning, it was acknowledged only to become the new amusement of the circle. They even jested with us on the subject. They were wrong. These boy and girl attachments frequently lead to more serious results than is imagined by those who look on them in sport.

Lady Devereux alone never appeared to remark our growing fancy. It was her policy to affect perfect indifference and contempt of so extremely improbable an idea. It is certain that even her only son would have had some difficulty in making a more judicious marriage, in a worldly point of view. So, while Lord Otterford jested with my mother upon the prepossession of his young cousin, and revolted against the threat of my renewed banishment from the drawing-room, Lady Devereux pursued the even tenor of her way, leaving events to dispose of themselves.

My mother, always self-absorbed, and unwilling to contend with her devoted admirer upon so very immaterial a subject, left us in peace, and soon ceased altogether to remark our proceedings. Many romantic hours did we spend upon the lake; across which Herbert Devereux used to row until the boat was fairly hidden among the willow-boughs which fringed the island that intervened between them and the house. Here, with one of my favorite books, all which were new to my companion, or with my guitar, which he played to admiration, we spent long hours, during the riding excursions of Lady Madelaine's party; while the park afforded walks sufficiently secluded to satisfy even my exacting spirit of romance. At length Herbert told me that he loved me. Tall in stature, and perfectly self-possessed in manner, he had soon forgotten that I was still a mere girl; nor did I, on my side, pause to remember the fact. My day-dream was accomplished. I stood on the same level with my mother; and when the elegant stripling raised my hand to his lips, and prayed me to pardon the avowal, I was violently agitated. It was the first great triumph of my vanity, and I felt as though earth could thereafter hold no evil destiny for me.

My emotion gave me new charms in the eyes of my young admirer. He was too unworldly to suspect its source; nor was it a confidence which I felt called upon to make; but from that hour I was conscious of my power, and resolved to exert it.

An incident which shortly afterward occurred, nevertheless, changed materially, not only my feelings of self-reliance, but the actual tenor of my life.

Lady Madelaine had received from a friend in India a fan of carved ivory of magnificent workmanship. The Glenfillan arms, her own cipher, and other appropriate ornaments, were wrought upon it, with a delicacy and finish which rendered it of extreme value, especially to Lady Madelaine herself.

This fan she one evening chanced to mislay, nor could any of the servants succeed in finding it. A search by the guests ensued the following morning, after luncheon; and while each was engaged in disarranging some article of furniture in the saloon, under the plea of seeking for the lost fan, I passed on into the octagon-room, followed by Herbert Devereux.

As I was really anxious for the recovery of the pretty toy, I did not remark the circumstance; but approaching a sofa which stood in a recess, I at once began to displace the cushions, when I suddenly felt an arm folded about my waist, and a warm lip pressed to my cheek. I started, and turned round. My woman-instinct had at once told me who was the aggressor; but I had no time to chide, for in the doorway also stood my mother, with her dark and angry eyes riveted upon us.

Herbert drew back in evident consternation—it was the first time that he had dared so much, and he was cowed at the effects of his audacity. My own heart beat violently, and I felt the hot blood mantling over my brow; but I stood my ground. The after-conduct of my mother, however, for a time humbled and disconcerted me. She softly closed the door behind her, and pushed the bolt; and, this done, she seated herself haughtily upon the sofa, and turned towards young Devereux, who supported himself, as he stood, against a chair.

"I have intruded upon you at an unfortunate moment, Mr. Devereux," she said coldly; "but you must pardon me: This child is my daughter, and with her I shall know how to deal. With regard to yourself, you must pardon me once more, if I say that you had better, without more delay, enter upon your military duties."

"Miss Tilden is blameless, madam—" commenced the agitated young man, hurriedly.

"Of course she is—she is my daughter, sir," interrupted Lady Madelaine, in the same tone of forced composure as before; "she has not yet escaped from the nursery, and is consequently quite unable to take care of herself. I will henceforth be cautious that she shall not require to do so. The mail passes through Rooksley to-night; and perhaps you would now like to go, and take leave of your mother."

Devereux was thunderstruck. He made another attempt to obtain a hearing; but Lady Madelaine was inexorable.

"Enough, enough," she said impetuously; "you to your parade-ground, and this child to her school-room. All argument is useless."

Overpowered by her manner, Herbert bowed profoundly, turned one long, supplicating look toward me, as though to crave my pardon for the displeasure which he had brought upon me, and shooting back the bolt, slowly left the room.

"You have commenced early, Miss Tilden," was the sarcastic observation of my mother, when he had disappeared; "your education has indeed progressed far beyond my expectations, and you are likely to do honor to your father's name. These are then the creditable results of the vanity which I sought in vain to curs! Do you not remember how seriously I expostulated with you upon this subject not a month since?"

"I do, madam," I replied, with a courage which it astonishes me even now to look back upon. "Your ladyship rebuked me, both for my vanity and for my violence. I am not likely to forget the circumstance; nor, from my own experience, to doubt the correctness of the Italian proverb, which says, 'Come canta il capellano, cosè responde il sacristan.'"

"Ha! you attempt also to speak in epigrams," exclaimed Lady Madelaine, intensely provoked; 'truly you are a precocious young lady, and cannot fail to be one day a credit to your family! How long, may I venture to inquire, have these familiarities been permitted between yourself and Mr. Devereux?"

I was silent.

"It is not your pleasure to satisfy me upon this point. Perhaps you are right. I shall at least know when they terminated forever. And now, listen to me, Miss Tilden. I have, as you are aware, lately purchased a villa upon the Thames. Thither I shall remove, with my guests, in the course of a few days. You will remain here; not under the guidance of a weak and too indulgent governess, but under strict and stringent guardianship. I have condescended to explain this, because I shall never again permit myself to hold any conversation with you on the subject."

"And my father—" I asked proudly; "is your ladyship well assured that he will sanction the imprisonment of a daughter whom he loves?"

"The experiment shall be tried," answered my mother coldly. "I am, at all events, well provided with reasons for the step which I am about to take; nor do I believe that Mr. Tilden will be insensible to the disgrace which has already been brought upon him by your levity."

"Disgrace!" I exclaimed recklessly; "I deny that I have in any way disgraced my father. My fault, if fault it be, was involuntary. I was not even aware of Mr. Devereux's presence. I will not be denounced to my father as having forgotten the respect I owe to myself."

"You will not, Miss Tilden?"

"I will not, madam. It was the first occasion upon which Lady Devereux's son had done more than kiss my hand. I trust that he did not err in so mere a trifle as that salutation, and that I am not to blame in having permitted it. Should it be otherwise, your ladyship will forgive me if I once more recall the Italian proverb."

For the moment, I knew that my mother was in my power; there was no escape from the room, as I have before mentioned, save through the saloon in which the guests were now assembled; nor did she dare to raise her voice, lest the sounds of altercation should attract their notice; and it was doubtlessly the knowledge that such was the case which inspired me with a temporary daring, ill-suited alike to my age and to our relative position.

For a brief interval, Lady Madelaine exhibited, however, no inclination to reply. She was petrified by my insolence. She little knew or guessed the education which her own neglect and baneful example had combined to work out, in a nature as confident and as self-willed as her own. I feared her still; but, girl as I was, I had almost ceased to respect her. I was aware of her power; but I was also quite as cognizant of her weakness.

"This to me!" she at length gasped out, with an eye that flamed with indignant anger, and in a suppressed voice which vainly struggled to be calm; "is this the return which you make for my indulgence? Eveleen, Eveleen, I never anticipated this. Do you presume to measure your own conduct—the conduct of a mere child—by that of those about you? It is indeed time that the viper should be crushed I shall waste no more words; you are unworthy of them. Follow me."

She rose, drew up her stately figure to its full height, and disappeared into the saloon, leaving the door of communication open. I stood for an instant irresolute. My pride revolted at the possibility of being subjected to the ridicule of the assembled guests, should my mother deem it expedient to betray the unguarded action of Herbert; while I shrank with almost equal repugnance from the idea that I might be dismissed to my room like a chidden child, after having played the part of a woman before her circle. Suddenly a thought flashed upon me.—The window, which was pierced nearly to the ground, stood invitingly open. I laid my hand upon the frame, and sprang out. The sounds of laughter reached me from the drawing-room; and my brow burnt as I figured to myself that I was, in all probability, the object of the ridicule. I, so proud, so vain, and so self-centred.—The pang was terrible! For a time I had not courage to escape from the odious merriment, but supported myself against the wall of the house, and listened with an intensity which seemed to absorb all the faculties of my being; this state of emotion was, however, too violent to last. I had already maintained a severe struggle with myself, in order to preserve an appearance of composure before my mother; and this last trial was almost more than I could support. After a short pause, therefore, I rushed away into the wood which skirted the lawn, where I was alone with my own feelings, with no eye upon me; and where the voice of ridicule and sarcasm could not meet my ear.

I threw myself down under a tree, and tried to think; but I could not. Every pulse throbbed almost to bursting, and the pain in my head was intolerable. I clasped my forehead with my spread hands, and wept—tears of passionate energy, such as were ill-suited to my years. I felt that I had been harshly used—that I had been rebuked for errors similar to those which were hourly passing before my eyes—that all opportunity of justification had been coldly denied to me. I experienced no remorse for the mortification which I had entailed upon my mother; but rather, on the contrary, believed myself worthy of praise, for the generous forbearance which had induced me to conceal from her the interview of Emily Vernon and Lord Otterford on the very spot which she had so lately occupied as an inexorable judge. I understood her sufficiently to know that by such a revelation she would have been humbled to the dust, however successfully she might have struggled to conceal it. I might have done this, and did not; and by a strange anomaly of feeling, perfectly incomprehensible to myself, I rejoiced that it was so. It was the one consolatory point of my reflections, when at length I was enabled to reflect; and the cool night-air and the deep stillness had, ere long, so beneficial an effect upon my nerves, that I arose in a state of comparative calm; and, slowly retracing my steps to the house, proceeded at once to my own room; where, ringing for my maid, I retired immediately to rest, on the plea of sudden indisposition.

Did I say to rest! It was a mere profanation of the word. I could not close my eyes; and now that I had in a great degree overcome the effects of my interview with my mother, my thoughts reverted to Herbert; and a burning blush overspread my cheeks as I remembered that I had been treated in his presence as a froward child, who needed chastisement. He was about to depart, too; to mingle with the world of which I believed and feared that he would soon become the idol; he might forget me, or remember me ere long only in the odious character which it had pleased Lady Madelaine to attribute to me; and this was the most bitter thought of all.

I found some consolation, however, in dwelling upon the changed manner of all the men who formed my mother's circle. They, at least, it was sufficiently evident, had ceased to regard me in the same light as Lady Madelaine. Foremost among those who had admitted my claim to be otherwise considered was Sir James Dornton; and I did not seek to restrain a feeling of triumph when I remembered this.

Perhaps I could not choose a more fitting place in which to describe the said baronet; who played so prominent a part in the history of my after-life, that it is necessary to introduce him formally to the reader.

CHAPTER XIV.

Sir James Dornton, one of the most important persons in my history, was of a family more ancient than illustrious. His fortune was greatly inferior to his ambition; and he valued money, as those universally do value it whose habits of personal luxury bear no proportion to the capability of its indulgence. I need scarcely remark, however, that this undignified passion was carefully concealed. Sir James was as proud as he was poor. He was one of those men of fashion, some of whom are encountered every day, who have the tact of passing off their counterfeit as current coin, without suffering the penalty of the law for their social forgery. Nature had done everything for him physically, but had been extremely economical in her dowry of virtue. He was tall and graceful; with a fine and expressive countenance; remarkably quick at repartee; and, like all persons who care not, when they launch their arrows, whom they may ultimately wound, so long as their flight attracts attention, he passed for a man of wit. Feeling he had none, save for his own comfort and convenience; and his principle was as accommodating as his sentiment. Affecting a hyper-fastidiousness which exonerated himself from criticism, and was used as a blind for his occasional insolence to those around him; gifted with extraordinary fluency, and a retentive memory; polite and fascinating in his more amiable moments; uncompromising and decided in those of greater importance, and singularly handsome, Sir James Dornton was the enfant cheri of his set; a welcome visitor to the gay and the idle; and celebrated among the dissipated as a safe friend—which means, that in keeping his own secrets, which he was always clever enough to do, he at the same time kept theirs. There can be no doubt that there is a certain degree of talent in being able to do this.

I need scarcely say, that this is not the portrait which I should have drawn of the baronet at fourteen; it is the production of a more practiced and familiar pencil.

And now—revenons à nos moutons.

My reverie was long and earnest; but I still failed to discover the actual motives of my mother's conduct; and I consequently, after a considerable time, turned from the speculative to the actual position which I now occupied. I was once more to be abandoned to the solitude of Rooksley. The first use to which Lady Madelaine proposed to convert her river villa, was that of ridding her of the obtrusive presence of a daughter who had gradually become distasteful to her. Mademoiselle Joséphine was to be discarded from the school-room. This, at least, was a relief; it was the only point of light in the picture. The Frenchwoman was peculiarly disagreeable to me—she was the most contemptible of all things—a cipher; a creature at once aimless and heartless, whom it was a waste of feeling even to despise; and I very soon satisfied myself that I should eminently prefer the "strict and stringent guardianship," with which I was threatened, let it come in what shape it might. My present imputed subserviency to a discarded lady's-maid was ignoble; there would be some glory, at least, in contention, if contend I must, against a superior intellect, and a less equivocal authority.

I can look back now upon this haughty reasoning with a smile, when I remember the result; but at the time it afforded my only consolation.

The threat of Lady Madelaine was by no means an idle one. Her removal to Putney followed within a month; and Rooksley was bereft of many of its more costly ornaments for the decoration of the new villa. Nor was this all. There were signs, impossible to be misunderstood, which convinced me, without a hint from others, that she did not look forward to a speedy return. So much, indeed, was done, or rather undone, that the mansion ere long assumed the appearance of a religious house, rather than the abode of luxury which it had lately been. I confess that this fact wounded me deeply. The elegances by which I had been surrounded from my childhood had become necessary to me. I worshiped the graceful and the beautiful. They were essential to my comfort. My mother was already revenged!

How often did I laugh in the bitterness of my spirit, as I walked hurriedly about the noble park, seeking in violent exertion to still the uncomfortable feelings by which I was haunted.

when I remembered that here at least Lady Madelaine had been unable to separate me from the loveliness I so much prized. My father's apartments alone remained intact. The genius of desolation had not invaded their precincts; and there I consequently spent a great portion of my time.

As the idea of my mother was always painful to me, present itself in what shape it might, I began to turn with more interest than I had ever hitherto felt, to that of my father; and to examine carefully and earnestly every object which could afford an insight into his habits and feelings. The more I studied the subject, the more I recalled his early caresses, his subdued tones, his tender indulgence; and coupled with these the many evidences of his fine taste and cultivated mind by which I was now surrounded, the more deeply I felt that I had never returned his affection as I ought. I had just discovered the delight of being beloved; and therefore I, for the first time, rightly understood the bitter feelings with which he must have seen his tenderness rejected. This conviction carried me far, very far; for I instinctively traveled from my own want of sympathy to that of my mother. Et tu, Brute! was the aspiration of my heart. Yes—it was even so—the wife of his bosom did not appreciate his worth. The holy shrine of home, which should have been wreathed with blossoms, was heaped with ice; and the only garlands by which it was rendered attractive were beaten out of cold and sordid gold.

Involuntarily my thoughts glanced towards Otterford; and my breath came thick as I remembered that his bland hypocrisy and unmeaning gallantries had turned away the eyes and heart of my mother from the higher and more noble qualities of the man on whom she had bestowed her hand.

Amid these uneasy and conflicting reveries time wore slowly on. Despite the new rule to which I had been informed that I was about to become subject, no alteration had as yet been made in the household, with the sole exception that Mademoiselle Joséphine had laid aside even the affectation of supremacy, and had quietly degenerated into a sullen and very inexpert attendant; while I could trace an expression of triumph in the manner of the bustling Mrs. Harris, in our occasional encounters, evidently intended to provoke inquiry. Such condescension was, however, foreign to my character. Lady Madelaine had made the communications which she deemed expedient, and I neither sought nor cared for any others.

Of my own fate I was still comparatively careless—my leading anxiety was my present position with Herbert Devereux. Could I have been fully assured of the continuance of his affection, I might have put even my mortified vanity to rest. Had we been separated with some degree of delicacy and consideration, I might, at least, have looked back in calm and dignified sorrow to our parting; but now its memory revolted me. I had been placed in a position for which the whole course of my extensive reading offered no precedent. I had been humbled in the eyes of my first lover!—and, let those laugh who list, this was no slight trial to a budding beauty, looking forward to her fifteenth year. When not overwhelmed by this recollection, I occupied myself in speculating upon the possible renewal of my father's affection. I was more conscious, day by day, of the value of the friend whom I had lost; and I became comparatively anxious to make some attempt to reillumine his extinguished tenderness. Alas! such a blessing was not destined to me—his heart had been for years a closed casket, of which he had flung away the key. Kind, and gentle, and indulgent, he could still be, for these endearing qualities were natural to him; but they grew no longer out of the deep feelings of a husband and a father.

Mr. Tilden in his own house resembled a stately forest-tree planted in a conservatory, and he sickened at the unwholesomeness of the atmosphere.

It was the beginning of autumn; Mrs. Vernon was still detained in town; and it had been determined that her daughter should remain there also throughout the winter, in order that she might secure the best advice for what the Galen of Rooksley had decided to be a confirmed chest-complaint. Mrs. Alexander and her daughters were sojourning at Cheltenham; and of all my mother's habitual circle, no one remained in the neighborhood save Lady O'Halloran and Dr. James.

I had been accustomed to hear her portly ladyship so slightingly mentioned when she chanced to be absent; to hear both her physical and moral attributes so freely and wittily discussed; and to look upon her so decidedly as a person rather tolerated than desired, that I confess it was with a feeling very far from pleasurable that I heard her name one day announced, and thus saw my solitude for the first time invaded.

It was immediately evident that she perceived the impression produced by her presence, but she was too generous to show any resentment.

"You are surprised to see me, Miss Tilden," she said kindly, as she extended her hand; "nor should I have intruded at Rooksley contrary to the express request of Lady Madelaine, had it not been at the desire of your excellent father."

This assurance changed at once the whole current of my feelings: I both looked and expressed my acknowledgments.

"I thought you also were absent from the neighborhood," I said in conclusion, "for I was not aware of my mother's prohibition; and believed it probable, that had any of her friends been within reach, they would have taken pity on the poor prisoner."

"No, my dear young lady," said my visitor with a smile; "I am content to remain at home throughout the year, when necessity does not call me to town. I have a holier and a better use for the little I can spare, than squandering it in folly and in dress. Not, however," she added hastily, with a delicacy which did her honor, "that I blame those who enter into the gaieties of a London life, or who find pleasure in change of scene; in all probability, I should have done both under different circumstances. And now, my dear girl, what can I do to be either useful or agreeable to you?"

For a moment I did not reply, for the language of Lady O'Halloran was new to me. I had been so accustomed to consider that, as a matter of course, all persons of a certain condition in life had gold at command, and that to declare yourself poor was to acknowledge your own want of caste and consequence, that I was thunderstruck. I recovered myself, however, on the instant; and warmly thanking my visitor for her kind intentions in my favor, I requested her, in the first place, to give me tidings of my father.

"Mr. Tilden is doubtlessly quite well," she said; "for he writes nothing on the subject of his health, which is always to me, at least, conclusive. We are all so apt to dwell upon our little ailments, both of body and spirit; and it does us so much good to prose where we feel sure to meet with sympathy, that I do not think, had anything been amiss, he would have suffered so excellent an opportunity to escape; whereas his whole letter is filled with anxiety for your happiness and comfort, which he seems to fear will both suffer from the contemplated arrangement. He tells me that you have never seen either your sister or your aunt; and therefore it was that he encouraged me to break through the ban of excommunication, thinking that a familiar face, even though it should be that of an old woman, may occasionally afford you pleasure."

"My sister! my aunt!" I exclaimed breathlessly; "what can you possibly mean! I entreat of you, my dear Lady O'Halloran, to explain yourself."

It was now my guest's turn to feel surprise—she looked at me with an expression of wondering pity. "Can it really be, my poor child," she said at length, after a pause which to me appeared interminable, "that you have been kept in ignorance of Lady Madelaine's intention?"

"I know nothing," I answered, bitterly, "save that I am forsaken and disliked—that I have become an alien from my mother's heart."

Lady O'Halloran drew her chair closer to mine, and gently took my hand. "Do not suffer yourself to believe so," she said gravely; "such morbid fancies will only serve to render your own life miserable, while they can affect no one but yourself. To your father you are an object of deep and sincere interest; but, young as you are, you must already be aware that he is not demonstrative in his feelings. That your mother is at present exasperated against you there can be no doubt; while, however, it is quite as certain that the feeling will soon pass by. I know by experience," she continued, with a sigh, "that no mother can long retain displeasure against her child."

"But my father, Lady O'Halloran—may I not ask somewhat of him! You spoke, too, of my aunt—of my sister. Did I, could I indeed understand that they are coming here?"

"I feared that they would already have preceded me," she replied calmly; "and I entreat you to remember, my dear girl, that one is your own sister, and the other the sister of your mother."

"I, indeed, required to bear this in mind," I remarked, with increased bitterness; "I now understand all the extent of Lady Madelaine's diplomacy. In my childhood I was petted and caressed—I was encouraged in every caprice and in every folly—I was made the idol not only of others, but of myself also, in order that the reverse should be more deeply felt. You talk of the feelings of a mother, Lady O'Halloran; you talk as I have read of them in books; you do not understand the nature of Lady Madelaine Tilden."

"I implore you to speak no longer in such a strain, or you will banish me the house," said my visitor, shrinking beneath the violent passion which I displayed. "It is quite true that you were prematurely dragged from the nursery, and made to play a part utterly unsuited to your years, to the great regret of all who cared to speculate on the results of such a system; but this was merely for the gratification of a whim. You are now too old to be made a toy; and your mother, on discovering her error, has, probably in her haste to repair it, exceeded somewhat in severity. But you are still very young, my dear Miss Tilden; and, should you resolve to exert your good sense, and meet the new inmates of Rooksley in a feeling of welcome and relationship, it will be but a passing trial, which will ultimately tend to enhance the pleasures of that world to which you must necessarily return in a short time. Beside,—reflect only for a moment. Shall you experience no delight in holding to your heart a younger sister, ready to love you, and to cling to you for companionship and sympathy? Remember the long and tedious banishment which this unoffending sister has already undergone, while you have been lapped in luxury, and cradled in indulgence."

I laughed scornfully, as I recalled to mind all the comments which I had heard made in the nursery on the young lady whose cause my zealous visitor was advocating.

"Listen to me for a moment, Lady O'Halloran," I said, as quietly as though I were arguing a mere abstract question; "you are evidently laboring in the dark. Have you ever heard Lady Madelaine Tilden mention her younger child?"

"Never; but your father—"

I waved my hand impatiently.

"Shall I tell you why? Her advent into this world nearly cost the life of her mother. Was this no crime? That mother's recovery was slow and precarious. Was this no sin? ay, and sin past all forgiveness, in the eyes of an acknowledged beauty, whose triumph was dependent upon time. The child, sickly from its birth, was fretful and plain, and gave no promise of physical perfection. Did not this fact exonerate a fashionable parent from all natural ties? Of course—of course. All the world knew that the beautiful Lady Madelaine Tilden had given birth to a second daughter, whom she had thrust forth in her infancy, because—But shame upon me!" I continued contemptuously; "I was about to give a reason for the act; and why should I? Throughout the world which she worshiped, none sought to ask one of the Lady Madelaine; nor did she win a smile the less."

"Calm yourself, my dear child, I beseech you," murmured the astonished Lady O'Halloran.

"Have no fear for me, madam," I said proudly; "you have been kind enough to express a wish to serve me, and I will be frank with you. You shall not lavish your civility upon an ingrate. I have been disciplined in a strange school; and would fain convince you that I have learned to judge for myself. I have told you what is Miss Adela Tilden's relative situation with her mother; now learn what it is toward myself. Physically, her worldly career must be a blank, for she is totally devoid of personal attractions. Of her education you will, at once, be enabled to form a correct idea, when I tell you that, since the death of Lord Glenfillan, my maternal grandfather, the Lady Flora, at once his daughter and my sister's guardian, has resided in the heart of the Highlands, with no other assistance in forming the mind and manners of her young ward than what could be afforded by a widow lady of good family and slender means, who chanced to have buried herself in the neighborhood; and who was happy to embrace any method of increasing her inadequate income. In addition to these circumstances, I pray you also to remember, that my own fortune will, in all probability, be diminished one-half by the existence of a sister so little calculated to do honor, either to herself or to her family, in those circles where it is essential that she should shine; and then I think that you will readily exonerate me in your heart for any repugnance which I may testify to her close companionship. At present we are utter strangers; mere matter of tradition the one to the other; and this is as it should be. Why disturb so simple an arrangement? When I was first told that I had a sister, my heart bounded to meet her; but I was rebuked and ridiculed for the impulse. I have been tutored into indifference—it may be into something more. I ask only to be left as circumstances have made me."

"You wrong your nature by such an argument, my dear girl," said my good-natured visitor; "these are prejudices which have been instilled by those around you; they cannot be the growth of your own mind, for they belong neither to your age, your sex, nor your disposition. You are, and have always been, essentially companionless; for I cannot consider your tolerated appearance among your mother's guests as society to one of your tender years. Reflect only how beautiful a bond is that which unites two sisters; especially when, as in your case, the two are alone to love each other; and believe me when I tell you that a very few weeks of close and affectionate communion will suffice to convince you that your present feelings are both erroneous and ungenerous."

"Have you the same, or as efficient consolation to offer as regards the Lady Flora Glenfillan, madam?" I asked, with a smile compounded of scorn and melancholy.

"In her case, my dear, I can say nothing," was the frank reply; "for, as I never had the honor of meeting the sister of Lady Madelaine, I am necessarily hors de combat. I would, however, venture to remind you of her near relationship to both your mother and yourself."

"Which you must permit me at once and most unequivocally to deny, as regards myself, Lady O'Halloran," I said, haughtily. "My grandfather was twice married—in the first instance, to the daughter of some obscure Scotch farmer, whose very name has escaped me—if, indeed, it was ever uttered beneath this roof and the second time, to a woman of rank equal to his own, and probably of more ancient descent —my grandmother. The Lady Flora is descended from the petty Highland laird; and is consequently a connection of mine, not a relative."

Lady O'Halloran shook her head in evident sadness. "I have done, my dear Miss Tilden; and yet, for your own sake, I would fain see you adopt a more conciliating spirit. Leaving this point, however, to your serious and dispassionate consideration, let me assure you that if my occasional presence at Rooksley can afford you either comfort or gratification, I shall glad ly avail myself of the suggestion of your father, and risk the displeasure of Lady Madelaine, to reconcile you to your new mode of life."

"Surely, madam," I said hastily, "neither this Scotch connection nor this unknown younger sister will interfere with my home-habits and occupations? Am I now at an age in which the novelty of unaccustomed coercion can be tamely borne?"

"Will you forgive me, dear girl, if I am honest enough to tell you that in the false idea which you have just put forth, lies your most dangerous error?" asked my visitor in her turn; "after all, what is this age of which you speak, and in which you would find a safeguard against authority? Had you been less thoughtlessly-I was about to say, less viciously—educated, you would still have been a mere child, with your nursery and your school-room for a world; but your mind is like an exotic plant forced into premature blossom; you have begun to think and to judge at a period when other girls only act, and even then merely as automata of which others direct the springs."

My dignity was wounded, and although Lady O'Halloran paused, as if in expectation of some reply, I remained resolutely silent. To tell me —I who was beloved and who loved in turn with all the ardor and romance of a first passion —that my proper and fitting sphere was the nursery, and my sole duty a blind and unreasoning obedience, was an excess of plain speaking to which I dared not trust myself to answer.

"That I am a sharp and rude physician, I am well aware," continued my companion, after a glance at my clouded countenance; "but this is a subject which I have often discussed with your excellent father, to whom I have faithfully promised that I will leave no measure unattempted to secure your happiness; and I have boldly braved your anger at once in order that you should be convinced I am really earnest in the work."

I bowed coldly. I had not yet recovered my self-command.

"When you have taken time to think, you will remember also, my dear child," pursued Lady O'Halloran, perfectly unmoved by my displeasure, "that if this premature plea of age is to avail yourself, your sister may also urge it in her own behalf, with almost equal pretensions, for she is merely one year younger than yourself; and you would probably, twelve months ago, have advocated your privileges upon this score as tenaciously as you do to-day. Moreover, believe me when I assure you that the society of a sister will be very dear to you. It is a pure and holy tie; and, in your case it will be doubly sweet; for, reared as this poor girl has been, at a distance from all possibility of acquiring those accomplishments to which so large an amount of your own life has been devoted, you have it in your power to be to her a most generous and valuable friend, and to bind her still more closely to you by gratitude than blood."

I became instinctively interested.

"Will you not endeavor to accomplish this beautiful and sisterly undertaking!"

"I will, madam."

Lady O'Halloran bent over me, and, as if involuntarily, pressed her lips to my forehead. That calm and almost solemn kiss had a strange effect upon me. I had been accustomed to the most lavish caresses from my infancy, and I believe that I estimated them at their just value; but there was something so heartfelt, so matronly, so real, in that of Lady O'Halloran, that I raised her fingers to my lips, and the large tears gushed from my eyes.

"Why was I never before treated like a reasonable being?" I exclaimed mournfully. "If I were old enough to play my part among the other puppets in my mother's drawing-room, was I not also capable of being led by better impulses than those of vanity and selfishness? I have been unfairly dealt with; but I have at last a friend. I will love this unknown sister, dear Lady O'Halloran—that is, I will strive to love her; but my heart tells me that there is much to undo."

"She will come to you, meek, timid, and, it may be, strangely ignorant of all the showy lore of modern scholarship, perhaps," pursued my companion; "but then she will also come to you pure, and fresh, and charming; knowing no guile, unsuspicious of deceit, confiding, simple, and affectionate. Would you close your heart against so genial an inmate! Credit me when I assure you that it would be no easy task. But you have already decided that the attempt shall not be made; and I have sufficient reliance on your honor and good faith, my dear Miss Tilden—"

"Call me Eveleen!" I cried passionately. "All the world—even my own mother—seems to have forgetten that I bear another name beside that of my family; but you—dear, kind Lady O'Halloran—you, who are at once the friend of the father and the child, surely you will cease to address me so coldly, when I convince you that I am not altogether unworthy of your regard."

"Your father, at least, understood you, my poor victimized girl," said my visitor, as she opened her arms, and I flung myself, deeply moved, upon her bosom. "He told me that you would well repay my zeal; and you will repay it, will you not, Eveleen! And I shall see the little family-party at Rooksley at once affectionate and happy, even including the 'Scotch connection.'"

I could not join in the smile. Her description of the meek, confiding, deficient sister, to whom I was ere long to be all in all, had overwhelmed me with romantic delight; but the vision of Lady Flora Glenfillan—whose "stringent guardianship" had been the most bitter threat of my mother, passed like a dark shadow over my heart.

"I will pledge myself no further to-day, even to Lady O'Halloran," I said at length.

"Well, well, perhaps I am unreasonable to expect more," replied the good lady, gaily. "I hope to see you again before your new inmates arrive; you will then have recovered the first shock of your surprise. And now, will you do me a pleasure, my dear—Eveleen? If so, tie on your shawl and bonnet, jump into my pony-chair, and spend the remainder of this bright day with me. Your carriage can convey you home at night; and I promise, indeed I do, that unless you yourself provoke it, the subject which we have just been so earnestly discussing shall not be touched upon again. So come fearlessly, my dear girl, and admire the hundred expedients by which I endeavor to conceal from myself the fact that I am no longer rich; and learn, at the same time, the wholesome truth, that it is very possible to be happy without either establishment or equipage, when the heart is filled by a much dearer interest."

Need I say that I accepted an invitation so given as frankly as I received it. Far, however, from shrinking away from the subject of the forthcoming change in my destiny, I recurred to it more than once; and when I at length parted from my kind hostess, it was with a feeling of increased respect for her; and what I had never in my life experienced until that moment, a growing distrust of my own perfectibility.

CHAPTER XV.

It was fortunate that Lady O'Halloran's attention to my father's request had been so prompt, for the travelers arrived on the succeeding evening. Never shall I forget my sensations when their arrival was announced to me! Before I left the Hall, my zealous hostess had wrung from my reluctant lips that I would do my best to love, not only my unknown sister, but also the guardian of her childhood; in making the latter promise, however, I felt that my heart had no part in the pledge. Civil I knew that I should necessarily be, for I believed that I was too well-bred to degrade myself by any exhibition of rudeness; and I resolved to struggle at courtesy; but for aught beyond this I was still quite unprepared.

I rose from my harp with a throbbing heart. Stir a step beyond the room to welcome the new-comers I could not. I felt sick and faint. I was angry with myself for my ill-timed emotion, but I could not overcome it; and while I was endeavoring to rebuke myself into at least the semblance of composure, they were ushered into the apartment.

In the van stalked a tall, gaunt figure, draped in a cloak of woolen plaid; which checkered horror, I was subsequently informed, was the Glenfillan tartan. There was a head-dress also of some nameless material and indescribable form, which was flung off abruptly; and before I could command myself sufficiently to give utterance to one word of greeting, or had even caught a glimpse of my sister, I found myself clasped in two long arms, and hugged so tightly to the Glenfillan tartan, that I had not breath even to scream; while a shrill voice, in a strong Scotch accent, was pouring forth a flood of vehement ejaculations.

I will not attempt to expatiate on my disgust. This was stringent guardianship, indeed! The travel-reeking cloak; the hot breath that seemed to stagnate upon my forehead; the fearful clutch from which I really believed my very bones to be endangered, settled the relative positions of Lady Flora and myself forever. It was an unaccustomed and coarse contact to which I instinctively felt that I could never submit without the deepest repugnance. I was at once terrified and disgusted; and when the grasp was at length relaxed, and that my tormentor (for such she seemed at the moment) drew back, and held me at arms' length, in order to examine my person at her ease, and that I saw the prominent cheek-bones, the sharp nose and chin, and the disordered and uncurled masses of grizzled hair which had escaped from beneath what was evidently intended to represent a cap, I involuntarily closed my eyes to shut out the unpleasant object which had forced itself upon me so abruptly.

My aunt! No, no—even in that moment of intense annoyance, I found leisure to thank the fates that if this were indeed the Lady Flora Glenfillan, she was at least no aunt of mine.

"And my sister—" I at length gasped out; "where is my sister?"

"Ay, come, Addy, and show yourself!" exclaimed the gaunt apparition, in a tone which betrayed at least as much asperity as affection. "Come and show yourself, child. Ye have no reason, that I ken of, to be ashamed of facing even your town-bred sister!"

And "Addy" did come forth from her hiding-place behind her aunt; and my romantic susceptibilities were somewhat chilled by the fact that while I had been imprisoned in the arms of Lady Flora, instead, as I anticipated, of being overwhelmed with emotion, curiosity, and awe, she had quietly divested herself of her traveling wraps, and was just giving a last touch to the glossy bands of auburn hair which were parted upon her forehead. I nevertheless opened my arms to receive her; but, instead of availing herself of the movement, she folded her hands primly over her bosom, and dropped me a courtesy which would not have been out of keeping at the close of a dancing lesson.

"Hech! child, is that what I bid you do?" harshly demanded the titled duenna. "Do you not know that Eve-leen is your own sister? Why should you not make free with her? Did you see me stand courtesying and making ceremonies? Are you not under your own mother's roof? And have you not as much right to expect a loving welcome as she has to offer it?"

The apparent automaton, upon this judicious, well-timed, and conciliating address, did as she was desired. The cheek was cold, however, which was pressed to mine, for our lips, as if through mutual disappointment, did not meet; the pulsations of the heart which for a brief instant beat against my own were calm and regular. I was altogether taken by surprise.

When we had seated ourselves, awaiting the announcement of refreshments, of which the travelers stood greatly in need—for Lady Flora had lived all her life beyond the Tweed, and made it a principle not to scatter her money upon the road—refreshments which, par parenthèse, she was provident enough to order as she passed through the hall, I had leisure to examine my two new companions. With the aunt my curiosity was soon fully satisfied. I felt that Lady O'Halloran herself would not have a word to say on that subject; and when I turned my eyes upon the niece, I discovered that she was similarly occupied with myself. What effect had been produced by my appearance upon the mind of my sister I could not, however, even guess. There was not a trace of emotion of any sort upon her countenance. She was as calm, as cold, and as composed, as though nothing had occurred for which she was not perfectly prepared.

As our eyes met, those of Adela were quietly withdrawn; and I pursued my survey in the intervals of a conversation in which I was little more than an auditor. It consisted of reminiscences of the road; comments on the grievous outlay to which they had been subjected by their journey; surmises of impositions, to which, nevertheless, Lady Flora could not attach any tangible proof; and other equally high-bred and interesting topics. I had, however, no alternative, save to sit by as patiently as I could, and endeavor to form some idea of what my sister might be, when relieved from the strait-waistcoat of her guardian's presence.

With her personal appearance I was astonished. She was decidedly not a beauty; nor did she give any promise of ever becoming such; but she had one of those piquante and peculiar faces which frequently prove more attractive than merely regular features. It was evidently a countenance capable of immense expression; although at the present moment it was as passionless and immobile as a pasteboard mask. She was unusually tall; indeed, in this particular, she had the advantage of me, for despite my year of eldership I stood no whit higher than herself; nor had she been under the roof of Rooksley many hours ere I discovered that if I had acquired elegance by study and long habit, my sister was no less gifted with a gracefulness to the full as desirable. Even disguised as she was in a costume in which I would not have permitted my waiting-woman to officiate at my toilet, this fact did not escape me; and it indnced a feeling of interest in the fair creature who displayed so much good material to work upon.

"And now, lassies," said Lady Flora, before we left the supper-room, where she had consumed a greater quantity of food than had ever been previously contemplated by the attendants; "now, we are all quite at home together, and shall, I dare say, get on weel enough. What Eve-leen does not know, you, Addy, can teach her; for I dare say her education, as they call it, has been but a strange rumgumfery o' useless and unprofitable nonsense; and if she should chance to know anything that you have not been taught, why, she can teach you. I shall say naething o' other things to-night. To-morrow will be a new day, and we shall soon understand each other."

I felt that we already understood each other; and my contempt for the new authority which had been set over me was so great, that an expression of scorn rose involuntarily to my lip, which I instantly discovered, by the deep flush that passed transiently over her face, was not lost upon my sister.

"I have consented to leave my home," pursued Lady Flora, turning the lounging-chair upon which she had been seated at table toward the fire, throwing herself back in an attitude infinitely more easy than graceful, and crossing her feet upon the fender, with an expression of well-fed resignation; "I have consented to leave my dear Glenfillan, for the first time in my life, in order to be useful to my sister and her children. It is na every one who is competent to take charge of two young ladies wi' noble blood in their veins, and coheiresses into the bargain." (I winced slightly, as she spoke; but, on looking into the placid face of my sister, the feeling vanished.) "I flatter myself, however, even although I have heard some sad rumors of your giddy doings, Eve-leen, that all will end conformably," continued the lady, very sententiously, while I felt my brow burn on discovering that the large brown eyes of Adela were riveted upon me. "You will have a gude example in your sister, and a still better one in me; for I am proud to feel that never from my girlhood even to the present day—or I should rather, perhaps, say night, for I'm afraid that its growing awfu' late—has any one ventured even to hint a doubt of the virtue and propriety of Lady Flora Glenfillan."

"I can quite believe it, madam," I said, with another saucy smile, as I looked her stedfastly in the face.

"And not only it was never doubted," she resumed, "but I may also boast that there never was cause for it to be sae."

"The one position is as easily credited as the other," I again replied, in the same tone. "A woman's reputation, like the water of the ocean, should not only be able to reject all impurities, but also to resist all taint; a task in which it is probably sometimes assisted by its natural nauseousness."

I was conscious that my sister started as the words fell upon her ear; and their cool insolence was too palpable even for the obtuseness of Lady Flora. She turned her small, light, gray eyes upon me with a questioning expression to which her lips did not, however, provide an echo. The trope had bewildered her, and she could not clearly see her way.

"It is no sma' thing," whistled the shrill voice once more after a moment's pause, "to root out a' one's old habits, and to leave all one's old friends, to live in a strange place and among strangers; and, had the present Lord Glenfillan been a little more civil and wiselike towards his own kith and kin, I do not know that I should have had resolution to upset all my plans and arrangements, to come wandering the world now-a-days; but to be shut out o' the castle, where I had been born and bred, was more than I could bear; and, besides, it was time that Addy made acquaintance with her nearest blood relations, and had a chance of showing what was in her; and the difference between a good, honest, steady education in the heart of the Highlands, and a flashy, tricky, ne'er-do-weel bringing-up by French flirts and fly away dancing-masters; and so you see, Eve-leen, here we are; and I shall be glad if, by doing my duty to my sister, I should haply be the saving of you, while it's yet time; for, being both my nieces—"

"Your ladyship will pardon me," I hastily and resolutely interposed; for I was now urged beyond my forbearance by the stolid self-sufficiency of the speaker, and felt that the struggle for supremacy must come, and that, consequently, the sooner it were commenced, the less difficult I should find it to assert my pretensions and to secure the victory; "your ladyship must really pardon me, if I disabuse you without further delay of the error under which you appear to be laboring. Neither Miss Adela Tilden nor myself have the honor of being your nieces. Our connection with you, through the medium of our mother, is at once slight and undefined. We are the descendants of the Earl of Glenfillan through his marriage with the Honorable Miss O'Finistree; and we claim no kindred with the race of Mac—something—I have really forgotten the precise name—from which you are yourself descended."

I shall never forget the pause which ensued. Lady Flora lay back upon her cushions, with her small eyes dilated, and her large mouth wide open. The demure countenance of my sister was bent down over the hearth-rug; and I sat erect, and panting with indignation and offended dignity, confronting my victim.

"Heard ever human ears the like?" at length ejaculated Lady Flora in a tone of horror. "Before Addy would dare to breathe such blasphemy against the family-name, she would consent to be laid in the family-vault. And you not fifteen! Well was it that my father, the earl, was carried there before these things came to pass!"

"You appear to have taken your present step under a delusion, madam," I said coolly, so soon as she had delivered herself of this somewhat irrelevant apostrophe; "and I consider it better at once to undeceive you. The inducement held out by Lady Madelaine, which has decided you to undertake the charge of my conduct and principles, is, of course, best known to yourself. That I should find your delegated authority essentially disagreeable, and discordant to all the past habits of my life, my mother very considerately hinted to me; and I as resolutely made up my mind to abate the annoyance to the uttermost of my power. I had consequently schooled myself to receive you with civility and respect—even to go further than this, if I found it possible, and to endeavor to look upon you as a family connection. You have, however, at once and forever relieved me from the extreme difficulty of such an attempt; for you have met me in the spirit of a task-mistress, and sought to humble me, not only in my own eyes, but even in those of a younger sister, utterly unknown to me until within the last few hours. This line of conduct, as unexpected as it is indelicate, quite exonerates me to my own heart, for the future; and, as my mother has decided that you are to be an inmate of Rooksley for some time at least, we had better come to an understanding at once. You have been pleased to depreciate, in by no means measured terms, the education which I have received. It is a system, nevertheless, that I have not the most remote intention to abandon, and in which it is more than probable that your ladyship will not feel the slightest interest. Your proposal that I should make it useful to my sister I accept cheerfully, for she is my sister—and I shall esteem it a happiness to be of service to her. This concession is, however, the only one which I feel inclined to make. In your eyes, I may probably be still too young to assume such a position, but I have been reared with different ideas; and an appeal to Lady Madelaine Tilden will convince you that I am quite capable of maintaining the resolution which, from your own overweening assumption of authority, and want of regard for my feelings, I have found it necessary to adopt at once."

I was somewhat overcome by my own effort at eloquence, but its effect was infinitely greater upon my auditor. She was absolutely transfixed with astonishment, and quite unequal to the emergency. It was, indeed, scarcely surprising that under the circumstances my indignation should have been great, for the transition was too violent and too sudden, from the adulation and encouragement of the refined and the educated, to the coarse comments and vulgar dictation of the ungainly woman before me. Feeling, nevertheless, that I had better not trust myself with further discussion, and satisfied that I should be wise to follow up the impression which I had visibly produced, I rose haughtily from my chair; and without giving my discomfited antagonist time to rally, I said, in a tone of sarcastic courtesy, "As I presume that we are all equally at home on all points at Rooksley, and, as your ladyship must need repose after such multifarious exertions, I will have the honor of wishing you good-night!" and laying my hand upon the bell, I rang for my maid.

Still Lady Flora was silent. She was half-frightened, and half-exasperated; while the scene in which I had enacted the tragic muse did not appear to discompose my incomprehensible sister in the slightest degree. She still wore the same expression of listless fatigue and unsympathizing ennui with which she had met my welcoming embrace; and, on the entrance of my attendant, when I had courtesied silently and distantly to the elder lady, she placed her passive hand in mine, and echoed my "good-night" as calmly as though she had never in her life retired to rest without our having exchanged a similar greeting.

When I reached my own apartment, and had hurried through the necessary duties in order to be once more alone, I dismissed Joséphine, and flung myself upon my bed in a paroxysm of passionate mortification. Was this the clinging, confiding, loving sister, whose affection was to repay me for every trial, and for every disappointment? Was this the guardian who was to control my destiny? This!

I need not expatiate on the result of my deliberations. I was at first startled at the extreme want of breeding and the homely idioms of Lady Flora, when I remembered that she was the sister of my dignified and fastidious mother, even prepared as I had been by the inferences and comments of the nursery (where my father's valet, during his period of favor with Mrs. Harris, had often beguiled the time by his broad sketches of the castle in the Highlands and its several inmates), to imagine that she differed greatly in all points from her more gifted and favored relative; I had only, however, to pass the salient points of her career in review, to feel that my astonishment was misplaced. The pupil of Miss Margery Macspleuchan, actually, if not nominally, deserted throughout her girlhood by her father—the despised step-child of a high-born mother-in-law—the tolerated companion of a half-sister, with whom she had neither taste nor sympathy in common—still dependent on the will and subjected to the contact of a vulgar aunt—the rejected kinswoman of the tenant of her dead father's home—and the great lady of a low circle, into which she was flung by circumstances, could not fairly be expected to make a very brilliant figure in the new position into which she was now forced.

Then came the question—How had my sister escaped? only to be followed by the more startling one of—Had she, in truth, escaped? and I felt a pang when I was obliged to answer my own query by the avowal that I could not judge. I had scarcely heard her utter a dozen sentences. I knew only that she was attractive and graceful in her person; with a voice of unusual sweetness, so slightly impregnated with the Scottish accent as rather to increase than diminish its charm; and that she had about her a collectedness and self-possession which would necessarily protect her against the vulgarity of which she had so fearful an example before her eyes. Altogether, she was an enigma. Lady Flora had even urged her to assert herself; but her ladyship had no Pygmalion touch, and the marble would not breathe.

At length I fell asleep, and dreamt that my sister was dumb, and that I was inventing a system of shorthand by which I might be enabled to converse with her; when suddenly the sounds of heavenly music stole upon my ear, and I saw her seated beside my bed, endeavoring to awaken me by the most delicious ballad to which I had ever listened. I saw her distinctly. There were the same soul-speaking, clear, brown eyes, the same attractive face, the same tall, slight, graceful form; but now every feature spoke; every lineament was redolent of radiant and loving expression; her gentle look was turned upon me; her fair arms were outspread to embrace me; we were indeed sisters, in heart as well as name.

It was a beautiful apotheosis!

CHAPTER XVI.

I was wide awake on the following morning for hours before Joséphine made her appearance, but I could not resolve to rise; for I felt that thenceforth I should be able to command no solitude save that which was afforded by my own apartment; and, for aught that I could tell, even that might, in its turn, be invaded by the extraordinary authority which it had pleased my mother to set over me. As I recalled the image of Lady Flora, I at times doubted if I were not bewildered by a wild dream, in which I had so blended fallacies with facts that I could not, at once, disentangle them. But no: the more I dwelt upon the events of the past evening, and the more I cast off the lingering trammels of sleep, the more I became conscious of the hideous reality. I felt sick and feverish with disgust; and I strove to put away the image of the elder lady, and to think only of my sister. Here, at least, there was interesting food for speculation. I could not have seen her in her real character. Such coldness and reserve were incompatible with her sex and youth; and under the peculiar circumstances of the case, almost impossible had she been a free agent. My dream, too! Had not my dream shown me what she really was, when delivered from the incubus of Lady Flora's presence? Yes—yes—I had found at once a sister and a friend. And then my vanity awoke. How I should astonish this mountain-maiden by the exhibition of my dazzling accomplishments; and how delighted she would be when I undertook to initiate her in the same brilliant mysteries! Her toilet, too, must be reformed; and she should make use of my wardrobe until her own was rendered available. I was full of projects; and still my harmonious and graceful dream gave a charm and a melody to all which related to this new-found sister. I even became anxious lest Lady O'Halloran should not do her justice, in her horror of the maiden aunt.

"I fear that the sleep of mademoiselle was disturbed last night," said Joséphine, as she drew back my curtains, and let in a glorious gush of sunshine.

"By no means; I never slept more soundly, nor dreamt more pleasantly."

"Then mademoiselle did not hear her sister?"

"Hear my sister! Why, what apartments did she occupy?"

"Those next to mademoiselle. It was the order of miladi; and madame la tante has the rooms opposite. The gallery is now full."

"Ah, indeed! And did my sister walk the said gallery all night, that you imagined she had broken my rest?"

"Point du tout," said the Frenchwoman, somewhat surprised at the inquiry, and marveling still more at any question from my lips; "but before she went to rest, la dame écossaise was an hour with her in her dressing-room, where they were employed in reading; after which Mademoiselle Adele sang a hymn; et vardi, c'est une belle voix!"

Sang a hymn! My own sister sang a hymn before she retired to her bed! I felt as though I had received a heavy blow. I could have better borne anything than this! I was so overwhelmed that I remained for an instant with my eyes riveted upon Joséphine, and utterly unable to articulate a word. A mocking smile sat on the countenance of the soubrette. She evidently enjoyed my discomfiture, but I was indifferent to her triumph. I had but one feeling of mortification, of disappointment, of humiliation. My dream had not been all a dream—and my only sister was—a Methodist! This was, indeed, an unlooked-for misfortune—an almost irremediable evil. She might have stayed away from church forever, and refused to set an example to the lower orders, as I occasionally thought it right to do; she would have met with no interference from me, nor should I have commented upon her absence; but to fall into the other extreme was so low, so unladylike! I had no distinct perception of the meaning of the term "Methodist," but I knew that it must be low, that it must be unladylike, for I remembered to have once heard Dr. James tell my father that nearly all the tradespeople at the post-town were Methodists; and I knew, moreover, that my mother had refused to suffer a servant who professed Methodism to be received into her household.

And now—here was my sister psalm-singing under her very roof! These were the results of Lady Flora's guardianship. Poor Adela's prospects were ruined, if once her delinquency was noised abroad. I had no longer any hope of seeing her make a figure in the world. Without this misfortune, with time, and my instructions, she might have been rendered presentable; but now all was over. Who could make anything of a Methodist? Of course, as she sang hymns, she sang nothing else; while dancing and drawing must be deadly sins. No wonder that she always sat in silence; she evidently considered it wrong to converse; so there was an end of all prospect of companionship. She might, under other circumstances, have consoled me for the advent of Lady Flora; but now it was a case of Gog and Magog; and I should be inevitably tutored, and prayed, and preached to death! How sincerely I pitied myself, I need not say; nor in how haughty and self-centred a mood I descended to breakfast. I had, at all events, sung no vesper or matin hymn.

Lady Flora had taken a violent cold, and remained in bed. How happy this casualty would have made me had it not been for Joséphine's unlucky news; but now I met my sister with a face as composed as her own; and while we uttered our earliest greeting, each extended her hand, and neither appeared to desire a warmer salutation. I ought to have remembered the holy calm, the delicious happiness which was shed over my dream, but I did not. I felt only that my sister was a Methodist!

There is a strange and startling power in that mystic word, especially to those who, like myself, were altogether ignorant of its meaning. I looked upon it as a kill-joy, as a marplot; and, worse than all, as something quite beyond the pale of fashionable society. "We are all born to trouble as the sparks fly upward;" but this was a trouble—a misfortune beyond all polite calculation! Even my mother, in her first outbreak of displeasure against me, could never have imagined or conceived that she was about to make me the daily and hourly companion of a Methodist.

When our almost silent breakfast was at length brought to an end, I proposed to my sister that we should pass into the saloon, as I was anxious to prepare for my music-master, whom I expected that morning. She complied in the same tame, listless manner which had, since her arrival, distinguished her bearing. My principal motive in this arrangement was, however, as my reader will at once have guessed, to astonish her by my musical proficiency. After a slight apology for leaving her to amuse herself for an hour, I seated myself at the harp, and began to prelude, with a rapid finger and a steady touch, which I felt convinced must electrify my solitary auditor, but my skill produced no such effect; or, if Miss Adela Tilden were indeed astonished, her surprise was sufficiently great to prevent all outward exhibition; for when I at length permitted myself to glance toward her, she was quietly lying back on a sofa, and deeply engaged upon a small volume which she had taken from her reticule—a book of Prayers, of course!

I withdrew my indignant eyes, and grew strong in the very recklessness of my mortification. My harp-master had lately brought to me a piece of music filled with elaborate and difficult passages; and although I as yet had studied it but imperfectly, still I felt satisfied that I had mastered its intricacies sufficiently to make an advantageous display before a novice like my sister. I accordingly commenced my undertaking with some little assumption of consequence—placed myself in a more studied attitude, and was difficult in the arrangement of my music-stand. At last, slapdash into my task I plunged, each moment in danger of being brought to a decided stand-still, and yet, thanks to my presence of mind, constantly extricating myself by some bold interpolation or omission, until I ultimately thundered through the last page.

Faulty as my performance had been, I nevertheless felt desirous of applause, and I accordingly turned toward my sister, and, in as modest a manner as I could accomplish, inquired her opinion, not of my own science, but of the rondo itself.

"I have no doubt that it is very fine," was the unmoved reply; "but I confess that I have found it impossible to follow all its movements. To me, possibly from my ignorance of the subtleties of harmony, there has seemed occasionally to be a great incoherency; but, as I before remarked, the deficiency was most probably in myself."

And she calmly resumed her reading.

I felt the blood rush over my face! I looked earnestly toward her, but I might with as much profit have consulted the ceiling for her latent meaning, if she really had one, as the immobile features that met my view. Still I was by no means satisfied, for I was conscious that the incoherencies alluded to had been quite perceptible to myself, and I began to apprehend that they might have been even more so to a listener. I was deeply mortified. My first effort at display had been a decided failure. I had neither courage nor temper to make another attempt; so, thrusting my harp from me, I approached the sofa on which my sister was seated, and inquired if she were musical?

"Not what you would consider musical, I am afraid," she said, with a faint smile. "I am no harpist, and know only enough of the more humble piano to set me above the necessity of troubling others to accompany my voice. Mine has been rather the teaching of nature than of art; but still, such as it is, it will at least enable me to return your own amiable endeavor to amuse;" and laying down her book, without one moment's hesitation, without one symptom of shyness or reluctance, she seated herself at the instrument.

Her account of herself had been a thoroughly correct one. She was by no means either a brilliant or a scientific musician; but she had not completed one stanza of the ballad which she had selected, before I perfectly understood that she had a faultless ear, and an unusually melodious voice. I thought of my patchwork rondo, and could have wept with annoyance at having so needlessly exposed myself

When she ceased singing, my sister rose as calmly as she had sat down, and again moved toward her sofa, but I resolved not to yield tamely to what I considered as a defeat; and therefore ringing for a servant, I desired that my drawing portfolios might be brought into the room. They soon appeared, and I did the honors of what my master had declared to be my performances, but which had derived no little advantage from his own skilful "finishing up," as demurely as I could. They were of a heterogeneous, or, as I should at that period have said, of an universal description. There was no style which I had left untouched; figures, flowers, landscapes, interiors, busts, and portraits.

Fortunately, idle young ladies and gentlemen had not then learned the art of degrading art, save by their imperfect efforts to portray it, so that my books contained neither poonah-paintings, nor transfer-pieces, nor japan-work, nor any other of those cheap, and despicable, and worthless monstrosities which in the present day are one of the triumphs of ignorant indolence over artist-aspiration.

My sister turned leaf after leaf with equal patience and placidity: she made no comment—she offered no criticism. She seemed to feel that by looking at each in turn, and persevering to the end, she had done all that could be expected of her; or, more encouraging thought! that here at least she must not venture an opinion.

"You paint, of course," I said, carelessly.

"Not at all."

"Nor draw?"

"Not, probably, as you understand the term. I can do none of these brilliant and showy things. I merely sketch from nature. I am an adopted child of the mountains, as you know, and needed little assistance to learn how best to make them all my own."

My sister was growing every moment more inexplicable—I had almost said, more provoking. She was certainly an extraordinary girl; as womanly for her years even as myself, but from totally different causes. We had not lived a week under the same roof, ere I discovered that, whatever advantage I might have over her in society by the greater variety and brilliancy of my acquirements, I must be particularly careful to avoid all rivalry in the higher and more solid branches of education. While I had been striving to attain to the fashionable jargon of my mother's set, she had been buried in books. While I had been talking, she had been thinking; and while I had been cheated out of my childhood by constant contact with a crowd, she had been beguiled of hers by the companionship of two staid elderly women, and the solitude of a mountain home.

Lady O'Halloran, who drove to Rooksley a day or two after the arrival of its new inmates, was enchanted with her.

The cold which Lady Flora had taken on the road proved more severe than she had anticipated, and she was still confined to her room, greatly to my relief. I, therefore, induced my kind neighbor to remain during the day, which, believing that she might benefit us by her presence, she readily consented to do. It required no great penetration on her part to discover the restraint which existed between my sister and myself; and with the most amiable zeal she at once endeavored to remove it; but the work of years can seldom be overthrown in a day. It requires extraordinary impulse and emotion to open hearts which have long been closed against each other; and we were alike, upon this subject, too indifferent for either. Had it been otherwise, Lady O'Halloran might in some degree have succeeded; for, by a happy coincidence, the post brought me that day a letter from my father, announcing his intention of running down to Rooksley to spend a week or ten days with his long-separated children, directly that parliament should be prorogued. My delight knew no bounds. A letter from my father—his first letter! Unlike the epistles of my mother, it contained no lurking sarcasm—no cold, dictatorial commands; no supercilious warnings;—it breathed only affection, hope, and confidence. I turned, full of joy, towards my sister.

"Do you know our father, Adela?"

"I have seen him twice."

"In the Highlands?"

"Yes."

I was silent for a moment. During the two years that I was left to the charge of menials at Rooksley, he had never sought me. A feeling of jealousy crept coldly over my heart; but I was too happy in the prospect of his promised visit to dwell upon this new mortification, and I once more turned to the letter. Lady O'Halloran, with instinctive watchfulness, had observed the change which came over me, and she hastened to exclaim:—

"But twice, my dear child, during your whole life! You have indeed been subjected to a deprivation beyond your comprehension. Now, however, we will trust that greater happiness is in store for you, for you cannot yet understand all the value of such a father."

"And yet, madam," said my sister, with more feeling than she had before betrayed, "you will believe that he is, nevertheless, very dear to me, when I tell you that to him I am, as yet, indebted for the few hours of hopeful happiness that I have ever known. It was from his lips I learned that I was not altogether an alien from the hearts and hearths of my parents, and that all the affection which they had to give had not been utterly poured out upon their first-born."

"And you have full proof that such was the fact," said our visitor, with good-humored eagerness. "You came into the world weak and sickly, my dear Miss Adela; the atmosphere of London was poison to your tender lungs; physicians recommended quiet and a bracing air until you should have grown to girlhood. Their injunctions were carefully observed; the period of trial is happily overpast; and now, here you are, under the same roof with your only sister, where I hope soon to see but one heart and one interest between you."

A bitter smile played about the expressive lips of Adela. Like myself, she felt at that moment the utter impossibility that such should ever be the case. Place the past in as kind and favorable a light as she might, Lady O'Halloran could not remove the conviction from my sister's mind that she had been the victim of an undue partiality for myself. While hundreds had already been lavished upon my education; while I was even now a woman of fashion in dress, in manner, and in self-possession, she had been comparatively left to her own moral resources for all progress. I say comparatively; for her next remark, still addressed to our guest, explained much in her acquirements and manners which had hitherto appeared to me inexplicable.

"The extreme care and anxiety which Lady Madelaine Tilden displayed to preserve my constitution from possible hazard, my dear madam, is an obligation which I am never likely to forget. Had she extended her solicitude to my education, it would undoubtedly have been still heavier; and the fact that my father did so, must be my apology, if all the filial affection which I have been able to call into action under the very peculiar circumstances of my position, are consequently centered upon him. To his care I owe the friendship and guidance of Mrs. Davenport, a lady whose widowhood reduced her income so considerably as to determine her, at the entreaty of my father, to take up her residence in a highland village, in order to superintend my education. She had formerly moved in the first circles of fashion, and she felt the contempt for such society which must pervade every well-regulated mind. She taught me to estimate at its just value the emptiness, hollowness, and falsehood of what is presumptuously enough called The World!—to hold time as too precious to be frittered away upon frivolous acquirements bereft of all intrinsic value; and to be sufficiently the mistress of myself to withhold my friendship and my confidence from the mere butterflies of vanity."

"And I should have decided that she acted wisely, my dear young lady," said Lady O'Halloran, with admirable calmness, as she marked the red and angry spot that was burning on my cheek at the covert sarcasm of the extraordinary girl beside her. "I should have decided that she had acted wisely, had she waited ten years longer before she inculcated a lesson of suspicion and self-righteousness upon a mere child, totally unable to substitute, for the brilliant trifles which she denounced, better and more solid qualities of mind and heart: or, had she shown sufficient good taste to ascertain what might be the wishes of your immediate relatives upon so serious a subject. At your age, you should have no misgivings, no doubts of others; it is only time and experience which can give the right to judge those about us; and who can tell the secret springs of soul which are touched to produce certain results, even then! Believe me—and I say it with regret—that upon so faulty a foundation as distrust and contempt of your fellow-creatures, a hideous superstructure of selfishness, arrogance, and prejudice may be easily built up. You must not be angry or offended at my frankness. I am your father's friend. I am anxious to see his children happy in each other. You have both much to undo, my dear girls. You have been estranged, as well in heart as in person, by peculiar circumstances. You are both suffering in feeling and in disposition from an extreme system of education. You have both been forced beyond your years; Eveleen, my dear Miss Adela, who will, I believe, enter upon her fifteenth birth-day next week, has been for years one of the 'butterflies of vanity' whom you have just denounced: you, who are barely fourteen, are putting forth dogmas more seemly for thirty or thirty-five—for the lips of matured womanhood—than for those of an inexperienced girl, who knows nothing of the world beyond the mountains which overhang the secluded home of her infancy, and the sentiments of, in all probability, an amiable but disappointed woman. Eveleen has been prematurely fashionable—you have been precociously wise—each, understand me, in your own conceit; and you are alike self-deceived. You have still much to learn. Now, take my frank advice, and you will both live to feel that it is worth attention. Endeavor each to profit by the good qualities, whether natural or acquired, of your companion, and the advantage will be mutual. It is this fancied superiority on both sides which will prevent all perfect understanding and all kind feeling between you. Divest yourselves alike of personal and mental assumption; be what Heaven willed that you should be, gentle, mild, and loving; and, trust me, you have long years of happiness and affection before you."

As the child of her friend, and as the victim of a mother's caprice, Lady O'Halloran was evidently prepared, even before they met, to encourage a partiality for my sister. Delighted by her intelligence, by the docility with which she listened to her admonitions and advice, and with the extraordinary development of her intellect, so broadly contrasted with my overweening vanity and violent deportment, she watched her narrowly, almost fondly; and, I verily believe, succeeded in persuading herself, before she left us that evening, that she thoroughly comprehended her character.

The result proved her mistake. Circumstances alone could develop so peculiar a nature. Never, without being false, was there such a reserved disposition. Adela spoke little—her explanatory speech to Lady O'Halloran, which I lately quoted, was, as far as I can remember, the longest I ever heard her utter—and when she did converse, it was deliberately and guardedly. Occasionally vehement, but never gay; gloomy rather than serious in her general mood; passionately fond of pleasure, while affecting to despise its frivolity; her wishes and her will were like a spring, of which the power increases in proportion to the violence of the means used to counteract it. Sufficiently pretty to feel it unnecessary to shrink from competition, endowed with a fair portion of her mother's haughtiness, and gifted with a happy appreciation of her own advantages, Lady O'Halloran at once decided that she already betrayed the elements of a superior nature. She was astonished to find a girl of fourteen possessed of so much presence of mind, strength of character, and that faculty, so rare among young people, of rapid decision, whenever she was called upon either to act or to offer any opinion. We were, in truth, most singularly contrasted. Gay, lively, and even giddy, where my spirits were excited, I was frank and open by nature, and what dissimulation I possessed was the extraneous produce of education; and was, at all times, ill-sustained, and easy of detection. Yielding, and weak of purpose, when opposed; readily led away by my own tastes, by example, and by novelty, I required alike guidance and restraint; and I should not, in all probability, have found a companion better suited to me than my sister, if we could, as Lady O'Halloran suggested, have divested ourselves of the false estimate which we had each made of our peculiar personal superiority, and placed confidence in one another. But from this we were a thousand leagues off. Our zealous friend pleased herself, nevertheless, by believing that, despite all which had gone before, we were still so young that the mere force of habit, when we had resided for a few months under the same roof, would produce affection, with all its blessed attributes of trust, and confidence, and peace. She forgot that all those by whom we were surrounded were not working in the same spirit as herself.

"Consummation devoutly to be wished,"

Adela, whose sickly infancy and weakly childhood had deprived her of the opportunities of physical exertion and healthful recreation which she could otherwise have commanded in her mountain solitude, was early thrown upon her own mental resources for occupation and amusement. The contracted ideas of Lady Flora, and the bitter retaliation of Mrs. Davenport upon a world from which her necessities had put her forth, were the only moral engines employed to direct and develop the extraordinary powers and feelings of the student-girl. No wonder that her mind and tastes were prematurely aged. I have before confessed that, in the sterner and more severe branches of education, she was greatly my superior. I felt and knew this; and the conviction should have brought with it a sense of humiliation. It had, however, a totally different effect. Not one of my sister's acquirements—save, indeed, that which taught her to give its full value to a voice of wonderful compass and harmony—was calculated to produce the slightest effect upon the circle in which she was destined to move. She had been educated for the closet, not the court.

I, on the contrary, was early suffered to let the higher and more precious powers of my intellect run entirely to waste. As regarded that species of knowledge which the old moralist declared to be "better than houses or land," I was profoundly ignorant. I had laid up no store for the winter of life. But then its sweet spring, and its blooming summer! There, indeed, I was unapproachable. I was already of the world, worldly. What though I might be deficient alike in self-knowledge and in knowledge of my fellow mortals, I was not the less a proficient in the argot of the drawing-room, and the affectations of fashionable society. I was preëminently handsome, perfectly self-possessed; I could take my position, like finished woman of the world; and as for all that lay deeper, all that was buried beneath the surface, and which must be dug for before it could be reached—cui bono? Once satisfied of my superiority, I resolved to give less way to the feelings which had surprised me on our first meeting. My affection had been flung back upon me; I had not been understood. Here again I was conscious that I took high ground, and I determined to maintain it. I had too long been accustomed to admiration and applause to quail before a course of dry reading and antiquated knowledge. The result may be imagined. Poor Lady O'Halloran had taken too much for granted when she asserted that time and propinquity would necessarily produce affection. They did quite the contrary. Neither Adela nor I would bend. We were like two young forest trees which had each followed a transverse direction; and the admonitions of the kind-hearted matron produced only the same effect upon us as an occasional gust of wind may be supposed to have produced upon the said saplings; they ruffled for a moment the fresh leaves of our self-love, even bowed us toward each other for an instant, as though attracted by a new instinct; and then rebounded the more sturdily to compel us to reassume our original position.

Before Lady O'Halloran left Rooksley, she reminded me of the promise which I had made to spend another day at the Hall before the close of the month, and I joyfully renewed the pledge. I felt that I had much to tell her in private, much to discuss, and, perhaps, something to justify. How was my gratification blighted, however, when I heard her extend the invitation to my sister—to Adela, of whom she knew absolutely nothing! I felt wronged, grievously wronged. That could no longer be esteemed a privilege which was so freely offered to a stranger. My heart leapt with indignation. I had passed months at Rooksley, abandoned, if not to the sole fellowship of servants —for from that degradation my own sense of propriety and natural pride of character had preserved me—at least to their unbroken contact; and no Lady O'Halloran had terminated my enforced solitude until urged to do so by my father; while, even before I had been allowed time and opportunity to feel that I had won the regard of my self-constituted friend, the same measure of civility was unhesitatingly meted out to my stranger sister!

It was a bitter moment. I felt as though I were deeply injured; and the more readily that Adela rather acquiesced in the arrangement than responded to the courtesy. To her the proposition and its result were evidently matters of equal indifference. She even made a stipulation that she would accompany me only in the event of an improvement in Lady Flora's health. The reservation was met by a smiling rejoinder, and thus the affair was definitely arranged.

Lady O'Halloran's pony-carriage was announced; and I entreated her to put on her bonnet and mantle in my dressing-room. She consented; and at length we were alone. I considered myself too seriously aggrieved to lose a moment in telling her precisely what I felt.

"Thank you, my dear Eveleen," she said, affectionately, as she seated herself upon the sofa, and drew me to her side, "for this natural and unaffected proof of your confidence and regard. My most earnest wish is, that I may win your love; yet, remember that I do not ask it all; I shall be content with just so much as you may be able to grant to me, without wronging those who have a right to claim affection from you. And now let us quietly discuss the subject of your complaint. Am I to understand that you have an objection to visiting in company with your sister?"

"No, my dear Lady O'Halloran: in that point of view, it is a matter of perfect indifference whether I am or am not accompanied by Adela; but, as regards yourself, I had hoped that you would have made some distinction between us, and that I should have been your most frequent guest."

"And wherefore?"

"Because I have learnt to love you, and I flattered myself that you would not overlook the fact."

"And it is in order to win also the affection of your sister that I wish to see as much as possible of her. She is an extraordinary girl, Eveleen—a very extraordinary girl; and I foresee that she will never steer a middle course through life—she will either be the victim of society or its tyrant. Hers is no common character, but she is, as yet, far too young for self-guidance. Would you envy her the possession of a sincere and disinterested friend?"

I turned away my head, and made no reply.

"Consider," continued my monitress, "how necessary such a resource cannot fail to be at her early age. The responsibility of depriving her of so essential a support would be a terrible one! Long estranged from her family, suddenly separated from the lady who had hitherto acted toward her the part of a mother as well as that of an instructress, plunged into new scenes, surrounded by new faces,—can you not imagine somewhat of the desolation of her young heart? Can you not believe that it yearns for companionship and kindness?"

"I am also an alien from my mother's hearth," I said moodily.

"Nay, nay, I admit no parallel in the two positions," persisted Lady O'Halloran. "Again, I entreat of you to recall the past to memory. While Adela was an exile whose very name was never uttered in her natural home, you were the petted child of luxury and indulgence; and yet she had the same claim upon her parents as yourself. You were a beauty, and as such you were cherished; your sister was declared to be plain and unattractive, and she was, according to the same parity of reasoning, put forth, and when such was possible, forgotten. But do you not see and feel how completely nature has revenged her? Do you not perceive under that calm and undemonstrative deportment, a gracefulness and self-possession as remarkable as they are charming! Neglected, as I am compelled to admit, even to you, that she has been, you ought to—"

"I am bound by no obligation which can regard Miss Adela Tilden, madam," I said, warmly; "it is from no fault of mine that she has suffered the evils which you have enumerated."

"Nor do I blame you for the errors of those over whom you can exercise no control," was the quiet rejoinder. "Had it been otherwise, and that you had even lent yourself to such injustice from motives of jealousy and selfishness, I should have despised you too heartily to evince the least interest or exertion in your fate. But surely this very negative and meritless fact of your non-interference does not exonerate you from the duty of endeavoring to make the present existence of your sister a bright and happy contrast from the past? Surely it does not place you beyond the pale of blotting out by your affection the mortifications which have hitherto been heaped upon her?"

"My affection!" I exclaimed, with strong emphasis; "believe me when I assure you, my dear Lady O'Halloran, that such a privilege is not reserved for me. I have already probed my sister's spirit to its depths; the only feeling which I have aroused in her heart is avoidance—aversion were, perhaps, the fitter word: she has been taught to dislike me, and she has been an apt pupil."

"Eveleen, beware!" said Lady O'Halloran coldly, as she rose from her seat, and folded her mantle about her; "reflect ere it be too late. Wide as is the world, the children of the same parents must inevitably sometimes meet in its paths. Strive then that neither of you may have cause to shrink from those meetings. Consider the old age of your father, when his daughters must be his prop and stay. Kneel and pray that you may be delivered from the prejudices by which you are enslaved. Let me see you soon at the Hall, happy in each other's affection. And now—good night!"

CHAPTER XVII.

Lest my reader should tire of Rooksley, and above all, of myself, I will at once transport him, or her, to Grosvenor Square, and relate what had occurred in Lady Madelaine's immediate circle before the arrival of my sister in England. The Putney villa was declared perfect. My mother, who had carried out all her projects most triumphantly, was in high beauty and spirits, and at the very acmé of her popularity. Very few persons had ever seen the tall daughter of whom she had found it expedient to rid herself for a year or two, and still fewer cared to remember her. Lady Madelaine, at very infrequent intervals, made some vague allusion to "the children"—always a safe and indefinite species of phraseology as to age, like the garçon of France, and the post-boy of our own country—but she risked nothing beyond a bare mention of their existence, considering it both impertinent and unnecessary to do more.

Miss Alexander had eloped with a French marquis, very poor and very proud; and (as French marquises were, during my girlhood, most interestingly scarce) she returned to town after her marriage, quite satisfied to have bartered her five hundred a year for the title of madame la marquise. Poor Caroline was still constant to her truant admirer; who, when he was not worshiping the bright eyes of my mother, was dreaming beside Lady Devereux, who, in her turn, was daily losing in beauty what she gained in exigence. Emily Vernon had dismissed Mr. De Clifford; she was still living, or rather existing, in a fool's paradise; she was still struggling to believe that Otterford loved her, for he lost no opportunity of telling her so whenever they chanced to meet in private; and although his actions continued to belie his words, how could she doubt him, when she was only too conscious that her happiness and her life alike depended upon his truth? Alas! for the woman who gives away her heart, where she receives only asseveration in return! Alas! for the faith that builds up its strength upon the honor of a roué, which, like the pine-tree, produces neither blossom nor fruit.

And what of Otterford himself? I may have seemed to deal harshly toward him; for, hitherto, my readers will have discovered no symptom of profligacy in him; and those of his own sex will have readily forgiven the little duplicity of which I have shown him to be guilty. Women, according to the creed of the said sex masculine, are infinitely too credulous; they should be more cautious before they yield to feelings too powerful to be combated by creatures so weak of mind and so fragile of frame. It is a happy argument, and a safe one, for they are not likely themselves to test its truth. Ay, truly: women who were created to be chosen, not to choose, should be born suspicious, calculating,. and selfish: the will which is after marriage to be as pliant as the stem of the osier, should be previously firm and immutable, until reason and interest have convinced it of the safety and expediency of abandoning its perpendicular, and yielding to the force of circumstances.

There may be some slight inconsistency in such an argument; perhaps, also, a little want of generosity; but it has long been decided that such ought to be the case; and there is little probability that an opinion so acceptable to the more lordly portion of the community will ever be rescinded.

Unfortunately for her, poor Emily was strangely deficient in this species of world-wisdom. Lord Otterford had told her that he loved her; he had even sworn it upon his knees: he was young, earnest, handsome, and attractive. She saw him welcomed in every circle, even where he appeared the least anxious to please. He had assured her that, however trammeled by the exacting vanity of Lady Madelaine, he loved her only. Simple-hearted, affectionate, and grateful, she had believed him—she had no alternative. Blame her not, however, ye who have shared a brighter fortune: for she was expiating, fearfully expiating her error, by her failing health and her breaking heart.

Revenons à notre loup. Otterford was becoming weary of the constraint in which he had so long lived. He was consistent even in his vices. He had not been the slave of Lady Madelaine's caprice simply pour l'amour de ses beaux yeux; he had no such weakness; the triumph was inadequate, and Otterford was a militarian in his way. Time and opportunity were the capital upon which he trafficked, and he had already made great sacrifices to obtain a very inconsequent return. And yet—nothing could seem more promising. He was l'ami de la maison: the favored cavalier of its lovely mistress; and she was, in her turn, if not a forsaken, at least a délaissée wife: whether by her own agency or the will of her husband signified little. The fact itself sufficed. Otterford argued calmly, and the rather that he was perfectly aware of the ten thousand a-year which my father had settled upon his high-born bride. It is pleasant for a man of fashion to win a fine woman who can never become à charge; indeed, 't is doubtful that, had he been ignorant of this small chapter of Lady Madelaine's private history, he would have so long pursued his project. Be that as it may, however, he had begun to think that the probation had endured long enough; and that, as Mr. Tilden had appeared to be thoroughly blind, and Lady Madelaine perfectly self-centered and fearless, it was quite time that the catastrophe of the drama should be played out.

That my mother had never contemplated such a finale to her innocent and amusing flirtation, and was satisfied that her smiles must overpay all the adoration which she so blandly and quietly accepted, I am quite convinced; for the egotism of her vanity would scarcely permit her to form any other conclusion; and she was consequently not at all likely to suspect the abstruse calculations of her most devoted slave. She might as well have been expected to nurse a presentiment of his declared passion for Emily; Lady Madelaine, all woman of fashion as she was, could not be considered (regarding the expression in its just sense) as a woman of the world. True, she was acquainted with its elegances, its conventionalities, its caprices, its shallow faith, and even its hollowness; but of its actual vices she was nearly ignorant. Of its systematic sentiment, commencing in mawkish affectation, adopted as a resource against ennui, leading to folly and imprudence, and terminating in dishonor, she had, of course, heard more than once; but always as of something extraneous and antipodean, with which she could, individually, have no possible interest or connection. Such matters were to her the mere on-dits of the day; the food which nourished the bitter persiflage of polished society; and happy indeed are those whose rare and enviable fate it is to live and die without further enlightenment upon so ungrateful and ungraceful a subject. Such, however, was not to be my mother's destiny.

It was a mild, bland morning—one of those delicious intervals, which, extraordinary as it appears to those who ever speculate upon the several degrees of comparison which exist between causes and effects, sometimes induce even the pleasure-worn and selfish votaries of fashion to believe that there may exist something for which it is not altogether impossible that it might be really worth while to live even beyond the confines of the metropolis—a lingering, sickly, ill-nurtured remnant of original purity and nature, which the hot and fetid breath of dissipation and idleness cannot always contrive to destroy, try it as it may. Every one who has run the gauntlet through half a dozen seasons in London is well aware of the description of morning to which I allude; just before the close of spring; I mean really spring, when the race of social extravagance and folly is at its height; when the mignonette in the balconies, forced into premature bloom in order to "meet the demand" six weeks before it was intended to blossom under the more genial sunshine of unassisted nature, is beginning to turn golden under its coat of dust and soot; when the grass of the parks is bald in patches, and grimy as a whole; when milliners grow consequential, and fine lady-customers conciliating, affable, and persuasive. Such was the precise moment at which occurred the morning in question; and, as my mother was undergoing the subtle penance of Mademoiselle Félicie's taste in the selection of half a dozen new head-dresses for the campaign of the ensuing week, she chanced, on one occasion, most accidentally to glance towards the garden of the square instead of into her toilet-glass; and although the turf wore a sickly tint as though the soil beneath could afford but grudging nurture, and the trees bore a great resemblance to the "stock in trade" of an umbrella and cane merchant, which had been suddenly induced to sprout by some occult influence, they nevertheless reminded her of the beauty of the season; and forthwith she remembered Putney, and the shrub-belted lawn which stretched down to the Thames. The moment was propitious; she was free until the hour of dinner—she had neither made a new friend whom it was necessary to see at least once during the twenty-four hours, nor had she discovered an old intimate whom it was necessary to hate; and she had, consequently, nothing of importance on her hands; while, fortunately, all the half-dozen coiffures were so unbecoming, that everything like indecision was out of the question, and therefore they created no delay.

"Take away all those horrors, Félicie, and order the open carriage for Putney," she said, suddenly; "giving strict charge that it come round instantly."

The soubrette disappeared.

"I slept wretchedly last night," yawned Lady Madelaine when her waiting-woman re-entered; "I shall go alone; the fresh air from the river will refresh me."

"But miladi will be ennuiée en route," suggested Félicie in some surprise.

"No—I shall endeavor to sleep. Desire that the paper which contains Mr. Tilden's last speech may be put into the landeau. Jervis will know which I mean. It is on impressment, or colonization, or the bread bill, or something of that sort. She will find it in one of the morning rooms."

The waiting-woman rang for her deputy; and having, in all probability, a project of her own which the absence of her lady would by no means tend to mar, very speedily arranged the new costume which had so suddenly become necessary; and my mother then descended to the library to await the appearance of her equipage.

There was something very delicate and touching in Lady Madelaine's idea of making the eloquent speech of her husband the companion of her suburban excursion. It was wifely and womanly. But, alas! we have it upon record that the Princess Talleyrand, being desirous on one occasion to do homage to the talent of Denon, by affecting an acquaintance with his writings, and unhappily confusing his name with that of Defoe, whose Robinson Crusoe was one of the few books that she had ever really read, inquired, during a pause in the dinner at which he was an honored guest whom the prince was anxious to conciliate, "What had become of his man Friday?" and I am greatly afraid that, had any one been indiscreet enough to ask Lady Madelaine, in her opera-box that evening, the actual subject of the aforesaid burst of eloquence with which my father had electrified the Commons, and which shared her drive to Putney, they must have contented themselves with an equally lucid description as that with which Felicie had previously been favored.

The little impromptu excursion was delightful. The atmosphere, when once the close streets were left behind, was redolent of sweetness. The breeze came lovingly to the cheek and brow of my mother; and she sank luxuriously upon her padded silk damask, and slept quietly; while Psyche, her favorite and petted spaniel, amused its ennui by tearing to pieces the printed record of my father's parliamentary prowess. Suddenly, however, both were startled by the rapid galloping of a horseman who appeared to be endeavoring to overtake the carriage; and the noise of whose approach rendered the high-bred bays who drew it somewhat unmanageable. Their uneasy movements dispelled Lady Madelaine's slumber; and, as she looked up suddenly, the first object upon which her eyes rested, was the scrupulously well-gloved hand of Lord Otterford, resting upon the side of the landeau. For the only time, perhaps, since they had been acquainted, my mother blushed instead of smiling her welcome; for, unaccountable as it may seem, she had really wished to be alone for two or three hours; and, as it was a wholesome inclination which might have produced a good result, the more beneficial from its novelty, it was provoking enough that she was fated to disappointment.

"You are doubtlessly bound Putneyward, my dear Lady Madelaine, since I find you here?" he commenced, as he lifted his hat. "Nothing was surely ever so pleasantly devised. I caught a glimpse of your equipage as I turned an angle of the road; and here I am ready to protect you in your rural reveries; and to prevent your running the chance of losing yourself so far from St. James's, and becoming a novel specimen of a demoiselle errante, without her knight."

"I am not quite sure that I shall admit of your attendance," was the languid reply; "the day is so lovely, and I am so desœuvrée and exhausted that I really want rest—added to which I wished to say something civil to Mr. Tilden concerning his Wednesday night's speech, which every one who meets me is perpetually complimenting me upon, and of which I have not read a word; and I intended to skim it over in one of the lawn chairs; though that part of my plan is, I see, rendered abortive, Psyche having disposed of the paper in a manner more consonant to her own ideas of its value."

"And do you actually intend to be so cruel as to refuse me the pleasant office of remplaçant to a torn gazette?"

"I have, at all events, no seat to offer you here. Pysche must not have her airing spoilt by your presuming caprices."

"I submit. Haroun will walk quietly beside your triumphal car," said Otterford laughingly, as he bent low over the neck of his beautiful Arabian, which made a mute reply to his caresses. "Only promise that when you alight, you will not issue orders to your seneschal to shut the gates upon me as I gain the boundary of Eden."

My mother, half-pleased and half-annoyed, smiled again; and then, throwing herself back in the corner of the carriage, closed her eyes, and affected to renew her reverie. She had nevertheless, not only no fear, but not even the most vague suspicion of Otterford's real principles; but she was proud. She believed, in her heart of hearts, that she had never been degraded by the most idle breath of calumny. She felt satisfied that she was perfectly irreproachable. How could it be otherwise? She was constantly in a crowd. She admitted no tête-à-tête, and, therefore, if men of fashion chose to afficher themselves as her admirers under the eyes of the public, the fault was wholly their own, and she had nothing whatever to do with it. She was, herself, perpetually en évidence; made no mysteries; encouraged no penchants; maintained her own dignity; never uttered a word of which her husband might not have been an auditor; and—consequently—she defied the world!

It is to be supposed that my mother did not probe her conscience too deeply. All operations are irksome and painful; a self-inflicted smart is never a favorite amusement with any of us. How then could it be imagined that a young and flattered beauty would submit to writhe beneath such unprofitable and uninviting penance? And yet—as she remembered that she was on the brink of a lengthened tête-à-tête with Otterford amid the solitude of her suburban villa, visions of a score of Mrs. Grundys, with mob-caps and ruffles, sharp eyes, and shrill voices, rose upon her mental perception with appalling distinctness. But in the next instant she felt a contempt for her own weakness. Was she to suffer the idle and ignorant gossipry of a few ill-natured and (what was worse still) ill-bred women, to control her movements, and to decide upon her motives. She replied to her own question by a laugh of mockery.

And in five minutes more they reached the villa.

"Never was there a more charming device than this marble basin filled with lilac lotus, Lady Madelaine," said Otterford, when he had handed my mother from the carriage, and, arm in arm, they had reached the river-front of the house: "to me, a lawn like a green baize cloth, without ornament or relief of any kind, is as insipid as a water suchet, or your dear friend Devereux's wife."

"H-u-m!" intonated my mother; "I cannot quite agree to the position. A handsome lawn is always an agreeable object, and perfectly harmless, at all events."

"I stand corrected," said the gentleman.

with mock gravity; "and beg to rescind my secon' comparison; for, according to your more correct view of the case, it does not by any means apply."

"Which object did it involve?" asked my mother, laughingly; "the fish or the lady?"

"I am compelled to confess to the bella e cara."

"Surely you do not attempt to imply that Lady Devereux—"

"Is a woman, and a withering beauty? Yes, I do. And did you, fair lady, ever know one such fraction of society who was not a viper? If you can conscientiously lay your hand upon your heart and say 'Yes,' then will I tell you, what, before such an avowal, I believe to be an utter impossibility, and—"

"And that is—?"

"That you can really be in error as well as the rest of your sex."

The lady blushed, and said "Pshaw!" but she nevertheless accepted the compliment very calmly; and as she seated herself under a willow, and motioned her companion to a chair beside her, she remarked quietly—"I cannot account for the fact, but it is certain that you never did like poor Lady Devereux."

"Do you consider it remarkable that such should have been the case?" asked the gentleman, gathering up half a dozen loose stones from the gravel, and throwing them at regular and slow intervals into the water.

"Most assuredly I do. She is so generally a favorite."

"There was a time when that circumstance alone would have sufficed to make me detest a woman," was the incorrigible reply.

"How truly absurd!"

"Shall I tell you to whom I am indebted for having cured me of the said absurdity?"

"You had better not, if it be a secret. You know the proverb, 'Se il segreto è confidato, non è più segreto.'"

"Ha, indeed! is that your creed?" demanded the gentleman, somewhat maliciously; "I must in that case answer you by another; "'Chi ben serra, ben apre.'"

"I do not understand you."

"No! and yet it is as fair Italian as your own."

My mother bit her lip, and turned aside. She felt displeased, although she scarcely knew wherefore.

"Then you do not care to learn my mystery?" pursued her companion.

"It can be matter of interest only to yourself," was the chilling reply.

"True, very true," said Otterford, bitterly; "I was to blame to imagine that it could be subject of concern to any other person; and I should also have remembered that I am now too old to play the coxcomb gracefully."

Lady Madelaine was no whit appeased. On the contrary, she became more irritable and uneasy than before.

"And yet, it is just possible," continued Otterford. "Do not mistake me, Lady Madelaine; I simply say it is just possible—that, in the present instance, you may not have altogether pronounced an absolute verity. Indeed, I venture to affirm that, in this particular case, you have assuredly not done so; for it is to yourself that I am indebted for emancipation from this unjust and ungenerous prejudice."

"To me, my lord! You surely jest."

"By no means. At a moment like the present, when all my words are taken au grand sérieux, I want courage to presume so far."

"You are actually childish," said my mother, forcing a smile.

"I trust that childhood is too happy an age to know the miserable feeling with which I last spoke."

"Again I repeat, Otterford," said Lady Madelaine, hurriedly, but less coldly, "that I do not understand you."

"I begin to fear that you have never done so."

"You are really inexplicable to-day—a perfect sphinx. You profess to love the country, while you make, in truth, a miserable Celadon."

"Is that my fault?"

"Most decidedly. Am I to blame for this, also?"

"I adopt your own words—most decidedly."

"You really put me beyond my patience."

"You have long tried the same experiment upon me."

Lady Madelaine gasped for breath. What could this mean? She felt that she was crimson; something told her that she ought to be displeased; and she was intuitively conscious that she should at once terminate so singular a dialogue. She did not hesitate for a moment. She had, unfortunately, ordered luncheon as she alighted; and she saw at once that she had no plausible pretext for leaving the house without partaking of it; for she shrank from the idea that Otterford should suspect her alarm; and accordingly she rose as he ceased speaking, and complaining that the river-breeze had affected her head, proposed that they should return to take some refreshment, and order the carriage.

The gentleman obeyed without uttering a syllable; and, gravely offering his arm, they passed through the French doors into the dining-room, in utter silence.

The movement of my mother was as natural as it was ill-judged. In her anxiety to escape from a continuance of so inauspicious a dialogue, she forgot that the seat upon which she had originally placed herself partially protected her: she could only be verbally annoyed, overlooked as was the lawn from the river on one side, and by the windows of the villa on the other; whereas, by entering the house, she rendered the solitude of her position infinitely more decided. If she were blinded to this fact by her increasing agitation, it is not, however, to be supposed that her companion was so completely a novice as to be so likewise. He did not attempt to controvert the abruptness of her resolution, for which mark of consideration toward her she felt grateful; and she almost began to doubt if she had not been deceived by her own fears. She accordingly seated herself at the table with more calmness and self-possession than she had expected; and during the attendance of the servants, sustained a desultory conversation with her chance-guest with very commendable indifference. This was, however, fated to be somewhat shaken by the intelligence that her coachman had discovered a loose shoe upon one of the horses, which it was necessary to secure before her return to town. Instinctively, in her first vexation, she glanced toward Otterford; but he did not appear to have even heard the sotto voce communication of the servant. He was busily employed in arranging a number of bread-crumbs which had been scattered beside his plate into a variety of miniature ramparts, extremely ingenious and imaginative.

This, at least, was consoling; and Lady Madelaine, having desired that all possible haste might be made, saw the man depart without any visible feeling of misgiving. She nevertheless retained her seat at the table, and for a moment remained silent; but, conscious of the awkwardness of such a silence at such a time, she suddenly affected great interest in the elaborate invention of the impromptu professor of fortification.

"I was not aware," she said, hurriedly, anxious only to break the stillness, "that you were so skilful a master of the art of defence."

"It has long been necessary for me to encourage the study," replied Otterford, raising his large, earnest eyes to her face; "for during the last—I was about to say, fifteen years, but I dare not, as it would involve others beside myself—I have constantly been called upon to defend myself against misconstructions, disappointments, cold hearts, and malicious tongues."

"You really make me smile," said Lady Madelaine, forcing a poor attempt at raillery. "You who are so thoroughly the enfant gâté of the world—that were it not for half a dozen individuals, who have evinced sufficient moral courage to doubt your perfectibility, you would at this moment be little better than unbearable."

"I am greatly indebted to their very kindly exertions," was the retort; "and am possibly the most so to your ladyship for the formation of so notable a clique of critics."

"By no means. I only joined their ranks."

"From some well-reasoned conviction, I have no doubt; and perhaps with more cause than many who have enrolled themselves."

"I complain of nothing very heinous."

"And yet, upon consideration, you might have done so."

"I wished to be a generous opponent, and the more so, that I was conscious of being in a minority."

"I would much rather that you had shown resentment than cowardice."

"Resentment?"

"Even so. Do you remember, Lady Madelaine, that I have known you for seventeen years?"

"Perfectly. Can no modern philosopher discover a means of staying the progress of time?"

"Can you recall the period," pursued the gentleman, regardless of the question, "when you made your first appearance in society under the guardianship of that paragon of chaperones, Lady Sinclair, with a face and form which set competition at defiance, and a heart as proud as it was pure? You may have forgotten it, but I never shall."

"And am I to resent your having known me at that happy time?"

"Yes, and no: in one respect you dare not hold me in displeasure, for you are well aware that I no sooner saw you than I became your devoted slave."

"A romantic appellation, truly, for the partner of a drawing-room flirtation!"

"You are not ingenuous, Lady Madelaine Tilden; did your clever and careful aunt permit such 'drawing-room flirtations,' save where she thoroughly approved the possible results? I think not. Thus far I have, I trust, proved that I was worthy of your notice—of your friendship—of your companionship—for I was fully conscious of the value of the privilege which had been accorded to me; but although I enjoyed it long and intimately, and although I had not hesitated to afficher myself as the devoted slave (for I persist in maintaining my personage) of the new idol; still, on the death of Lady Sinclair, Reginald Otterford went on the Continent—a bachelor; and the Marguerite des Marguerites returned to the Highlands—Lady Madelaine Glenfillan."

"My lord, you astonish me!" said my mother, haughtily.

"Nay, nay; believe me that you mistake the term; I only remind you, nor should you take offence at the frank confession which I am making of my sins. Look you; I have leveled one of my outworks in token of a first defeat. You had every reason and every right to expect an explanation at my hands."

"I am at a loss to know to what climax such a conversation, or almost, I might say, such a monologue as the present, is to tend?"

"Simply to my own self-justification."

"It is perfectly needless, my lord. Nothing had ever passed your lips by which I was entitled to believe that you considered yourself compromised; nor had I ever given you the slightest reason to infer that you were otherwise than perfectly indifferent to myself."

Her companion quietly shook his head, as he again, with great composure, fixed his eyes upon hers, which were flaming with insulted pride; and there was a strangely withering intonation in his voice, as he said—"You do not do yourself justice by such an assertion. Custom has placed a padlock upon the lips of women, of which society keeps the key; but custom and convention, and even policy itself, can do no more than this, while human beings possess eyes, and hearts, and preferences. Either I was then beloved, or you were not the pure being before whom I poured out my worship; and this I will not think. No, no—you could not at that early age have been a callous, cold, and calculating coquet—one of those heartless and selfish triflers with the happiness of others, who have studied to a nicety how far they may make a traffic of a man's feelings with safety to themselves. I would not overthrow the bright and beautiful visions of seventeen years, to embrace so foul a creed for all my future hopes in life. You loved me, then, or there is no truth in nature!"

My mother silently laid her hand upon a silver bell beside her. She could not trust herself to speak. The summons was instantly answered, and her inquiry for the carriage met by the information that the horse had not yet returned from the village forge. Poor Lady Madelaine was not aware that the groom of Lord Otterford always obeyed the directions of his noble master to the letter, and that he had accordingly subdued all symptoms of undue impatience on the part of her ladyship's coachman in a way which did him honor.

They were once more alone; and then, and not till then, the gentleman resumed the thread of his discourse.

"This point conceded, then—for, in order to cast the responsibility of this cold parting wholly upon me, it is necessary that it should be so—may I not, in extenuation of my self-abnegatory offence, explain the cause which induced me to silence, where inclination, tenderness, and honor appeared to exact an explanation?"

"It were worse than idle to impose so ungracious a task upon you," said my mother, bitterly. "It was my want of fortune."

"Say rather that it was my own," interposed Otterford, "that it was my poverty—my debts—which closed my lips, and only left me the more keenly susceptible of my own uncalculating and egregious folly! Still, something whispered me that we should meet again, and I fled from London in order to retrench, and give myself room for hope when that meeting came. We did meet again," and a disdainful smile played for an instant round his proud lips; "but how!"

"Surely, my lord," gasped my mother, "you have forgotten that I am a wife!"

"Forgotten it!" exclaimed Otterford, as he started from his chair, and began to pace the room, with hasty and uneven steps. "Can I forget my own vitality? Can I forget that I have flung the whole tide of my affections on the thirsty sands! I pray you not mock me by such a supposition!"

"What am I to reply to rhapsodies like these?" faltered my mother. "You take an ungenerous advantage of our momentary seclusion, of which I have ever hitherto believed you incapable. Once more let me enjoin you to remember that I am a wife."

"You are," said her companion, pausing immediately beside her; "you are: the haughty and high-born daughter of Lord Glenfillan—the star of fashion—the beloved of all—the fair prize which so many were eager to win and wear—had woven out a new and erratic destiny for herself before our second meeting came. The peer's daughter had become the wife of an obscure and nameless (for he was nameless then at least)—of an obscure and nameless commoner—the bright star had shot downward through the heavens—the idol had overthrown her own shrine—the prize had been awarded, none could understand wherefore, until the name of Lady Madelaine Tilden was to be seen written in diamonds and gold-dust in every resort of luxury and fashion. And yet—although I knew this—although I was compelled to admit it to my own heart, still—" and, as he suffered the apparent mortification of his disappointment to carry him along by its impetuous violence, he possessed himself of my mother's hand: "still was I fated to remain the victim of my blighted and unlucky passion. And now—now—when I have suffered the long martyrdom of years—when I have, if not patiently, at least guardedly, lived within the spell of your resistless influence, with all my old hopes and aspirations still clinging closely about my spirit—even now, will you not acquit me of either word, or look, or action, calculated to pain you?"

"I could have done so this morning."

"And have you not pronounced your own condemnation by thus acquitting me? Can you venture to assert that you feel no self-reproach at having permitted the perpetual worship of a devoted heart without one quickening pulse?—without one grateful feeling? It cannot be—it shall not be!" and still retaining the captive hand, he flung himself on his knees before his quailing and speechless victim. "By heaven! you have long known and understood the impulse upon which I acted: you offered no resistance to the exclusiveness of my attentions—either your heart or your vanity has spoken loudly for me, and I will not believe that it could be so pitiful an influence as the last, upon which you coldly saw fit to hinge my destiny. Why, then, noble and high-hearted woman, do you thus, year after year, persist in playing the tyrant and the pride, when—"

"Enough, sir, enough!" exclaimed my mother, in a shrill whisper, and with quivering lips, as white as the hand which she proudly withdrew from his clasp; "you have said more than enough. I am sufficiently humbled. I have mistaken both you and myself. I will utter no reproach—I can find none which would suffice for so cruel and cowardly an attack. We meet henceforth as strangers; and I now spurn you as I would cast a foul reptile from the folds of my veil."

As she ceased speaking, Lady Madelaine prepared to pass into the garden, a movement which her companion sprang from his knee to prevent; and as she was in the act of placing her foot on the gravel, he seized her arm, exclaiming—"Do not hope it, madam, we part not thus!"

"Fie—for shame, my lord," said the lady, as she paused, and looked upon him with an eye as cold as stone, and a contemptuous smile, which made his pulses beat with liquid fire; "have you no mercy upon an unprotected woman? Am I to be subjected also to violence under my own roof?"

There was a majesty in the magnificent beauty and suppressed indignation of my mother, which did not fail in its effect even upon her dissolute companion. Without another effort to detain her, he removed his grasp; and, bowing stiffly, followed her to the water's edge, where they stood for a few instants side by side in perfect silence, and it was, probably, no slight relief to either when Lady Madelaine's carriage was announced. Lord Otterford assisted her to enter it with as much care and courtesy as he had shown on all former occasions; and then, haughtily raising his hat, he vaulted into the saddle, and galloped off in the direction of London, while my mother, burying herself as much as possible among her cushions, gave free way to her pent-up feelings, and wept bitterly.

CHAPTER XVIII

It is really curious, in after-life, to look back upon the various incidents by which our past existence has been diversified, and even governed in its great outline, or by which its interests have been involved so inextricably as to have operated even upon our most sacred and secret relations; and then to weave their antecedents and their results into its checkered web, with the aid of time and experience. Episodes, incomprehensible at the moment of their introduction, fall quite naturally into their places during these reminiscent reveries, although they appeared at the instant of their occurrence alike extraneous and impertinent; and events, once considered as extraordinary and altogether gratuitous, prove to have been only the natural result of a certain line of conduct, and a certain succession of ideas, and to form no more than a regular link in the great chain of calculation and expediency.

But enough of such reflections as these, which only serve to sadden the writer and to weary the reader, without making either the one or the other a jot the wiser. They might be all very well in the time of our great-grandfathers, when people had much more leisure—when gentlemen made their wills before journeying from York to London, and dispatched bulletins of health to their anxious families at the close of every longer stage than usual—when ladies made one piece of tapestrywork extend over a whole life—and young men served, like Jacob, seven years for their wives. Then, indeed, a grave thought or a serious apothegm might have been welcome, pour passer le temps; but it is not so with us; we, who are incessantly running after him, to hold him back, and seldom clutching even a single feather for our pains. Such being the case, I will at once resume my narrative.

By the way, this allusion to the said narrative reminds me that I ought to congratulate myself upon my original resolve to declare myself guiltless of all design to perpetrate a novel. I never had any such intention. I could not have done it if I would. I have attempted nothing beyond my own personal history—and surely, fair ladies and formidable critics, I have a right to do that as I please! Nevertheless, I will pledge my faith willingly to be as veracious as a traveler, as conscientious as a moneylender, as self-denying as an alderman, and as prudent as a newly emancipated heir: and having volunteered thus much, let the ladies and the critics quarrel with me—if they can.

It is scarcely necessary to remark that I knew nothing of the adventure related in the last chapter for years after its occurrence; and I was comparatively astonished by the receipt of a letter from my mother, which followed closely upon that of Mr. Tilden, to announce her intention of being his companion to Rooksley; in order, as she said, to welcome the new-comers, and to judge by her own observation, in how far I had myself profited by the salutary solitude to which she had found it necessary to subject me, with a view to the correction of my unfortunately imperious and overbearing temper. Had I been aware at the time of the actual cause of Lady Madelaine's sudden solicitude, and her anxiety to absent herself from town, it is probable that I should have been very differently affected.

"Here is a letter from our mother," I said carelessly, as I laid it, open as it was, beside my sister. "Read it; you will doubtlessly find it amusing; and it will also gratify you to ascertain how perfectly your own quiet and reserved temperament will suit her. I quite prophesy already an alliance, both offensive and defensive. Only," I added, as I turned to leave the room, "I have one serious counsel to give you—be careful not to grow any taller!" And with these words, uttered with a laugh which expressed far more bitterness than pleasantry, I disappeared.

Lady Madelaine had adopted any other than a judicious mode of improving my natural disposition. She had commenced upon a wrong system, and she had persevered in her error year after year with a tenacious fidelity, as little creditable to herself as it was mortifying to me. I was determined to show her this: and I could discover no method more effectual of so doing than that of exhibiting her letter to whomsoever might be supposed to take any interest in its contents. It was too late for me to be browbeaten into reformation. She had herself made a woman of the child, and the work of her own hands could not now be undone.

In about half an hour, Adela returned the letter through the hands of my maid, carefully inclosed in an envelope, which I immediately redirected and dispatched to Lady Flora, as a solace to her sick-room: it was a becoming attention on my part; and as it was the first which I had found occasion to offer her, I had no doubt whatever of its being properly appreciated. On her return from her mission, charged with the acknowledgments of the interesting invalid, Joséphine made me her compliment on the happy intelligence contained in the letter of miladi. I inquired upon what premises she presumed that its contents were so hyperagreeable, when she naïvely replied that she had inferred as much from the eagerness with which Lady Flora had possessed herself of the packet, and the pleasure which beamed in the eyes of Mademoiselle Adèle, qui gagnoit étonnantement à cette petite mine éveillée.

For a moment I had a sore struggle with myself. There could be no doubt of the correctness of Joséphine's report, simply because she could have no motive in the present instance to suspect that my sister was triumphing in what she supposed to be my mortification; and for a few instants I was mortified; less at the ungenerous amusement of so near a relative, than at the idea that Lady Flora Glenfillan, the object of my supreme contempt and dislike, was the partner of her pastime. I was at first tempted to regret my mode of proceeding, and to blame myself for not having simply announced the approaching advent of my mother, without ampliation or comment of any kind; but this was a mere transitory weakness, which my pride soon enabled me to conquer. I had a higher aim than that of striving to shine in the eyes of a Lady Flora. She was to be my companion for months—perhaps for years. The trial for mastery between us had commenced on the very evening of her arrival. I felt, moreover, that I must brave the combat alone; while she had a stanch and a subtile ally in my sister, and might, for aught that I could determine, soon find a second in my own friend, Lady O'Hallo ran, whose leaning toward Adela had already become palpable; but, although it may be true enough, as a general principle, that il pesce grossa divora il piccolo, still I was conscious of a power within myself which would in every case preserve me from the risk of becoming so very small a fish as to move among my adversaries without troubling the water.

All these thoughts swept rapidly through my brain, and my resolutions were instantly taken. I at once felt that I must be consistent or my cause was lost; and accordingly I again dispatched my soubrette to Lady Flora's apartment, to request the restoration of the letter, which I was anxious to forward, without loss of time, to Lady O'Halloran, lest the expected visit of my mother should interfere with any of her arrangements. As I had foreseen, my message created what is, in the present day, denominated a "great sensation." The invalid insisted that Josephine had committed some grand mistake. "It was no' that possible," she declared, "that the lassie could purpose to do onything sae awfu'! Why, it was a clean shaming o' her own proudfu' nature—and she would advise her—"

What the valuable counsel would have been, and in what degree it might have operated upon my determination, it is impossible to decide, as the hand of my sister, pressed heavily upon the arm of the eager orator, arrested her utterance at the critical moment; while, in a calm and low tone, she said quietly, "Forgive me, my dear aunt; but had Eveleen believed that she required advice upon this extraordinary occasion, she would, in all probability, have asked it of yourself. She has not done so: and believe me, that it is far too good to be flung away, as it most decidedly would be, in this case."

"A' weel, a' weel," replied the aunt; "'wilfu' woman maun ha' her way,' as the poet says. Give the lass the letter, and gude luck go wi' it! It's a rampaging scrawl, to say the best of it."

In five minutes it was on its way to the Hall.

The morrow was the day appointed for my own visit to the kind-hearted widow, but I had ceased to look forward to it with pleasure. Like the skeleton of the Egyptian banquets, the presence of my incomprehensible sister would suffice, as I well knew, to poison my enjoyment. It was to me like the coupling of the dead man and the living one in the German story; and the simile was the more perfect that Adela appeared wholly heedless or unconscious of the annoyance of our compulsatory union; while to myself it was hateful. Had I possessed one feeling or sentiment in common with my sister, I might have looked forward to brighter and better times; but, unhappily, the solitary sympathy which had ever existed between us had served only to sunder us in heart and spirit. We had each been brought up to despise the other—our earliest jealousies had taken the same direction, and had been quickened and nourished until they had become as bitter as the waters of Marah, and as numerous as the sands of the African desert. In my own case, other feelings no less hostile had blended themselves with this first principle of future hate. My sister had always been described to me by the autocrats of the nursery and the school-room in negatives. She was not handsome; she was not accomplished; she was not fashionable; she was a mere wild, sunfreckled, ignorant child of the hills, without either tournure or pretensions.

At first I was shocked, and even sorry for the poor neglected girl; then I proceeded to hope that she would remain at Glenfillan all her life, lest by approaching town, and undergoing the inspection of my mother's "set," she should disgrace not only herself, but me. And why could she not remain there? Glenfillan might also be considered her birth-place. At all events, it was her home, and it would be so easy for her to marry there! With her name, and her fortune, she could assuredly captivate some Highland chief, with a kilt, and a cock's feather in his bonnet, who would forgive her want of beauty in consideration of the "siller;" and never be aware of her want of education. Decidedly she had no business in England. This was the second phase of my vision; but the third was not slow in its succession. Adela might have no partiality for kilts and cock's feathers; and, as she grew older, might be inconsiderate enough to assert her rights; and, as in dear, righteous old England, there are no convents for the reception of refractory young ladies, the claim could not ultimately be neglected. In this case, she must appear in the world—she must share at once both my aristocratic home and my brilliant destiny—that is, in as far as, under all her disadvantages, the world would permit her to do so; and this reflection was to me insufferable.

CHAPTER XIX.

Accustomed even from my babyhood to be the toy of the saloon and the tyrant of the school-room—to be caressed and flattered, indulged and petted, I was indebted only to the occasional caprices of Lady Madelaine for remembering from time to time that I was mortal; and for the last two years even the whims alluded to had considerably augmented my self-esteem, for I had discovered the valuable secret of my mother's jealousy — of her dread of rivalry from her own daughter; and this knowledge was not calculated to teach me humility.

That I easily imbibed the belief that Lady Madelaine was not alarmed altogether causelessly, I have already shown. I knew that she had passed her thirtieth year; and to a girl of fifteen, she seemed indeed to be growing old enough to abdicate her throne. To whom, then, could she more fitly resign it than to her own daughter? Her discourtesies, therefore, as I readily decided, grew out of a weak vanity, which it was my duty to pity rather than to despise; and I gave it my commiseration accordingly, and only appreciated myself the more highly for my generosity. It was, probably, very difficult for a ci-devant beauty, and an acknowledged leader of fashion, to grow old gracefully. There must be something revolting in "the first gray hair" and the first incipient wrinkle; all this I was quite capable of feeling; and I had not met my mother for so long a period that I actually felt nervous when I reflected on the effect which might be produced upon her when we once more stood face to face, scanning the traces left by time on either side during our separation. Poor Lady Madelaine! I knew beyond a doubt that I no longer wanted more than a couple of inches to be precisely the same height as herself. I had placed this point beyond dispute, by making Joséphine, on the first day of every month, mark my exact measurement upon the wall of my room with a penciled line. I was equally aware that I had also improved in beauty, and that, even if not yet quite so handsome as my mother, I was at least fifteen years younger; while the very time which was daily paling her roses would only serve to shower their leaves upon me.

All these were pleasant thoughts, and peculiarly characteristic of my nature. I was born with a loving heart; but my affections had either been trifled with, or repulsed—and yet not altogether so, for to two persons, at least, I had been dear—my father and Emily Vernon; but of the first I had seen far too little to be enabled to return or to appreciate his tenderness, while the considerate kindness of poor Emily had been circumscribed by the tyranny of my mother. Under these circumstances, my best and holiest feelings had been flung back upon me; and, profiting by the example continually before my eyes, young as I was, I had taken refuge in coquetry; and my reader is already aware that I trifled with this new pastime until I subjected myself to severe mortification; and became, moreover, conscious that it had left behind it a deeper feeling of regret and tenderness in my own bosom than I could easily shake off, even had I endeavored to overcome it, which was far from being the case. I have said nothing for a long time of Devereux; but it must not be supposed that I had forgotten him. It was the only romantic page in the little volume of my life; and I dwelt upon it unceasingly.

Poor commonplace probability waged but unequal war against my girlish vanity; I would not believe it possible that he had forgotten me. I must some day be released from my present state of exile, and produced in the world. My mother and Lady Devereux were still inseparable; and it was consequently evident that our renewed meeting could not be prevented forever. It was a subject of unceasing regret to me that I had no one to whom I could speak of him, and to whom I could explain all the energy and constancy of my feelings. I was too proud to make a confidant of Joséphine; I dared not venture to trust the sympathy of Lady O'Halloran, for she would, in all probability, have made a jest of my anxiety, and even considered it her duty to lay the matter before my father. I was utterly and hopelessly alone with my secret; and it weighed the more heavily upon my heart in consequence.

My sister? Ay, there indeed I might have found a friend, a counselor, a confidant, had she been any other than Miss Adela Tilden; but, under the present circumstances, there was no prospect of such a solace.

Never was gray-haired matron more impracticable than my sister; cold, silent, and self-centered, there was not a grain of romance in her composition. She had never, since her arrival, displaced a single novel on the shelves; her conversation was a string of axioms and aphorisms; Pygmalion might have worn out all his tools upon her, and she never would have breathed, though his impious daring had wrapped the world in flames.

Still, despite these reflections and convictions, the idea continued to haunt me. Adela was so young, and a young heart is naturally so prone to take an interest in every history of affection. Nay, who could say that such a confidence as this might not lessen the distance between us? Thus argued my eager inclination to ease my overburdened heart, by sharing its load with another; and accordingly I began to watch my sister closely, in order to encourage every glimmering manifestation of feeling or interest on her part; but I might as soon have awaited light and fire from the piled-up ashes of an extinguished conflagration. Sometimes I became angry with myself for being so weak as to anticipate such a result—at others I pitied her impassibility, and felt that no lute could sound until its cords were struck; and this, in Adela's case, was clearly impossible.

In this wavering mood of mind I was prepared to sacrifice my own feelings and ideas during our visit to the Hall, to which I have already alluded; and I so far succeeded in at least accomplishing their concealment, that on our departure thence, Lady O'Halloran drew me apart, and warmly congratulated me upon the victory which I had obtained over myself in my altered and less authoritative manner toward my sister.

"Depend upon it, my dear child," she said, warmly, "you are working out your own happiness as well as hers. How shall I rejoice the affectionate and anxious feelings of your father by this joyful intelligence! Your heart is good, Eveleen; it must suffer from your errors, for I am perfectly convinced that you are quite conscious of them, even at the very moment of their committal; you owe them rather to your age, and to your peculiar education, than to your nature. In order to be all for which you were originally intended, my love, let me now entreat you to make a yet mightier effort over yourself than you have even done within these last few weeks; abjure, and not only abjure, but repair them all. Open up the treasures of your really loving heart to Adela. You will one day learn how precious a treasure is the affection of an only sister. Yours has a thousand good qualities; but, even if she had a thousand faults, so that they were merely involuntary, and that she regretted them when committed, you should consider yourself only the more compelled to sustain and comfort her. Come, my dear Eveleen, and promise me, here in my arms, and upon my heart, that you will use all your most tender influence to make her happy. From what you tell me, and from what I had myself ascertained, her guardian aunt is ill-calculated to be either an appropriate companion or a judicious guide. You have it in your power to be both. Be to her then a fond sister and a firm friend. You will do this, will you not?"

"Alas! you seek to compel me to a Herculean task," I said, sadly; "would she only meet me half-way, I should have courage to make the attempt."

"In that case it would require none," insisted my warm-hearted monitress; "but you expect success too soon. Redouble your attempts to overcome her coldness, and your merit will only be the greater when it is conquered: that she will resist it resolutely for a time assure yourself, for you must feel that the poor child has much to forgive."

"But not to forgive me, Lady O'Halloran?"

"You are in error, Eveleen. Are not all the preferences—all the outlay—all the cares which have been so profusely lavished upon yourself, and so grudgingly bestowed upon her—all the superiority which you have assumed—are these not wrongs in which you have, voluntarily as well as involuntarily, borne a part? and are not these likely to fester in a young, fresh heart, unconscious of evil? I have no doubt she has made you feel that she has not borne them all without a pang. Such conduct would have been sublime, and who would dare to expect sublimity from a girl of thirteen years of age? I am equally convinced that she will be long, very long, before she can overcome their withering effects, or cease to show you that they still rankle in her mind; but this should only stimulate you to greater concessions; and remember that it is the province of the happy to heal the wounds of those who suffer, and that the sufferer should be met by kindness, forbearance, and the most delicate demonstrations of affection."

As she ceased speaking, Lady O'Halloran embraced me affectionately, while I wept from a mingled feeling which I did not seek to analyze. This judicious friend affected to mistake the motive of my emotion; she congratulated me upon my worthy sympathy in the past sorrows of my sister, and my evident intention to terminate them; and then hastily but clearly explained to me the line of conduct which she would advise me to pursue. I whispered out my determination to follow it up to the letter upon her bosom, making but one reservation.

"Permit me only, my friend," I said hurriedly, "to leave everything in its present state and to make no demonstration, until after the visit of our parents. When we are again alone, I will apply myself resolutely to this formidable, and, I fear, hopeless undertaking."

"I can admit of no such moral cowardice, my Eveleen," was her calm reply; "every hour of supineness is an hour lost, which you may, hereafter, bitterly regret. I will not give you a day's respite—not an hour's. The ascendency which you will have gained over yourself and your own egotism, before the arrival of Lady Madelaine and Mr. Tilden, will strengthen you to recommence a trial, which will be no longer in its first infancy. Their visit may be delayed, even deferred; in short, trust not to circumstances in so holy a duty, but to yourself."

Her firmness, aided by my own secret wish, determined me at once. I was, moreover, greatly agitated at the moment; nor could I bear to let her feel that I was less generous than she had believed. I accordingly withdrew my opposition, and promised all she wished.

My first attempts at conciliation and friendship were not, however, successful. Adela was too far-sighted to believe for an instant that I had so suddenly changed my nature. She suspected a snare, or at least imagined a weakness and inconsistency of character which irritated her, and put her upon the defensive. Every look of kindness which I turned upon her she studiously avoided; my most conciliatory words were unanswered, or only induced a reply so cold, and dry, and formal, that it froze me to the soul; while, by a strange coincidence, I became in my turn embarrassed and timid in her presence, and divested myself unconsciously of my natural arrogance. However much I might gain in the opinion of a third person by this extraordinary transformation, it never produced even a momentary effect upon Adela, while it made me absolutely unhappy. I did not know myself. I had not even the consolation of feeling that I was doing right, for I was burdened with the everlasting consciousness that my present conduct sprang from no impulse, was actuated by no principle of my own; but that I was a mere puppet, and that the wires by which I was moved were in the hands of another. I was nothing more than an awkward and inexperienced actress, saying what was "set down for me," and constrained at every instance to sacrifice myself to the part which I represented.

Often did I indulge in bitter reveries on my extraordinary and irksome position. Often did I repeat to myself that ogni medaglia ha il suo rovescio. I was undergoing this moral misery, to reclaim the heart of Adela. But would it consent to be reclaimed? Would it ever exchange its haughty indifference for the thraldom of a sister's regard? And, alas! seldom, very seldom, could I compel myself to answer "yes." Why, then, should I any longer tamely undergo this martyrdom, which made me a stranger even in my home? I can scarcely answer the question. Suffice it, that I remembered my promise to Lady O'Halloran, and also that I had never yet compelled myself to any measure in which my pride had suffered me to fail through my own weakness.

This remark reminds me, that the letter of Lady Madelaine, which I had forwarded to the Hall, had been received by its mistress with a full appreciation of the feeling which had induced me to send it. She well knew my haughty disposition, and that I would rather brave the little world about me than shun its blame. She first chided me jestingly, but took an after-opportunity of pointing out the danger and impolicy of such a proceeding, and earnestly entreated me never to repeat it.

Had I only possessed such a friend a few years earlier! But, alas! this is an implied excuse for my past faults, which at the present day I should be too proud and too just to make. Let me rather remember in my old age, that, whatever may have been the errors of those around me, I was, nevertheless, my own worst enemy. It is so easy to imitate when both egotism and vanity are gratified by the mimicry.

But, to recur for a moment to my new state of existence, I can, upon looking back, frankly declare my conviction, that either my health or my will must have yielded before the stoicism of my sister and my own internal struggle, had it been fated to endure much longer. It was not—it was fearfully and fatally abridged!

CHAPTER XX.

TIME, meanwhile, continued its heavy course. Day after day sank into night. Lady Flora had declared herself, at last, to be convalescent; and descended to the drawing-room, closely enveloped in the Glenfillan tartan, to the great amusement of that portion of the establishment whom she dignified by the appellation of "the flunkies." Nor had she made her second appearance without a firm resolution to assert her privileges as the temporary mistress of the mansion. Her orders and her lectures, ere long, became infinite. For a time I ventured to oppose her distasteful and ungentlewomanly innovations, but she met me with the glance of a vixen, and the accents of a shrew, and against these I could not condescend to contend. I then ventured upon expostulation, but my failure was signal; and after these efforts to save the respectability of poor Rooksley, I abstained from all comment or expostulation, to the great astonishment and manifest disappointment of Lady Flora, who had evidently anticipated a long and exciting course of domestic warfare.

Before the arrival of Lady Madelaine's Scotch connection I had been constantly annoyed by intimations from the housekeeper that the underservants were, one and all, threatening to leave my father's service, unless they were allowed at stated periods to replace those in town—the quiet uniformity of Rooksley not suiting either their volatile spirits or their social habits. These terrible announcements had, as will be believed, never disturbed my equanimity for a moment. My universal reply was expressive of the necessity of their communicating their discontents to Mr. Tilden; and for a time I had heard no more of the kitchen rebellions. Now, however, the case was indeed changed—there was no more stagnation in the house. Lady Flora commenced by papering and bagging up every remain of ornamental furniture left in Rooksley. She even invaded the apartments of my father; but I no sooner discovered this, than causing every remnant of rag and paper with which she had desecrated them to be instantly removed, I turned the master-key which gave admittance to the whole suite, and never again suffered it to pass from my own possession.

So far, the Rooksley servants cared little for the innovations of Lady Fora, who now appeared to be really in her element; the only person who was annoyed and inconvenienced being myself; for Adela sat by, perfectly unmoved, like one accustomed to similar proceedings, and for whom they possessed neither interest nor hindrance. But when, having made everything about her wear as wretched an appearance as it was capable of assuming, the thrifty Scotch lady condescended to descend to the servants' hall, to commence her reformation in that privileged department, matters at once became desperate. She had already once or twice been heard to mutter between her teeth at the dinner-table something about "awfu' extravagance;" and consequently the whole establishment, each being interested in the question, were fully prepared for the assault. Lady Flora talked loud, but the housekeeper talked still louder, and precisely at the same moment, and consequently no one heard a syllable of the noble maiden's harangue. When she sought to enter the butler's sanctum, he accidentally let a basket of plate fall upon her right foot, which, from some cause or other, was peculiarly susceptible to contact with any hard substance; and, while she was leaning against the wall, and writhing with pain, he quickly locked the door of the room, and, putting the key in his pocket, walked away.

When the victim of his obstinacy had in some degree recovered from the shock she had received, she next attempted an inroad upon the kitchen, where she was received by the cook bearing a greasy spit, with which, as she crossed the floor, she brushed violently against her unwelcome visitor; but the Glenfillan tartan was proof against all such unctuous contact; and the resolute spinster stood her ground, until men and maids rushed in a phalanx through the open door; and the unfortunate reformer was so unmercifully hustled, jostled, and run over, that she was glad to make good her retreat to her legitimate sphere of action.

I shall never forget her when she reentered. I dare not venture to describe her appearance. Suffice it that I burst into an involuntary fit of laughter, so undisguised and so genuine, that I believe it obtained for me her life-long hatred. My sister looked at her for a moment without the movement of a muscle, and then calmly continued her work.

Habit is assuredly all-powerful, or I am convinced that Adela, stoic as she seemed, must have laughed as I did at the comical effects of Lady Flora's foray.

Baffled, but not defeated, the resolute lady returned on the morrow to the charge; but, as she had, on the first onslaught, encountered such bitter perils, she saw fit, on her second essay, to remember that "discretion is the better part of valor;" and feeling, no doubt, that the pantries and sculleries were hopelessly closed against her, she assumed a more dignified position, and summoned the delinquent housekeeper to the breakfast-room, where she was duly apprised that Lady Flora would, in future, herself regulate the supplies of both the upper and lower tables; and that Mrs. Locksley must be responsible for all additional outlay which might occur from her want of obedience to the mandate issued for her observance. The worthy soul looked absolutely petrified with horror and mortification for a few seconds, but she soon rallied sufficiently to say that she was not sure that she had understood her ladyship, for she did not speak Scotch; nor, indeed, for that matter, did any servant in the house; but she was sure, from the orders she had received from her own lady, that Lady Madelaine Tilden had never entertained an idea that her ladyship would demean herself by meddling with the housekeeping.

This perfectly respectful, but stinging rejoinder, told in two ways, and I saw a burning spot of red mount to the brow of Lady Flora, while her lips turned blue with suppressed rage. She struggled resolutely against it, however; and contented herself by remarking that she expected obedience, and not argument.

"But, Miss Tilden—Miss Eveleen"—commenced the excited guardian of the keys.

I merely waved my hand to silence all reference to myself. My disgust was too great for me to venture any attempt at utterance.

"But pray, my dear young lady, for my sake, for all our sakes, do remember that when my honored lady is absent, you are the mistress of the house—" persisted Mrs. Locksley.

I was still silent; but not so the thrifty daughter of Glenfillan. In words infinitely more energetic than eloquent, the dismayed and deposed functionary was ordered to leave the room on the instant; and she obeyed with most undignified alacrity, evidently more from bewilderment of mind than from any intention of acquiescence to the will of her new tyrant. Throughout the whole scene I had suffered bitterly. Wounded pride, suppressed indignation, and withering contempt, had each, in turn, swelled my heart almost to bursting. I felt that Rooksley and its inhabitants would become the fable of the neighborhood. The world, ever ready to seize the malicious side of every question, would reluctantly admit the possibility that any guest, however closely connected with the mistress of the house, could permit herself to interfere with its domestic economy. It would, therefore, be believed that all the steps so authoritatively and unceremoniously taken by the new inmate, had been suggested by my mother herself; and the haughty Lady Madelaine, who had borne herself so proudly towards the first families in the county, would be mixed up in legends of famished housekeepers, and exasperated underlings. I was, in short, so thoroughly excited by Lady Flora's presumption, exhibited as it was, moreover, with the coarsest vulgarity, that, as I chanced to glance toward the unmoved and immovable Adela, who, flung back in an armchair, was calmly amusing herself with a volume of Florian's Pastorals, I could have torn the book from her hand, and hurled it to the other extremity of the apartment.

My reader may possibly feel some surprise that, suffering so acutely as I did from what was passing before my eyes, I did not retire to my own room, and shut out so painful a spectacle. It would have been contrary to my nature to have made so undeniable a demonstration of cowardice. There was something in the self-gratulatory and magnificent deportment of the lady who now ruled Rooksley, which convinced me that the despicable drama was not yet played out; and I resolved to remain, in order to ascertain how far the disgrace of my parents was to extend. I remarked that the keen gray eye of Lady Flora had been several times turned earnestly towards me since the exit of Mrs. Locksley, and I felt convinced that she was anxious to see it succeeded by my own. Brave matters as she might, she could not conceal that I was de trop; and I was glad of it. I accordingly seated myself more commodiously in my chair, and took up a daily paper which was lying on the table beside me. She saw at once that there was no hope of my disappearance; and lost not a moment in asserting her supposed power over myself in consequence.

"Ring the bell, Eve-leen," she said abruptly.

I neither moved nor looked up.

"Do ye no' hear me, Miss Tilden!"

"Yes, madam," I answered, in a calm voice, as I deposited the paper once more upon the table, and looked her demurely and steadily in the face.

"Then, why did ye no' ring the bell when I desired ye!"

"Because I only obey the orders of those who have a right to give them. Had you made a request, madam, I might possibly have complied with it."

"The Lord be gude unto me!" exclaimed the irate lady; "things are come to a pretty pass, indeed, when a set-up miss will no' obey her own aunt!"

"You are not my aunt, Lady Flora Glenfillan," I replied haughtily; "I have already, upon a former occasion, explicitly made this known to you. None of the blood of the Macspleuchans runs in my veins."

"And ye obstinately refuse to do as I desire ye? Ye will no' ring the bell?"

"I absolutely refuse—I will not."

Lady Flora groaned aloud; and then, abruptly reverting to my slighting remark on her family, she said, with a sneer which appeared to be the most natural expression of her countenance, so instantly and easily did it settle itself upon her shrewish features, "Ye'll be telling us soon, I suppose, Miss Eve-leen Tilden, that the young lady opposite is no' your sister."

"I never amuse myself by useless fallacies, and far less by direct untruths, madam; and I am well aware that, by the accident of birth, Adela and myself bear the relationship you mention. I am aware that we are the children of the same parents, and consequently as I have just remarked—by birth at least—sisters."

I had emphasized my reply as markedly as I could; and I detected a quick glance and a nervous movement in Adela, which, for an instant, led me to hope that I had provoked a rejoinder; but I deceived myself. In the next moment she sat calm and still, with her eyes once more riveted on the Pastorals.

"Hech, sirs! here's wonderfu' condescension," ejaculated the worsted enemy, grasping the leathern arms of her chair and lifting herself half out of it, only to regain her seat with a sudden jerk mightily unpoetical in sound. "An earl's daughter is no' grand enough for the up start queans o' the present day; and me looke up to at my own place as a leader! It's wise like that, o' my conscience."

Then, after a momentary silence which I ha felt no inclination to break, she exclaimed, wit a startling vehemence which made me sprin in my chair—

"Ring the bell, Adela."

"Yes—aunt," said the young lady thus gentl apostrophized; and having complied with th command, she demurely resumed her seat.

A servant instantly appeared.

"I wish to speak with Mr. Bottlemore—i stantly," said the prima-donna.

The man bowed, and withdrew; but not be fore I had detected a roguish smile playin about his lips.

The precise and polite butler made his a pearance within five minutes, during whic time no word had been spoken in the breakfas room.

Lady Flora leaned forward in her chair, ar returned his punctilious salutation with an elongatory motion of her chin. She evidently felt herself at that moment in a very responsible and dignified position. Not another moment was lost. In the same masterly style in which she had discussed with poor, discomfited Mrs. Locksley, the peculiarly agreeable and well-chosen subject of cookery,

"——all the way
From soup to fondu and soufflé;"

although, to quote once more the same witty poet, the busy lady could "——scarcely tell

A Salmi from a Bechamelle," and bewildered my mother's good and clever housekeeper quite as much in her turn, by talking of "bannocks," and "griddlecakes," and other delicacies of her highland table, not omitting the popular "stirabout," which she had been preeminently anxious to introduce into the Rooksley kitchen—even after the same fashion did she proceed to question, and to direct staid Mr. Bottlemore, my father's especial favorite.

"Nothing but port and sherry at the upper table, did I understand your ladyship to say?" asked the demure voice; "even in the event of guests."

"Do I no' speak plain, sir?" was the counter-question.

"Most assuredly, my lady; your ladyship's voice is very distinctly audible; a trifle of difficulty there may be, perhaps, in the expression of your ladyship's meaning occasionally; but with patience and attention on my part, that may, without doubt, be overcome."

Lady Flora looked delightfully mystified. With all his polite placidity of countenance and demeanor, she evidently had a suspicion that Mr. Bottlemore was laughing at her. As for me, I could have knighted him on the spot, had I been a sovereign, and worn a sword. Under my actual circumstances, I was obliged to content myself by sitting silent, and playing with the poker.

Let her impression have been what it might, however, before she next spoke, the great agitator had made up her mind to pacific measures for the moment; and when the sly old man inquired, with a profound inclination, whether her ladyship had any further orders for him before he withdrew, she put the finishing stroke to her financial arrangements by strictly forbidding all wine, of whatever description, at the housekeeper's table.

Bottlemore smiled quietly, as he remarked that perhaps her ladyship was not aware that, in all large establishments, this privilege was a matter of course at the tables of the upper servants.

"Then the sooner ye're all unprivileged the better," angrily exclaimed my mother's representative; "a pack o' lazy looons that are na' worth your saut! Set ye up, forsooth, with wine! It shan't be done, I say, while I am mistress here. Gude save us a'! wine, indeed! Why, my sister maun be distraught. Ye have my last word, Mr. Butler—no more wine shall ye have, to sit guzzling o'er below there, instead o' minding to do your business."

"I fear, my lady, that I must disobey your ladyship's commands on this subject," said the placid individual she addressed; "and not only disobey them myself, but also assist Mrs. Locksley and the ladies' maids to do the same. The wine, my lady, is in our agreements."

Again the dark, red spot rose to the forehead of Lady Flora; Bottlemore's last assertion was not to be overruled; yet still, with an obstinacy which spoke volumes for her nerve, she determined not to be entirely baffled; and accordingly, assuming an air of majestic authority, which, the subject considered, made her look at the moment exceedingly like the superannuated Siddons of a barn-tragedy, she thundered out, in a voice which would have made itself audible amid the very "fury of the elements,"

"Then, sir, ye maun drink Cape!"

Poor Bottlemore! I think I see him once more before me. He, whose fastidious master declared him to be the best judge of wine with whom he had ever come into contact—never shall I forget his look of blank amazement. He was several minutes before he recovered the shock; but he had no sooner done so than, in an accent of indignation which almost revenged the injured dignity of Rooksley, he exclaimed boldly:—

"I am proud to say, madam, that the cellars of Mr. Tilden, since I have had control over them, have never been disgraced by the filthy compound it has pleased your ladyship to mention. Mr. Tilden, madam, drinks wine, not drugs; and so do all who have the honor to belong to him. I regret to seem wanting in respect to your ladyship; but this I solemnly declare, that I will neither be art nor part in the purchase of any such poison, nor will I be held responsible for any such proceeding."

"Hout, tout, man, gie us nane o' your din!" vehemently broke in Lady Flora; "I'm just deafened wi' it. Can I no' buy the wine mysel?"

"Certainly, madam, if your ladyship also purposes to drink it after it is bought," said the butler, sturdily; "but this much, my lady, I most respectfully inform you, that not a single cork shall be drawn in Mrs. Locksley's room; nor shall a drop be forced down the throat of my dear young lady here." Then, approaching me with the greatest deference, he asked, in a low and well-bred tone—"What description of wine shall I supply for your use, madam, under the new regulation of the family?"

"I leave it entirely to yourself, my good Bottlemore," I said smilingly; "only, pray do not allow me to be poisoned. I am too young to be envious of such a fate."

He bowed, and at once left the room, without any further impediment from his tormenter; and when I had allowed him sufficient time to traverse the gallery, I rose from my chair, and pausing for a moment before the chagrined and disappointed author of my present mortification, I said, slowly and coldly, "I have borne all the hideous scene of this morning, madam, in silence; but I can bear no more; and I now leave you to the pleasant triumph which you must necessarily feel after your well-bred contention with my father's menials. I have but one remark to make, one piece of advice to offer you, and I do it emphatically. Suffer the disgrace which you have this day wilfully brought upon your sister to suffice; believe me, is already more than sufficient; and do not venture, for your own sake, to drive to the county-town with the Tilden liveries, to make purchases which will render my family the common laughing-stock of the neighborhood. You do not understand my father, or you would not have dared the impertinences of this morning."

I had no opportunity of ascertaining the effect of my words; for, when I ceased to utter them I left the room; and, shutting myself into my own chamber, gave free vent to the bitter feelings which I had so long suppressed.

CHAPTER XXI.

On the following morning, immediately that I had left the breakfast-room, and was awaiting in the saloon—the wretched-looking, desolate apartment which, during my mother's residence at Rooksley, had always been a scene of light and movement—the arrival of one of my masters, I was in my turn honored with a deputation from the servants' hall. I sickened as I saw them enter, but there was no remedy; and, accordingly, when I beheld Mrs. Locksley and Mr. Bottlemore respectfully approach me, while the remainder of the party paused deferentially just within the door, which they closed carefully after them, I threw myself into a seat, and abandoned myself to my fate.

I was not left long in suspense as to their purpose. Complaints, loud and long; expostulations, logical and earnest; and entreaties, anxious and emphatic, were poured out before me. "Her Scotch ladyship" was declared to be more than they could bear up against; she had not left her room more than three or four hours before their peculiar territories were invaded, and their ears assailed by unsavory epithets, which to them appeared even more obnoxious from their not being able to understand half their meaning; and now their supplies were to be cut off, and the garrison to be starved out, unless it pleased "their young lady" to come to the rescue.

"Only imagine, Miss Tilden," sobbed out the housekeeper, when the general grievances had been laid before me; "only imagine, ma'am, the disgrace to my situation and my time of life, to be followed up and scolded at, like a common kitchen-maid! I couldn't live through it. I'm sure, it would break my heart. And then the bill of fare every day for both tables, Miss Eveleen!—we shall all be starved before the year's at an end. Sheep's heads, with the wool on, ma'am, and cakes made of oats. The coachman was the first to declare that he would leave if they were set before him; for he should be afraid his own horses would run over him out of pure spite, if he was guilty even of tasting them. And if such a prospect frightened Jones, Miss Eveleen, who is not a man to be easily daunted, only think of their being served up to you."

"But, if that were all," broke in the modulated tones of the butler, "it might be got over, madam, for it would be a mere case of 'take it or leave it;' but the wine, Miss Eveleen, is a more serious matter. I have already declared my mind on the subject to her ladyship, who, it seems to me (if I may say so without disrespect to the family), doesn't appear to understand clearly what she's about, and has undertaken more than she can manage; but I can't endure to live in this state of open rebellion under the roof of so kind and honored a master; and therefore, madam—therefore, Miss Tilden"—and here he paused a moment in order to clear his throat, and render the utterance of what he still had to say less difficult—"therefore, I have consented, in the name of all the establishment (including the out-door servants), to wait upon you for the purpose of entreating your interference; or, in the event of your refusing it, to inform you of our intention to quit Mr. Tilden's service, although we are all grateful for the past, and shall at all times be happy to acknowledge that we shall never find a better than it was."

Here the phalanx of men and maids upon the threshold performed divers shamefaced and awkward salutations.

"As for myself," continued the spokesman, at the close of this pantomime, "I never thought to have had to look for another home. I hoped to live and die in the family. But to be told to lay in a stock of Cape wine at the chief town of the very county for which my master sits in Parliament, and where he has always spent his money like a prince, as indeed he is in his heart, it's more than I can do! To go and disgrace both him and myself before a parcel of backbiting people, that have always looked up to us!—it can't be done with any consistency; and so, my dear young lady, as I said before, I'd rather go than be guilty of it."

Here the worthy man brushed his handkerchief across his eyes, and shook his head so portentously that he made the powder fly in all directions.

"My complaint is altogether the same, ma'am," said the lachrymose housekeeper, as she thrust her hand into her capacious pocket in search of a similar piece of drapery.

"Indeed! my trusty Locksley," I said, with a smile, "and were you also commanded to drive to the county town for a stock of Cape?"

"No ma'am—no, Miss Eveleen," was the plaintive reply, as the tears rolled down her smooth and comely cheeks; "mine was even worse, far worse—sheep's heads, with the wool on, twice a week. It would ruin us all in the village; and, like Mr. Bottlemore, I'd rather go."

"My good people," I said, as I rose from the sofa, divided between amusement and annoyance, "you must all be well aware that I am still too young for the exercise of such an act of authority as that of changing the whole establishment of my father's house. You know, also, that I am now daily expecting his arrival; and I am quite sure that your wrongs will only require to be known to him, to be at once redressed. Is not this reasonable?"

An affirmative salutation was the reply.

"So far well," I continued; "but to thus much I pledge myself, that should his visit be by any chance delayed, I will myself write and inform him of all the circumstances of the case."

A murmur of approbation greeted this promise.

"This is not the first time, you are aware, Mrs. Locksley," I pursued, "that I have been mformed of similar intentions, although never before of a general intention of leaving Rooksley, on the part of some of your subordinates; and the plea was, on those occasions, if I remember rightly, the dull monotony and perpetual quiet of the place, under a mistress of fifteen, who had not the power to give it greater animation. Do not believe that I am insensible to your present annoyance, when I remind you of a fable with which you must be familiar; and in which, tired of the ease and liberty of a commonwealth, the frogs petitioned Jupiter for a king, who in pity of their ignorance cast a log of wood into the lake, and bade them receive their sovereign. For a time, the sight of the huge mass floating upon the surface of the water sufficed to amuse them—they had the semblance of a monarch, and were content; but, ere long, as they experienced no interference from his placid majesty, and that his possession had left them in precisely the same condition of ease and freedom as formerly, they complained that Jove had jested with them, and renewed their supplications. This time they had their wish—King Stork appeared upon the borders of the lake, and so assiduously devoured such of his living subjects as chanced o fall into his way, that the diminished remainder were afraid to put their noses above water, and such as did contrive to escape during the brief intervals when his majesty had overgorged himself, hastened to emigrate to another sheet of water, where they might regain the quiet they had lost."

At this moment some one knocked at the door, and a groom extended to the footman, by whom it was opened, a letter, which had just arrived, for me, and which was superscribed, "Immediate."

I lost not a moment in breaking the seal, and the servants had not yet quitted the room, when, with a piercing scream, I fell senseless to the floor.

When I recovered consciousness I found myself lying upon a sofa, and tended by the housekeeper and Joséphine. My first movement was to motion them to close the blinds—I could not bear the light; and then I again sank back in an agony of grief, and buried my face among the cushions.

"Pour l'amour de la Sainte Vierge! mademoiselle, tell us what is the matter!" exclaimed the kneeling Joséphine.

"For pity's sake, let us know the worst!" entreated Mrs. Locksley.

"Read!" I exclaimed, suddenly raising my head, and pointing to the fatal letter, which still remained where it had fallen from my hand, "read, and aloud, that my heart may break at once!" I was obeyed. It was written by my father's body-servant, and its contents were these:—

"Grosvenor Square, Thursday.

"MADAM,—

"By desire of her ladyship, I write to inform you of the dreadful calamity which has taken place in the family; and I have instructions to request that you will immediately communicate the mournful tidings to Miss Adela Tilden and the Lady Flora Glenfillan. We are all in a state of the greatest grief, and seem to feel more every hour the value of him that we have lost. My honored master is no more! After speaking for upwards of an hour in the House, which was very close and crowded, Mr. Tilden, in order to refresh himself after his exertion, dismissed the carriage, and determined to walk home. He took cold; but, as the question in which he felt so much interest was still before the House, he could not be prevailed upon to absent himself; and so, from bad he rapidly became worse, and died on the fifth day (yesterday) of pleurisy. The deceased is to be interred in ten days after that of his demise; and I am sure it will be a great consolation to you, madam, to know that the premier, and nearly all his majesty's ministers, will attend the funeral; and as regards the nobility, we have already sixty carriages upon our list. This, madam, as you may believe, is very comforting to her ladyship, who is as well as can be expected, but has neither time nor spirits to write herself as yet. My lady instructs me to say, that directly the last honors are paid to my poor master she shall set off post for Rooksley, where she desires that Mrs. Locksley will have Mr. Tilden's private sitting-room hung with black before Sunday next; it is to be done precisely after the plan of which I have the honor to inclose a sketch, and which was approved by her ladyship for the principal drawing-room in Grosvenor Square. I have no further instructions, and therefore subscribe myself,

Madam,

"Your most obedient humble servant,

"JOHN DALE."

And this was all! My father, my fond but ill-requited father, was dead—was in a few brief days to be carried to his grave—and I knew no more! I cannot describe the agony of my grief, the anguish of my remorse. Every detail of the past rose up before me; and the hopes which I had almost unconsciously formed for the future, and in which the figure of my father had been ever prominent, mingled with the bitterness of my soul. I ceased to weep. A deeper and sterner feeling took possession of me. I should be henceforth alone. My mother had ceased to love me—my sister had never done so; even my last-acquired friend—even Lady O'Halloran herself—although delegated, by that very father whom I had now lost, to cherish and protect me, and who had taught me to love and to cling to him as I had never before done—she had already given symptoms of preferring a stranger to myself. I was bewildered by the extent of my misfortune. I thought with contemptuous pity of the poor and futile distinctions to the dead, which had already helped to afford consolation to Lady Madelaine—to his widow—whom he had surrounded with opulence and honor; and then I remembered, as if in contrast to these, the fresh flowers with which I had each morning, since his expected arrival, fondly decorated his room, in order that he might breathe their welcome upon his very entrance—a welcome which he was never more to experience beneath his own roof.

Profound and heartfelt grief lingers willingly over details like these; they are the stones which the spirit piles upon the cairns of the departed. For all other sorrows there is consolation—in all other trials there is hope; but on this earth there is none for death. It comes coldly, suddenly before us, and defies all remedy. I had heard more, I had spoken more, and, above all, I had thought more of my father during the last few months than I had ever before done. I had striven to bring his image before me incessantly. I had treasured up every evidence of his taste, every shade of his character, in order to form my own after that model. I had made his favorite apartment my refuge, when vexation and annoyance had wounded my spirit; I had accustomed myself in its genial solitude to review the folly, the coldness of my ungrateful girlhood to the only being who really loved me for myself; and there had I shed those regretful but soothing tears which, summoned by sorrow for the past, inspire better resolutions for the future. And all had been too late! I had sought strength only of myself; I had never learned that without higher and holier assistance I was powerless. Nor did I feel it even now. My sole sensation was one of grief and wrong. Others, many others were beloved by scores of tender relatives and friends; I had but one, and even he was taken from me—taken, too, just at the moment when I was prepared to pour out before him the long-hoarded treasure of my filial affection; I had no consolation—none!

Let no one imagine this description of my first grief to be exaggerated. Let them rather search into human nature, and admit its truth. As I now look back, I cannot contemplate it with the same complacency as I did even in the earlier period of my sorrowing. I had learned to love my father with a fervor which bordered on romance—to feel proud alike of his talents and of his virtues—to experience gratitude for the neglected tenderness which he had lavished on me in my childhood, and to form hearty resolutions of returning it tenfold in the time to come. But, alas! I now see what I did not then even suspect. All the tears which I so passionately shed did not embalm the memory of my father. Many, too many of them were an offering to SELF. My projects were overthrown—my future was blighted—my scheme of life was rendered, by this one blow, vain and impossible. The earth had crumbled away beneath my feet; and as, for weeks after that blow was struck, I wandered, sad and solitary, through the silent apartments which were once his, I found a proud satisfaction in murmuring to myself—"None mourn him as I do!" No warning voice whispered into my ear the humiliating truth.

Lady Flora made a decent endeavor to appear afflicted; but it was too shallow to deceive even for a moment. She had never divested herself of the delusion that she had been the first object of Mr. Tilden's preference; and that his ultimate selection of her beautiful young sister was the mere effect of some unaccountable caprice. She was utterly unable to sympathize with the feelings of such a man, and therefore she feared him; while it is needless to do more than to remark, that in weak and ignorant natures, fear is always coupled with dislike. There can be no doubt, under all these circumstances, that Lady Flora had dreaded the hour in which she should be compelled to present herself before him as his guest; and from this terror she was now fatally relieved. This was her view of an event so terrible and so sudden; and it is not to be supposed that she suffered greatly from the shock.

The feelings of Adela were more extraordinary and inexplicable. There were moments when her depression was so great, that she could not endure any companionship; and would rush abruptly from the presence of every one, and shut herself into her room for hours. On her reappearance, there was no mistaking the agony in which the interval had been passed: her eyes were swollen with weeping, and her cheeks pale and sunken; and yet, at times, she rallied so wonderfully as to display more bodily and mental energy than I had ever before believed her to possess. She produced upon me the effect of a person who had suddenly flung off a heavy weight, and who experienced some great and hidden relief.

The first occasion upon which we had ever spoken together with the confidence and affection of relatives—I dare not say of sisters—was on the evening of the day when the fatal news reached us. I had desired that no one should disturb me; and hour after hour had passed, as I lay silent and almost motionless upon my sofa, sunk in those sad and bitter thoughts which I have endeavored to describe. The sun had set unheeded; the twilight had faded into darkness; and, to me, there had seemed no change. I was absorbed in my own anguish, when I distinctly heard a light stroke upon the door, but I was too listless in my misery to heed it. A moment subsequently it opened, and Adela slowly approached me. She was as pale as death; her hair was in disorder, and hung in rich disheveled masses upon her shoulders; and her eyes were encircled by a dark ring, as though the tears that would not fall had congealed the blood around their orbs. In one hand she held the letter which had been the messenger of grief, and in the other a small lamp, which she deposited in silence upon a table. As she approached me I instinctively raised myself upon my elbow, and I saw a faint, sad smile quiver over her lips. Many sisters would have sprung into each other's arms, and wept out their anguish upon each other's necks: Adela and I mutually extended our hands, and held them clasped for a few seconds, after which she drew a chair close to the cushion of the sofa upon which I was lying, and sat down. Still I did not speak. I felt as though the first word which I sought to utter must suffocate me; but Adela did not seem to interpret my silence unkindly.

"Poor Eveleen!" she murmured, in her low, musical voice, which sounded sweet and sad in that vast and half-dismantled apartment—"this is your first sorrow, and it is, indeed, a bitter one."

I glanced at her in surprise.

"I would not, even now, have intruded upon your grief," she continued; "but there are certain duties delegated to us which we must perform. Our father's room—"

"He will never, never occupy it more!" I exclaimed, in a fresh paroxysm of grief—"Adela, Adela, we have lost our best friend!"

"I know it—I feel it," replied my sister, in the same low and firm tone as she had hitherto spoken; "perhaps our only one. But it is not in order to aggravate your regrets that I am here. You have the key that is needed, Eveleen; there was no means of ingress without an application to yourself. There are strangers in the house, who — who" — she struggled with her emotion, as a convulsive shudder made me tremble in every limb; and then added, hastily, as though she feared that she could not much longer restrain her tears— "and Lady Flora is already with them, and will superintend everything, if you will send her the key."

"I thank you, Adela," I said, with a sudden calmness for which I could not account even to myself; "there are, indeed, duties delegated to us. You know how carefully, how reverently, I have hitherto guarded that, to me, sacred spot from the pollution of a stranger's curiosity. I will do so still. You have, indeed, performed a sister's part toward me to-night—complete it now. Withdraw Lady Flora from the gallery; her services are not needed, nor can they be either accepted or permitted. I would rather not meet her yet—nor there."

Adela looked steadily at me for a moment, and then, taking up her lamp, left the room. I required a few moments to compose myself, and to prepare for the dismal and trying duty which I had refused to transfer to another; and, ere I had well succeeded, Joséphine appeared with a light, which she placed upon a console near the door, and instantly withdrew. I walked slowly toward it, lifted it, and stood quietly until I found that I could carry it with a steady clasp; and then, having steeped my hands and face in Hungary water, I passed out into the gallery.

A confused murmur of hoarse whisperings fell on my ear as I advanced, and I soon stood opposite the impatient group who were to drape the apartment of my father in its lugubrious trappings. As I stopped before them, all the servants, whom curiosity or interest had attracted to the spot, silently retired, save the butler; who, drowned in tears, had not yet perceived my arrival.

"Bottlemore," I said, firmly, "where is the inclosure of Lady Madelaine's letter?"

He tendered it silently, and without raising his eyes.

"Here, gentlemen, is the task which you have to perform. Can it be accomplished to-night?"

"I fear it's impossible, miss," said he, who appeared to be the leader, and who was exhausting himself in reverences, each lower than the last, amid bales and packages all rolled in black wrappers, and looking like a group of coffins waiting for interment, as they lay huddled together in the dusky light; "unless, indeed, we worked till morning; but then, nightwork is double pay."

"Let it be done," said I, as I drew out the key and opened the door; "such a scene would be difficult to bear twice."

My foot was already on the threshold, when I suddenly started back with a slight scream, and clung to Bottlemore, who was following closely behind me.

"Madam, dear Miss Eveleen, what have you seen?" inquired the faithful old man, as he strove to look over my shoulder, while the sable-clad functionaries in his rear endeavored, in vain, to discover the cause of my panic; for the second battant of the door was still unopened, and the butler and myself had filled the vacant space.

In an instant I recovered myself. I was ashamed of my folly, although I still trembled from its effects. As I before stated, I had taken no heed of time, and was not aware that it had progressed so rapidly. The moon, then at its full, was pouring a flood of light over the room; and, as the door gave way under my hand, a stream of cold air swept like an icy breath across my face, while the draperies of the curtains flapped heavily, with a dull and smothered sound. In my excited state of mind, it was not wonderful that I was startled; but my surprise was still further increased, when, on entering the room, and advancing towards the marble table which occupied the centre of the floor, I saw the magnificent exotic flowers, which I had collected from the conservatories only that morning, lying scattered and withering beside the overturned vase which had contained them. As I was about to utter an exclamation, something suddenly rose from the floor beside me, and, with a rushing noise, made for the moonlighted window, and beat itself heavily against the glass. All was instantly explained. It was a wood-pigeon, which, probably pursued by a hawk, had found an entrance, by some means, into the apartment. But how? That enigma, also, was soon solved, by one of the workmen discovering a broken pane of glass in the centre window.

All these trifling facts, simple as they seemed nevertheless perplexed me greatly. That no accident of the sort had taken place until long past noon, I was well aware; for, after having completed my floral offering to my father, I had remained, for several hours, reading and musing in his apartment. I felt that, weak as it seemed, my nerves were now too much shaken to admit of my following up the trying duty which I had been about to perform; and when I saw the cold and business-like proceedings of the callous men about me, and beheld the floor and furniture heaped with sable masses, which appeared, to my excited senses, to have a death-scent hanging about them, I could contend no longer; but hurriedly desiring Bottlemore to take the whole direction upon himself; not to suffer a soul, save my sister Adela, no matter whom, to enter, except the workmen; and to bring me the key, which I would await in my dressing-room, the instant they had departed, I hurriedly retired. I felt the necessity of once more being alone; and, as I closed the door of my chamber behind me, I again flung myself into a seat, to mourn in bitterness, and, if possible, to weep.

CHAPTER XXII.

The workmen employed in my father's apartment were so little fastidious in their movements, that I distinctly heard the dull blows of the hammer, and the sound of many footsteps; but I scarcely regretted that it was so; I had attained to that degree of wretchedness which almost finds relief in every accession of discomfort. It seemed only fitting and consistent that, in a house deprived of its head, all should be changed; and that the deep quiet, to which its inmates had been so long accustomed, should be dispelled, like the dreams of hope and affection in which they might hitherto have enfolded the future. I even listened, that I might judge of the progress which was making in the lugubrious work; and more than once I felt tempted to exert my energies and to renew my intention of superintending their labors. I abstained, however; for, in the holiness of my first grief, I shrank from all unnecessary communication with strangers; and thus I sat, hour after hour, nursing my sad and bitter thoughts; now weeping over my sudden and irreparable loss, now asking myself what would be my future fate under the guidance and authority of such a mother as Lady Madelaine.

Daylight came creeping, dull and cheerless, through the windows of my room; in the confusion consequent upon the fatal event which had occurred, the curtains had been left undrawn; and, as I had refused all attendance, the omission had escaped notice. I saw, therefore, for the first time, the dreary contest between light and darkness which ever precedes a new day. I involuntarily rose and looked out, for the scene was consonant to my then state of feeling. Poets have sung brightly of the birth of day, and they are well borne out by the glories of a rising sun; but, before the roseate and golden splendor of this fair vision can be enjoyed, the watcher must first undergo the saddening and dreary spectacle of the morning twilight; and it was upon this that I stood and gazed at that melancholy moment. As the night broke, a cold shiver crept over my frame, and I drew my shawl more closely about me; everything upon which I looked partook of the same chilling character; a mass of wreathing mists overhung the surface of the lake, and dispersed slowly and sullenly, as if reluctant to disclose its limpid beauties. The dew hung heavily upon the trees, and at intervals fell in large drops to the earth, like tears wrung from a suffering spirit. The flowers were still closed; the sky was louring and leaden; and even the wind, as it swept by, moaned, as though it bewailed the comfortless aspect of the objects by which it was surrounded. The light, in cold and quivering streaks, looking in their dull setting like lances of polished steel, by slow degrees pierced through the dark vapors; and, lengthening and broadening into warmer beauty, eventually took a glow and a glory which foretold the coming of the mighty orb that was about to flood the earth with warmth and radiance.

I instinctively closed my eyes. My sympathies were no longer with the scene before me. The sun was again rising to gladden the earth —my hope was still buried. There was no longer anything in common between us; and I was in the act of letting fall the heavy curtains, in order once more to shroud myself in darkness, when I heard the sound of footsteps approaching my room, and immediately afterward a cautious stroke upon the door. As I replied to the signal for admission, Bottlemore opened it quietly, and moved toward me.

"Is all completed?" I asked.

"Not yet, madam," he replied, in a suppressed voice: "though everything is in active progress, and exactly according to the instructions; but this, my dear young lady, is not my errand. I have thought it my duty—" Here he paused—looked embarrassed, and then glanced from me to a small parcel which he held in his hand.

"Whatever it may be, if you feel that your duty requires it of you, do it fearlessly," I said, totally indifferent to every subject save that by which I was absorbed.

"I have discovered the cause of the broken window," resumed the butler, still evidently ill at ease; "I have brought it to you, madam; it is indeed addressed to you."

"To me!" I exclaimed, as I extended my hand tremblingly to receive it. "What can this mean, Bottlemore?"

The man shook his head. He had probably asked himself the same question more than once since the mysterious missile came into his possession.

The parcel, although small, was heavy; and as I eagerly carried it to the window, where the light had become sufficiently strong to enable me easily to trace the superscription, I found that it was, as he had said, directed to myself. I became much agitated; and as I tore it open, the curtain which I had hitherto held back with my hand fell behind me, and thus screened me from the observation of the attendant. The contents of the parcel were a large pebble, and a letter, addressed, as the envelope had been, to me. A letter! From whom could it come! I had never in my life received any written communication, save from my parents. I became fevered from anxiety, and my legs shook under me as I stood. I was glad, I knew not wherefore, that no one was by to observe me. I broke the seal, and glanced at the signature. It bore the name of Devereux. It was with difficulty that I suppressed an exclamation. Read the letter I could not, while I was conscious of the near neighborhood of the zealous servant who was awaiting my orders. I felt that I could not; and I instinctively struggled for composure, and emerged from my friendly concealment.

"'Tis a poor jest, good Bottlemore," I said, striving to force a smile, and, at the same time, giving into his hand the pebble and the paper in which it was inclosed. "From wherever it may have come, let it no longer intrude upon your time and thoughts, which are both required for more solemn duties at present. Hereafter, perhaps—" and I paused, for I knew not how to complete the sentence.

"A disrespectful and an unworthy jest," said the butler, turning over the pebble in his palm; "and at such a moment, too! But you say rightly, my dear young lady; we have now no time for fooleries like these. Before long, perhaps—" and he paused as I had done, made a low bow, and retired. If he felt any suspicion that he had been mystified, he, at least, looked none.

And now I was again alone. The blood was burning over brow and bosom. I remained motionless—undetermined—with my gaze fastened upon the curtain, behind which lay the letter that I had flung down when I emerged to dismiss Bottlemore. For the moment I had forgotten all—my dead father, the approaching arrival of my mother—the clouds which had gathered around my future destiny. I remembered nothing save myself and Devereux—the Devereux whom I had loved, and by whom I had been beloved in my turn. He was here, then—breathing the same air—looking upon the same light. Here! but at what a moment! Deep shame came upon me. The remembrance of my loss—a loss yet known to me only a few hours—made me recoil with disgust from my own selfishness; but the feeling did not last long—it could not. The very memory that I had no longer a father—that I should hereafter be the tool, and, perhaps, the victim, of the unloving rule of an estranged and careless mother—that I was, morally at least, an orphan—and that, without other support, I was helpless, soon reconciled me with myself. Moreover, there was a tinge of romance in the whole affair, which, doubtlessly, although I was at the moment unconscious of its influence, served not a little to silence my self-accusations.

The time went by so rapidly during this mental conflict, that, before I had decided on reading the letter, and ascertaining its purpose, Bottlemore was once more at my door to intimate that the funeral furniture of my father's apartment was completed; and to urge me respectfully to visit it in his presence, in order that he might, after gaining my sanction, dismiss the workmen. I extended my hand for the key, but declined the invitation. "Dismiss them on your own responsibility," I said; "I know that I can trust you. I dare not trust myself yet. I have undergone much, too much within the last few hours. I need rest before I can venture upon such a visit."

"But will you really take the rest that you require, my dear young lady?" asked the worthy old man. "You are indeed beaten down by your grief; and no wonder, Miss Eveleen, no wonder! Ah, we shall all soon better understand what we have lost. We never made enough of him when he was here, but we shall have time enough to mourn him—time enough and cause enough, from the highest to the lowest."

Subdued as I previously was by conflicting emotions, this generous and impulsive burst of sorrow completely overcame me. It unlocked my tears, and once again I found relief.

"Leave me, my worthy friend," I sobbed with difficulty; and, all my haughtiness leveled for the moment by this common demonstration of a common grief, I extended my hand to the faithful favorite of my father, who pressed his lips reverentially upon it, and then silently disappeared.

No! I had said rightly; I could not accompany him to the death-chamber—I dared not. It would have seemed to me like sacrilege to have intruded there, when I had so recently loosened my grasp of Devereux's letter, with feelings all absorbed in its receipt. No—this I could not do. There was a short interval of tumult in the gallery. The strangers were departing. I then heard the crushing sound of wheels upon the gravel; this soon died away also, and then all was silence both without and within the house. I flung open a window—it was not that beneath which the letter lay—and the sweet, soft air of the early morning came upon me like incense. All upon which I looked was glowing with freshness and beauty. The lake-ripple danced with its silver feet joyously in the sunshine, to the music of the fresh breeze that bore it company; the flowers had all opened their cups, and the bees and butterflies were sipping their morning-draughts from the jeweled chalices; while the birds, heaven's own chosen choir, were singing their matins in notes which seemed to invite all nature to join in their hallelujahs. A change had come over the whole earth, yet I shrank from it no longer. I was still in tears—still sorrowing—but a sun had risen in my heart, which had wrought its own change also.

And still the letter lay where I had cast it down.

I do not remember the course of my thoughts during the hours that I sat, silent and motionless, beside that open window. I believe that at intervals I could not strictly be said to think at all. My brain whirled from over-exertion, and induced that physical apathy which makes us shrink from further efforts; and in this way, also, do I account for the length of time which I suffered to elapse before I determined on the perusal of Devereux's letter. I knew that it lay near me; that I could possess myself of it in an instant; and I was satisfied with this conviction. He had not forgotten me; that was enough for the present moment. Like the crater of a volcano, which trembles for a time after the violence of the explosion is past, so did I suffer from the shock of the blow I had experienced, and helplessly yield myself up to its latent effects. Yet, despite the intensity of my first anguish, a feeling of calm had stolen over me, which had soothed me into quietude; and, for awhile, this alone was almost happiness. There was no jarring influence either within or about me. I was dreaming a waking dream, in which, occasionally, I was so mentally annihilated that I was unconscious even of my own existence.

But this state of things could not last forever. The new day brings its claims and its duties to all classes of society. I was recalled to myself by passing footsteps and answering voices. With some difficulty I overcame my reluctance to terminate my solitude, and to return, as it appeared at the moment, into life; but I knew that I had no alternative; so, gathering up the long-neglected letter, I locked it away carefully in my desk, without hazarding one glance at its contents, and rang for Joséphine.

CHAPTER XXIII.

It was not until I began to exert myself, and had gone through the weariness of another toilet, that I discovered the extent of my fatigue. As I glanced into the dressing-glass, I scarcely knew myself; my eyes were dull and heavy, my cheeks and lips colorless, and my whole countenance swollen and disfigured. "And this is then the work of grief," I murmured to myself; "this is all the opposition which youth and beauty can offer to the sorrows and trials of the world." My vanity was humbled by the conviction. I had never understood, until became myself the proof, that a few hours could have wrought such havoc in early life.

I swallowed, with considerable effort, a few spoonfuls of chocolate; dismissed Joséphine as hastily as possible; and resolved at once to examine the letter of Devereux, which would, in all probability—thus did I argue as an apology to myself for giving to it the precedence of nearer and higher duties—enable me to endure with more composure the trials of the day.

Hurriedly I drew it from its concealment. I felt like a guilty thing, and moved away from the window, as though to prevent the very sunshine from penetrating my secret. My breath came thick, my hands trembled, and the room and all the objects which it contained appeared to revolve about me. Nevertheless, I persisted; and as I read I became less agitated. These were the contents of the letter:—

My own Eveleen!—

"Yes, so I will call you until your own lips forbid it—I address you in an awful and melancholy moment. I have just learnt your fatal loss. In another hour I shall have left town for Rooksley. Do not misjudge me for urging my own interests in the very midst of your first great sorrow: it is because I trust to mitigate your grief by my assurances of sympathy and tenderness that I feel urged to do so. I am aware that in losing your admirable father you have also lost your best and surest hope for the future. I know that the rule of your mother will be one of cold-heartedness and caprice. It is, therefore, at this hour that you need a friend. I shall trust to the fortune which generally favors those who love, for the opportunity of seeing, or, at least, of hearing from you. I dread everything from the violence of your grief: but remember, you once assured me that you loved me; you received my vows in return; you are consequently mine—my own—and you must learn to be comforted for my sake. Hitherto I have been passive, because I felt that time must do much for us, and I was anxious not to mar its beneficial effects by any premature imprudence; now, however, I hold myself bound by our common affection to be near you, even although I may not be enabled to see you beneath your paternal roof; for, cruel as this deprivation will necessarily prove to both of us, it is one to which I feel, my Eveleen, that we must be resigned. We are not yet at an age when we can emancipate ourselves from authority; but I have been too long an utter stranger to all your movements. Your name has been studiously avoided both by your mother and my own. There can be no doubt that, at the termination of her mourning, Lady Madelaine will introduce you into the world: you are young, beautiful, and attractive; and I tremble when I remember how little we yet know of each other; when I reflect upon the homage and adulation by which you will be immediately surrounded. It is true, that I have already mixed with that same world, and that I have found nothing there which could for a moment divert my heart from you; but how can I be mad enough to hope that such would be your case! Suffer me, then, I implore you, by any means which we can mutually adopt, to secure a deeper and a more tender interest in your affections. Let me be at once a brother and a lover.

"—— I am interrupted. Adieu—till I reach Rooksley. When I have ascertained how I can best communicate with you, I will add a postscript. Till then—good angels guard you!

"Herbert Devereux.

"P. S. I am here, my own Eveleen; here, at the little inn near the park gate—how happy, I need not add, when I tell you that I have seen you. I could not have sought a fairer vision for my dreams! I have seen you, Eveleen, standing near a window, arranging flowers in a porcelain vase, and thus have I discovered your apartment. So far, destiny has been propitious to me! I have prowled like a poacher through the Rooksley woods since daylight. I am now about to make a cold, senseless stone my envied messenger. My only terror is lest I should alarm you by the rude method which I am compelled to adopt to insure the safe and secret receipt of my letter—lest I should scare you from your soft rest, and awaken you from some sleeping vision in which, perchance, my image may have found a place. But, no; your dreams, my poor Eveleen, your rest is too precious to me; and both will be so soon and sadly clouded, that I will forbear until I feel convinced that you have left your chamber. I find that they are still ignorant in the village of the fatal event which has occurred, and consequently the tidings cannot yet have reached Rooksley. Sleep on, then, my stricken love, sleep on in peace, while such slumber may still be yours. In a few hours you may welcome me as a comforter. H. D."

"I do—I do!" I exclaimed, mentally, as I pressed the paper to my lips and bosom; "generous, confiding Devereux! you have, indeed, spoken peace, where all was wretchedness and dread." I was for a moment steeped in happiness; my tears were stayed, or, if they continued to fall, it was from a feeling which rendered me unconscious of the fact. A rainbow had burst through the storm-clouds by which I had been so lately enveloped. I might not see him; but all my doubts, all my misgivings, were now over—Devereux still loved me! Nor need the reader wonder at my temporary exaltation. I have already shown how fondly, yet how fearfully, I had long accustomed myself to dwell upon his image; nor will any one, who knows aught of human nature, doubt how much my boy-lover had gained by these retrospective reveries.

My first burst of gratified vanity and satisfied affection over, however, darkness once more gathered about my spirit. My sorrows were not removed, although they were mitigated, by this selfish joy. Alas! they admitted of no present remedy. I closed the letter slowly and sadly, for I felt that I could have dwelt upon it for hours; I replaced it in my desk, and was in the act of turning the key which was to conceal my treasure from all eyes save my own, when the door of my apartment softly opened, and Adela stood before me. I felt the blood leap to my brow. One instant sooner, and my secret might have been discovered! It was evident that she mistook the cause of my emotion: for, stopping abruptly in the centre of the floor, she said hastily, as a slight flush rose to her own cheek:

"Forgive me, Eveleen, not only that I have intruded upon you unsought, but also for the unceremonious manner in which I entered. I forbore to make any noise, in the hope that you were endeavoring to obtain a little rest; and I ventured here to ascertain if it indeed were so, having learnt from Josephine that you had watched all night."

"I thank you, Adela," I said in surprise, as I extended my hand; "I have sought sleep in vain. The evil has come too suddenly—I had so much to regret—so much to repent."

"We have, indeed, learnt our dark lesson early," replied my sister, with a sigh; "should life continue to seem to me what both the present and the past have hitherto made it, regret and repentance must, I should think, be the inseparable companions to which we are all fated."

"Yet the world looks upon us both as objects of envy, Adela," I said bitterly.

"Upon us?—say, rather, upon yourself, Eveleen. Young, beautiful, rich, idolized—well might you inspire the feeling. But of me the world knows nothing, and recks less; the banished daughter, the outcast alien, the discarded exile, the helpless girl, who for years—and those the years when all the purest affections are ready to gush forth on all around, and the awakening intellect takes note of every deprivation, both of heart and spirit—was banished and forgotten, or else, I say, that world of which you speak, would perchance have turned an eye less misjudging upon me."

I was startled, almost affrighted, by the deep and concentrated passion with which this young girl, not yet fifteen years of age, gave utterance, in these burning words, to the indignation of her soul. In themselves they were calculated only to excite sympathy, and to awaken tenderness and pity; but the expression of her flashing eye, the withering bitterness of her quivering lip, the haughty defiance which appeared to dilate her whole form, were beyond all written description. Tullia must have worn such a look when she drove her chariot-wheels over the dead body of her father. My sister could never again be to me the silent and supine being to whom I had become accustomed, and whom I had despised in the haughty independence of my own nature. I felt awed by the excess of an emotion of which I had never believed her capable, and before which I involuntarily recoiled. I was at once conscious that, in my hasty judgment of her character, I had made a dangerous mistake. I now saw that she did not, like myself, fritter away her powers of mind and body, or betray the inward workings of her spirit, upon every petty provocation; but that she had already learned the secret of burying her thoughts too deeply to expose them to the scrutiny of every idle observer.

We were more estranged in heart from that moment than ever. I felt that my sister was an enemy to be feared; and a strange, shapeless, phantom-like conviction came suddenly upon me that she was destined to be MY enemy. Nevertheless, I approached her; I even extended my hand, but she affected not to perceive it.

"I pray you, Adela, do not yield to feelings so painful at such a moment as this," I said with difficulty.

"I thank you for the counsel," she replied coldly and placidly, already restored to perfect calm; "the error was involuntary—I blush to have discovered so much weakness. The stricken deer should hide itself to weep, not call the hunters round it."

"Nay, speak less bitterly, Adela," I rejoined; "you know not how grateful I should be for your confidence at another moment."

"I have no secrets to confide. I have just laid bare my whole history before you; not that this communication was necessary, but simply that you might not again confuse my past career and your own in your memory. Enough, however, of myself; as you have just reminded me—this is not the moment."

"Do not believe that I intended to imply a rebuke by the remark."

"I had no such suspicion. It was right that you, who had just spent so many hours in one deep, unbroken chain of agonizing grief—in one long flood of ceaseless and inconsolable tears, without indulging in a single thought of self, should shrink with almost loathing from any less demonstrative exhibition of filial regret."

Adela had stabbed me to the quick. My head sank upon my breast; I was crushed. And she stood there before me, calm, and cold, and placid, as though no storm of passion had ever swept across her brow, and that she was an alien from all the frailties and weaknesses of humanity. After a moment's pause, my awakening pride lent me words.

"You are mistaken, Adela," I said steadily; "mine was no such devoted vigil. That I wept and sorrowed for my dead father is indeed true; wept, as the repentant and the bereaved alone can weep—wept, as perchance I never may again in this world. But there were many, many intervals when I sorrowed alone for myself—for you."

"The last was needless," interposed my listener with a bitter smile; "tears are not so strange to my eyelids that another should shed them for me; nor am I, even young as I am, so unacquainted with sorrow as to be unable to bear my own burden."

"Do you refuse my sympathy?"

"I do. It comes too late. I have mastered the lesson of self-dependence. I ask sympathy from no one."

"Yet, from an only sister—"

"Rather say, only a sister—from a friend I might perchance be brought to endure it."

"Why should we not be friends?"

"Have you ever believed it possible? I could give you a hundred reasons to the contrary; but it were idle to do so when you can read them in your own heart—in your own struggles to affect the mere semblance of friendship for the forsaken daughter and the despised sister. Let us abjure such mockery, Eveleen. I am content to await your affection, until, like my prototype Cinderella, I have fitted on the slipper of high fortune. There is a moral in that little tale."

I was sick at heart. Overwhelmed by this new and sudden development of my sister's character, my thoughts once more turned back to Devereux. He was the one star in my horizon of darkness. I felt that without his love and the consciousness of his proximity, I should have fallen into a state of apathy and despair. In my own home I had now nothing to hope. And was this to be the termination, this the climax of my brilliant girlhood? Again the image of Devereux rose upon my mental vision, and rebuked me for the thought. My sister had left the room as she ceased speaking, nor did I make one effort to detain her. I was glad to be for a time alone with my secret. At that moment I felt no inclination to confide to her the anxiety by which I was overwhelmed. Perhaps, had she evinced some evidence of sisterly sympathy and feeling, it might have been otherwise; for nothing so thoroughly opens the heart as sorrow; but this was not to be, and we parted even more coldly than we had met.

Solitude, nevertheless, brought me little comfort. for reflection had become painful, and she had added to its bitterness. I wrung my hands in despair. Conscious as I was that I had already lived through a long life of emotion and mental experience, I was painfully aware that those about me still affected to consider me as a child, and I revolted at the injustice, I felt degraded by the position in which I was placed. The memory of Lady Madelaine could not have been so utterly blunted but that she must have thoroughly comprehended the nature and extent of the mortification to which the companionship of a Lady Flora Glenfillan must naturally subject me, as well as that of an estranged and unloving sister. In my father I might indeed have found encouragement and support; and, in a few short days, he would be in his grave. Even in the persevering affection of Devereux there was bitterness; for he did not dare to seek me openly, as an avowed and permitted suitor, but was condemned to prowl surreptitiously about the house which I inhabited, subject to constant surprise and perpetual insult from my mother's menials.

This last reflection brought with it another which touched me nearly. He was still mistaken as to the identity of my apartment; and might, by this error, be led into a second imprudence similar to that by which I had become possessed of his letter. And how was this danger to be avoided? I could not condescend to make a confidant of one of my own attendants. I could not invite their suspicions or their sarcasms by avowing my acquaintance with his presence in the village; nor did the whole course of my desultory reading furnish me with any other alternative. I knew not how to proceed.

I had so long accustomed myself to indulge my melancholy musings in the study of my father, that rather from instinct than reason, at this period of my reverie, I rose from my seat, and, drawing the key from my pocket, bent my way slowly thither, utterly thoughtless or regardless of the change which had been wrought in its appearance since I last left it. Great was indeed that change. The walls, the floors, the windows, all wore one solemn livery. There was a mockery of magnificence throughout the elaborate arrangement of the whole apartment. The garb and trappings of death had been distorted into vanity; and my soul sickened as I entered, and closed the door behind me. The draperies of dull and heavy velvet, with their tasseled cords, shut out the beams of the mid day sun, and left within a dim, ghastly twilight The care of a kindly hand had indeed replaced the vase of flowers which I had left overthrown and scattered, and it formed the only point of life in the solemn picture, for the books and mirrors were alike veiled from sight.

I felt as though I were an intruder; and I threw myself down in agony upon a sofa draped with a deeply-fringed pall, to weep afresh over my bereavement. After a while I became oppressed by the weight of the atmosphere, and flung open one of the windows, even suffering the light and warmth from without to pass for a moment into the apartment. The effect of the change was cheering; and I was about once more with regret to let fall the drapery, when my eye rested on the figure of a man stealthily emerging from the nearest shrubbery. My heart bounded as I watched him. He was tall and slight, and dressed in deep mourning. Suddenly he raised his head, and glanced hurriedly over the house. I could not be mistaken. It was Devereux!

In extreme agitation I withdrew from the window; and, in another instant, I heard his step beneath it. The black curtains had evidently startled him into doubt, for during several seconds no result followed. He was apparently communing with himself. At the end of that period, however, a similar missive to that which he had first employed struck against the curtain, and then fell heavily to the floor. Then, and then only, I ventured for one moment to the window, and looked down upon him. As he saw me, he stood for an instant motionless, and was about to speak, when, motioning him to silence, I pointed to the funereal draperies, and shaking my head, indicated by my outstretched finger, as I leant for a brief minute from the casement, the window of my own apartment. That done, I drew back hurriedly; and, letting fall the curtain, listened from behind it to his light and hasty steps as he departed; and then, snatching up the new letter of which he had been the bearer, I hurried tremblingly to my own room.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The deed was done. I had now sanctioned his intrusion; had permitted his clandestine correspondence; and had virtually acknowledged his claim; yet I felt no remorse. What, I mentally asked himself, could there be blamable in my case, in such a concession? He alone remained on earth to love me. Was it not natural that I should cling to his affection? I did not allow myself the hesitation of a moment. With eager hands I tore away the covering of the letter; and, having pressed it to my lips, read it throughout with all the eagerness of strong emotion. It was replete with tenderness; and my heart beat joyfully as I ascertained that, fearful of discovery for my sake, he had resolved never again to repeat the dangerous experiment of approaching the house, and had accordingly sought and discovered a place of concealment for his letters in the hollow trunk of a willow overhanging the lake, which he indicated with a care that rendered mistake on my part impossible, and where he besought me to deposit my replies.

At a happier moment the romance of such an arrangement would have enchanted me; and even in that hour of sorrow and perplexity, I derived consolation from the promise which it held out of a lengthened communion. I wiped away my tears, pressed back the hair that had fallen over my face, and resolved, assisted by this new and momentary energy, to brave the meeting with Lady Flora from which I had hitherto shrunk. I was evidently unexpected in the drawing-room. Adela was drowned in tears, and appeared to have resigned herself to a paroxysm of silent grief; while Lady Flora sat behind her tapestry frame, on which a white handkerchief was ceremoniously displayed, deep in the mysteries of her laborious idleness.

My stay in the apartment was cold and brief. I listened, with all the patience I could command, to the maudling and lip-deep condolements which were poured forth before me; but for the speculations which had grown out of the recent bereavement, I had no ear; and I accordingly broke in upon them by a stately courtesy, and eseaped from the room. I had not yet cast off my shawl, so, folding it closely round me, I passed through the conservatory, and soon found myself beside the willow of the lake. I sat down beneath its pendent branches. I felt as though I had there found a new home and a new hope. All was bright and beautiful about me; I was young. I believed myself to be beloved. I tried to remember that every sorrow, however deep and heartfelt, must have its term; and to feel that I alone should not be excluded from this, the great and blessed privilege of time. No philosophy can be more welcome or more easy to a sanguine spirit than this—how then could I fail to be comforted by such a train of thought? I did not. I was still sad, still remorseful, but I no longer despaired. I ceased to feel terror as the image of my mother rose up before me—the tears which I continued to give to the memory of my father lost their bitterness; I no longer suffered myself to be troubled by visions of the hatred of Lady Flora and my sister; in one word, I was reconciled to myself; I was no longer an outcast and an alien from every heart.—Devereux had burst through the dark spell; and—I was beloved!

When I rose to return to the house, I was a new being—my hope and energy were alike enewed. I hastened to replace the faded flowers in my father's apartment, and then closed the window which I had opened some hours previously. But I did not linger in the room; its solemn gloom appalled me; I wanted light and air. I wanted action and physical exertion; and the latter I could not find in the solitude of my own apartment. I had, consequently, only one miserable resource, and, faute de mieux, I sought it at the dinner-table, over which, with her white handkerchief still ostentatiously displayed, Lady Flora presided. The meal was gloomy enough; the very servants moved mechanically about like automata, while an almost unbroken silence prevailed among ourselves.

M

The same cold and decent countenance was maintained throughout the whole period which elapsed until the day of the funeral. Had an unsuspected spectator seen us, as we sat hour after hour with our work or our books, we should have inevitably been cited as models of duty and propriety; but what was the fact? Lady Flora was rejoicing in her heart of hearts, as her needle passed slowly and monotonously through the eternal canvas upon which she was employed, at her unlooked-for emancipation from a dreaded thrall; Adela preserved her usual mask of sullen self-command; or, if she ever wept, she did so only when my eye was not upon her; while I myself, who but a few days before had believed that my father's death was to me the seal of wretchedness which I must forever bear upon my brow, even I found time, at stated intervals, to visit the border of the lake, and to receive or reply to letters breathing only affection and hope. There existed, moreover, a feeling of repulsion among our party, as well understood by each of us as though we had put it frankly and boldly into words; and thus neither felt an inclination to dispel the silence, nor to lessen the estrangement.

On the funeral morning, this social monotony was painfully broken by the sight of the deep mourning garments in which we were mutually attired. The effect produced upon myself I shall never forget. The dream-like feeling which had hitherto possessed me was dispelled at once; and the full conviction of all that I had lost forced itself glaringly upon me. It is so difficult at first to comprehend the reality of death by your own side, at your own hearth, invading your very circle, and gliding closely by you as you wander beneath your paternal roof. Seeing about you, on every hand, a thousand trifling and apparently frail objects, the property of the departed, it seems impossible that such toys, such very nothings, can have survived their owner; but the crape, the bombazeen, the banded hair, and all the conventionalities of the garb of grief, put to flight at once the flattering delusion. You bear the symbols of death upon you, and you can deceive yourself no longer.

Three days afterward, Lady Madelaine arrived at Rooksley. She looked surpassingly beautiful in her widow's dress, which was not at that period the slight and elegantly-varied costume which it has become in these days. Her splendid hair was entirely hidden; not a glimpse of her swan-like throat was visible; and thus the triumph of her loveliness was complete. She appeared conscious of the fact, and was evidently pleased by the look of astonished admiration with which I met her. I have already stated that she had never loved my father, even in the first days of their marriage; nor did she now assume a demeanor of deep grief, or affect any excess of sorrow. She was calm, composed, and courteous; although it was easy to perceive that she shrank painfully from the denuded aspect of everything about her, and received the greeting of her half-sister with a thrill of disgust. She examined Adela with more curiosity than interest; and there was indifference as well as coldness in the solitary kiss which she imprinted on her fore mead. Chilling as it was, however, it evidently sufficed to satisfy her daughter, who, after this brief welcome to her maternal home, silently and placidly resumed her seat.

To me her manner, although betraying no vestige of affection, was nevertheless more cordial. She even smiled, as she scrutinized my appearance; and then, throwing herself back listlessly in her chair, she abandoned herself to thought. No one presumed to intrude upon her reverie. With all her self-command and mechanism of feeling, it was impossible that she could remain unmoved at the sight of the once splendid and still noble home which a fond and hopeful husband had provided for her in the first blaze of her youth and beauty.

At such a moment, human nature will assert itself even in the coldest hearts. It is true that this home was still hers; but he who had so proudly made her its mistress could welcome her there no more. There might long have ceased to be even the semblance of affection between them, but mutual admiration and esteem must have continued to the last. Moreover, the force of habit is powerful with us all; more powerful than we are willing to believe until we are compelled to test its truth. I felt glad to see that my mother was not altogether beyond its influence; and to me that deep, and silent, and motionless reverie appeared almost holy.

On the morrow, I was suddenly summoned to her dressing-room, just as I had returned from a hurried visit to the lake, and was engaged in reading a letter from Devereux, in which he informed me that, having learnt the arrival of Lady Madelaine, he could no longer risk remaining in the village, conscious as he was that the discovery of his presence there would inevitably ruin our hopes. He said much also to console me for his temporary absence, for which he had before prepared me; and, finally, entreated me to believe that no change either of time or place could for one moment operate upon his affection. I had shed many and bitter tears over this letter, which terminated with an entreaty that I would deposit my reply in the course of the day at the accustomed spot; and give him an assurance of my acquiescence in his plans, and my own resolution to bear with hope and patience the trials which might possibly await me until we again met.

I was ill prepared to meet my mother at such a moment; for, aware of the indignation with which she would visit my clandestine correspondence with a man whom she had driven from her house, and treated with a contempt and contumely which he was never likely to forgive; conscious, too, that some accident might have betrayed my secret, in which case the whole weight of her displeasure must necessarily fall upon myself, at a moment when I had no one near to mitigate its bitterness, or to support me under its infliction, I had scarcely power to obey her bidding. There was, however, no alternative; so, hastily bathing my eyes in cold water, and throwing off my bonnet, I proceeded with a slow and uncertain step to her apartment.

"Why do you approach me like a criminal, Eveleen?" she asked, hastily, as she extended her hand on my entrance; "have you forgotten that I am now your only parent, and that I have a right to expect a friend in my daughter? You are no longer a child: in another month you will be sixteen years of age;" and she sighed as she said it. "Draw a chair to my side. It is now time that we should understand each other. I shall, in all probability, pass some months here, and I can only look to you for companionship. But first, tell me, have you caused the orders which I sent down through Dale to be obeyed? I allude to the room of—"

"All has been done precisely as you directed," I replied, considerably relieved to find that the summons of Lady Madelaine bore no relation to my treasured secret; "and as you will, perhaps, wish to visit it," I continued, drawing the key from my pocket, "you will require this."

My mother waved it back with her hand. "As you assure me that all proper respect has been paid to Mr. Tilden in the eyes of the establishment, I am satisfied with that assurance. I cannot volunteer an additional and useless trial of my nerves. But why is this key in your possession? Have you closed the room?"

"I have," was my confused reply.

"And wherefore?"

"I entreat you to pardon me if I have done amiss," I said, tremblingly; "but there is now one inmate at Rooksley, whose cold and dictatorial comments I could not brook in this case, although in all others I have submitted to them with what patience I could assume, out of respect for yourself."

"You allude to Lady Flora?"

"I do."

"She is, then, obnoxious to you?"

"Detestable!"

"A strong term for a lady's lips, Miss Tilden; but I fear, from the brief experience of last evening, too easily to be excused. It is strange how time softens down the different objects which make up the picture of the past! I fancied that Lady Flora was, at least, endurable, and that, although not a person whom I should be anxious to present in public, I might with safety contemplate her companionship during a period of retirement. It would appear, however, that I have deceived myself, and that, when I shuddered at the memory of Miss Margery Macspleuchan, I might have included her niece in the emotion."

"Whatever cause of offence toward yourself you had discovered in me previously to our last parting," I said, somewhat haughtily, "your ladyship was amply revenged from the moment that Lady Flora Glenfillan became an inmate of Rooksley."

"Poor Eveleen!" said my mother, with a low mocking laugh, "you have, then, been punished bitterly! It is by no means to be deplored, however: you required a check-rein, and I had neither time nor talent to apply it. But what of your sister?"

"I know nothing of her."

"Your answer is singular! Have you not lived under the same roof for months! How, then, can you make so absurd a reply?"

"Simply, because I speak the truth; and, moreover, I would decline to express even the inferences which I may have formed of her character."

"I can fully understand that she is both shy and ignorant. I must get her off my hands as I best can, which, thanks to her fortune, I am sure to do at last."

I felt that I smiled, for I had a firm conviction that Miss Adela Tilden was not a person to be "got off the hands" even of a Lady Madelaine, should she not herself so will it.

"She is very plain and awkward," pursued my mother, as she glanced at her own lovely reflection in the cheval glass which was placed before her sofa; "I know not who she resembles."

"She has fine eyes."

"Indeed! Well, that is something in her favor; but she is gauche, and ill at ease."

"As regards the latter feeling I can say nothing; but I must venture to differ from your ladyship respecting the gaucherie. At your first meeting Adela may have been agitated, and, consequently, have appeared to disadvantage; but, generally speaking, her great charm lies in her gracefulness."

"I wish that you may, in a year or two, be able to persuade the men of all this, for you seem to be quite engouée of Lady Flora's pupil; but I confess that I despair of effecting any such result. I see nothing in your sister but a plain, gawky, overgrown girl, shy in her manner and sullen in her deportment. I detest such still life."

For the second time I could have laughed outright, but I restrained the impulse; for, not only was I too proud to prejudice Lady Madelaine still more against my sister (had it been possible), but also, however gracious she might be at the moment, my memory fell back upon other scenes, which I had not yet either forgotten or forgiven; and I resolved to let her purchase her experience of Adela's real nature as I had done. I therefore weighed every word before I uttered it; nor did I add to the evident disgust of my mother toward the wayward but unfortunate girl by one syllable of comment upon the hatred which she nourished to all who now bore the name of Tilden.

As yet Lady Madelaine had been unable to observe the great change which had been wrought in the domestic arrangements of the establishment, for she had taken both her supper of the previous evening and her morning chocolate in her dressing-room. Great as was the resistance made by the household, they had not ventured to defy the authority of Lady Flora Glenfillan altogether; she had, moreover, profited by the period of consternation and depression which had elapsed since my father's death, to enforce her authority more stringently than before; and the appointments, as well as the supplies of the first repast at which my mother assisted en famille, consequently filled her with indignation and disgust.

"Is this a meditated insult, sir?" she asked, as, after glancing over the table, she rose from her seat and turned haughtily toward poor Bottlemore, who was about to commence his duties; "did you imagine that, in becoming a widow, I also became a pauper? Was it not enough that you have denuded, or enveloped with paltry coverings and contrivances, every room at Rooksley; but must I, moreover, be expected to preside at a repast to which I would not condemn my own servants?"

"The orders of my Lady Flora have been strictly obeyed, my lady," replied the butler, in a tone which savored strongly of triumph; "her ladyship has been peremptory on the subject of the bill of fare, and I could do no more, consistently with my respect for your ladyship's sister, than remonstrate, which I have done in vain."

"Enough, Mr. Bottlemore," said my mother, as she turned with a stately gesture to leave the room. "I will retire to my own apartments until Mrs. Locksley has caused the saloon to be made habitable, which you will instruct her to do forthwith; and let another dinner be served two hours hence for which I shall not need to blush before my own daughters."

Bottlemore bowed low, and held the door open during a few seconds, in order that his lady might pass; but, as she suddenly paused in the centre of the floor when she ceased speaking, after satisfying himself of the fact, he silently withdrew, followed by his subordinates.

"One word more bearing upon the same disgraceful subject," pursued Lady Madelaine, when the door was again closed: "I expect, also, that those with whom I am to sit down to table will appear as gentlewomen, and never presume, in my house, to affect a costume suited only to the servants' offices, and that my entrance-hall may not be degraded into a depository for filthy woolen garments, as it was this morning when I passed through from the grounds."

"Filthy woolen garments, my Lady Madelaine!" almost shrieked the crestfallen Lady Flora, while the red spot burnt upon her brow; "sure it's uncanny in your father's child to ca' it by sic' a name. Why, woman, you's the Glenfillan tartan!"

"I would advise you, in that case, to send it home," said my mother, with cool and withering contempt; "or, should you prefer to do so, wear it home, unless you have also provided yourself with a Macspleuchan plaid, as a more consistent covering."

The dragon was fairly silenced, for she felt no inclination to sacrifice the luxuries of Rooksley to a sarcasm, and five minutes afterward we had all quitted the dining-room. Lady Flora's reign was over.

CHAPTER XXV.

One only interruption broke in upon our hermit-like retirement, and that one was the apparition of Lady O'Halloran, who was so coldly received that she never repeated her visit. The fastidiousness of my mother was so deeply wounded by the ignorance and vulgarity of her relative, that she could not brook an appearance in her society. This was not, however, the only cause of her discourtesy to her husband's friend. I had mentioned to her the interest and kindness which both Adela and myself had experienced from Lady O'Halloran, and she had listened with complacency, if not with utter indifference; but I had no sooner added that a letter from my father had induced it, than I saw a cloud gather upon her brow. Mr. Tilden had thwarted her wishes—nay, he had even incited one who to her was comparatively a stranger to infringe her express commands, and thenceforth she looked upon the well-meaning and warm-hearted woman with a feeling of distrust and avoidance. Au reste, half the county families left their cards at the lodges, but contented themselves with that ceremonious demonstration; Lady Madelaine had never been more to them than the wife of Mr. Tilden, and with his death terminated all their interest in Rooksley.

Five lines will suffice to assure the reader that my mother could not long endure such a state of things as this; and, accordingly, a very few weeks had elapsed since her arrival before she began to exhibit weariness of her daughters, and of everything about her. She had paraded the dull luxury of her mourning equipage and liveries through the county-town, already astir with the preparations for a new election. She had exchanged visiting-tickets with all her acquaintance; she had, in short, exhausted her own resources and those of the neighborhood; and she no longer knew how to dispose of her existence. Her temper suffered greatly under these circumstances; and I began to marvel how long I should be enabled to endure its exactions, when one morning, unexpectedly to all, save Lady Madelaine herself, Sir James Dornton was announced. No event could have been more welcome, for we were all literally wasting our lives in lethargy and discomfort. Our party was not only ill-assorted, but actually antipathetical; and we lived on, in the perfect consciousness that time only widened the moral breach between us.

My mother's welcome to this new guest was cordial, frank, and unaffected; while she alluded to her expectation of seeing him with an easy, unembarrassed manner which was an earnest of the continued friendship that existed between them; it nevertheless struck me as extraordinary, that Sir James did not meet her calm and dignified courtesy in the same spirit. He appeared restless, absent, and nervous; nor was his manner toward myself less peculiar. When, after having exchanged a few sentences with Lady Madelaine, he turned to greet me in my turn, he glanced rapidly in my face, and then dropped his eyes, still retaining the hand which I had extended to him, for a moment; after which he released it suddenly and abruptly, and having received, to my intense surprise, the "How are ye, Sir James?" of Lady Flora, and a quiet courtesy of recognition from Adela, he once more turned toward my mother; and, seating himself by her side, they were soon deeply engaged in conversation. Once or twice Lady Madelaine, apparently compelled thereto by the subject discussed, made some distant allusion to her recent loss; but it met with no response from her companion, who seemed studiously to avoid its mention.

At first I felt indignant with both parties for their evident avoidance of so natural a topic; but after a time, wearied by a thousand useless conjectures of the how and where Lady Flora and my sister had previously met him, I became interested in spite of myself by the dialogue which they maintained. I heard again the names of persons who had once been known to me; and of a world with which I had long panted to make my acquaintance. Sir James was caustic and brilliant; and his quiet sarcasm, biting though it was, lent a zest and a raciness to all he said. My mother was once more in her proper element. She felt that she was to her own set as a lost pleiad of brilliancy and fashion; and that her return to the great world would be hailed with gladness. Dornton was most assiduous in strengthening this belief; and, with a tact which spoke volumes for his savoir vivre, he contrived to speak far more of herself than of any of those whom he passed under review. Lady Flora, meanwhile, worked on in silence, or occasionally addressed a few words in an undertone to Adela; who, since the entrance of our new guest, had scarcely raised her eyes from the floor.

Despite my own interest in the conversation, I confess that I felt somewhat piqued at the marked neglect which I experienced from this preux chevalier of fashion, who, two years before, had condescended to exert his powers for my sole amusement; and who now had neither word nor look for any one save my mother.

All the dignity of my sixteen years revolted against this inconsistency: and the consciousness of possessing both grace and beauty added bitterness to the mortification. I never thought him less attractive. I had, moreover, ample time for all my reflections, for no change took place throughout the evening, nor did either himself or Lady Madelaine move from their seats, until he rose, announcing that he had secured an apartment at the Tilden Arms in the village; and would, with her ladyship's permission, join our breakfast-table in the morning.

I was employed until I fell asleep that night, in marveling at the acquaintanceship which existed between Sir James Dornton and my relatives. Where they could have met baffled all my conjectures. That his name had never been mentioned by either of them was less surprising, for we exchanged little conversation and less confidence. Still, I felt that the circumstance was in itself singular: and the habits and haunts of Dornton considered, altogether inexplicable. Then flashed across me new matter of marvel. Since Lady Madelaine saw fit to receive male guests at Rooksley so early in her widowhood, how chanced it that Lord Otterford was not her first visitor!

I knew nothing of the scene at the Putney villa; and I could not reconcile the present with the past, otherwise than by presuming that the extreme intimacy which had existed between my mother and the latter rendered her scrupulous in receiving him during her first period of mourning.

Sir James remained at Rooksley four days, on the last of which he was closeted with Lady Madelaine for a considerable time. When they rejoined the family, there was a faint flush on the cheek of my mother, and a bright light in her eye, which gave her a look of unusual animation; while Sir James was comparatively silent and depressed. The evening passed heavily enough, although Lady Madelaine exerted herself most unwontedly to enliven it.

To me she was unusually gracious; indeed, at times almost affectionate; yet I fancied that all her gaiety was assumed. It was, at all events, very evident that something extraordinary had taken place between the friends, but what that something might be I was not destined to discover; as, after the departure of Sir James, she made no allusion whatever to the circumstance, contenting herself with quiet comments on his fashion and high-breeding, and his great conversational powers.

Two months subsequently, Lady Madelaine declared that her health and spirits were both giving way under the dull monotony of Rooksley, where no object of interest presented itself to divert her mind from the painful memory of the past, but where, on the contrary, everything tended to remind her of her husband. Neither, she asserted, could she longer brook the society of Lady Flora; and therefore, in self-defence, she must make some other arrangement.

The day after this decision, she dispatched a long letter to Lady Devereux. My heart beat quick as I read the superscription. What had I not both to hope and to fear, should she have volunteered a visit to the mother of Herbert! And then I asked myself, would she go alone? would she forget, during how many long months I had been subjected to the very companionship from which she was herself about to escape! Was I still, at the age of sixteen, to be immured in the solitude of Rooksley, far from the delightful world which I was prepared to worship? Surely not—Lady Madelaine could have no such design; and there could be no doubt that I should bear her company. The image of my young lover presided over all these speculations. Under his mother's roof we could not fail to meet; and I felt satisfied that Lady Devereux, when she saw me improved in beauty, and admired, as I never doubted that I must be, would gladly welcome such a wife for her son. Of my fortune I never thought, nor did I even suspect that others would do so: I was like the heroines of romance, to be loved for myself alone.

I cradled myself so readily and so softly in these pleasant fancies, that my disappointment was indescribable when my mother at last announced, after a lively correspondence with her favorite friend, that on the morrow she should leave Rooksley for a time, desiring that all the necessary arrangements might be immediately commenced.

"Does your ladyship go alone?" I inquired, imprudently.

"Certainly not, Miss Tilden. I am not in the habit of traveling without proper attendance. Dale, who accompanied me from town, will also attend me to Lady Devereux's. My appearance in Grosvenor Square, or at Putney, is, of course, at this moment out of the question; and I shall consequently remain at her place in retirement, until the first year of my mourning has expired, unless I feel sufficient courage to venture once to return here. At all events, you will be informed of my movements when it becomes necessary; and meanwhile, Eveleen, I have to beg that you will be assiduous in improving yourself in every way. You do not do yourself justice; and remember that you cannot live all your life at Rooksley, nor is it possible that I should present any child of mine in the world, unless she is prepared to do me credit. You expose yourself too much to the sun and wind, and I have remarked that you frequently take off your gloves, when there is no perceptible necessity for your doing so. These are plebeian habits, and must be conquered. Do not let me have to repeat my caution."

This was the moral lesson with which my mother took leave of me, at an age when the imagination is stronger than the reason, and the unoccupied fancy roves wildly through a future which is only dimly guessed at. I was to cultivate my beauty; to sacrifice everything, even my most innocent pleasure, that of enjoying nature in all her various moods and phases, to the one great end of making a figure in that world from which I was so coldly shut out, at an age when, as I thoroughly believed, I was the best able to appreciate its delights. My old suspicion came back upon me with renewed strength. Lady Madelaine was jealous of my attractions! There was triumph in the conviction, whatever annoyance there might be in the result. Not one word of admonition had she uttered to Adela. It was plain that she considered que le jeu ne valait pas la chandelle. Only, indeed, upon one solitary occasion had she appeared to take the slightest interest in her younger daughter, and it was even then exhibited in a cold and business-like manner, which, courageously as she struggled to conceal the feeling, evidently aroused all the harsher emotions of my sister.

"I suppose you are delighted with Rooksley, Adela; it must have appeared a charming contrast from Glenfillan. How do you amuse yourself?"

"I read and work, madam."

"You are a good musician, of course?"

"By no means."

"A cool answer truly, child! How do you expect to pass through the world without so necessary an accomplishment?"

Adela only replied by raising her head, with one of her peculiar smiles—a smile which might mean much or nothing.

"You draw, at least?"

"Scarcely; but sufficiently to occupy me when I am driven to do so, as a resource against idleness."

"Better and better," exclaimed Lady Madelaine in a tone of irritation; "and do you suppose that it was to produce such a result as this that I permitted you to have a governess? May I venture to inquire what the lady in question did succeed in teaching you?"

"To read, and to think, madam," answered Adela with a cold emphasis.

"The training of a Sunday-school girl!" exclaimed Lady Madelaine contemptuously; "I am glad that at least we now perfectly understand each other."

And thus ended this catechetical dialogue My mother had unhesitatingly received the evidence of Adela as conclusive, and gave herself no trouble to test its truth.

My disappointment and mortification on finding myself once more abandoned to the monotony of Rooksley, when I had argued myself into the belief that Lady Madelaine would profit by her peculiar position to accustom me by degrees to the world, by that vie du château which is in itself a miniature of fashionable life and manners, were so great that I could not endure them in silence. My woman-dignity was wounded; and, still worse, my heart was wrung. All my happy dreams had melted away. I was like Apollo cast out of Olympus. Lady O'Halloran, probably uninformed of my mother's departure, had not made her appearance at Rooksley; I shrank from putting myself into the power of Adela; for, since our last interview in my chamber, I had learnt to fear her. Such, nevertheless, was finally my fate; for I continued silent so long, that my health gave way under the violence of my emotions. On the second day of my non-appearance in the drawing-room, I received a cold and ceremonious request from my sister, through Josephine, that I would allow her to visit me. I had already become so weary of myself and of my own thoughts, that gladly welcomed the proposal; and in five minutes, my sister made her appearance! She assumed no semblance of affection—she affected no tone of sympathy. There was, on the contrary, an irritation and bitterness about her which it was difficult to brook.

"Something has disturbed you, Adela," I said, in order to terminate the long and uncomfortable silence which succeeded our first civil greetings; "is it in my power to remove the annoyance?"

"You are wrong, Eveleen," was the reply; "and have not taken time to reflect, that the sameness of our existence here scarcely admits of any annoyance, to which it would not be a weakness to yield; while I cannot, like yourself, have any external anxiety to trouble me."

"External anxiety!" I repeated in alarm.

"Even so. You have already lived in the world. You were fourteen years of age when you were deprived of the pleasures of your childhood. You were a genius and a beauty, an enfant monstre; attracting all eyes, and trained to profit by your advantages. You can scarcely have escaped bringing some regret with you into retirement."

I looked at her in astonishment. Did she suspect my secret? or, could it be that this little mountain recluse, this shy, unformed girl, already knew more of human nature than myself!

"I was, at least, young enough to have escaped all serious homage, I should suppose," I answered.

"Perhaps," said Adela, doubtingly; "yet at such an age all homage is considered serious."

I became more and more bewildered.

"Do you speak from experience?" I asked sarcastically.

"Draw your own conclusions, after you have reasoned the probabilities," was her quiet reply; "but I did not come here to talk of myself. I judge merely by analogy."

"By analogy?"

"Certainly. If books be no tutors, why should we waste our lives in studying their pages?"

"You are right, Adela," I exclaimed abruptly; "why should I refuse to acknowledge that you are right! I have—I did bring to my retirement a deep—a gnawing regret. It is true, that the little I yet know of life I learnt under this same roof; but Rooksley is no longer what it was. To me the transition was like that of the disembodied soul passing from earth to Hades. Had it been a mere idle, girlish caprice, undiscovered and unreturned, my pride would have enabled me to conquer it at once, for I should have scorned myself; but with me it was—it is—far otherwise."

As I spoke I looked toward my sister for sympathy, and I was astonished to perceive that a burning blush had risen to her forehead. She was silent, and, as it seemed to me, unable to reply. I began to reconsider my words, but I could discover nothing in them to induce this extraordinary demonstration. Adela was a mere child when she first came to Rooksley; Glenfillan was, I well knew, a hermitage as regarded the world; for herself, therefore, it was impossible that she should blush. I knew not what inference to draw. I became restless and uneasy: and still she sat silently beside my bed, buried in thought, with the blood crimsoning her brow.

"You are ungrateful to repine, Eveleen," she said at length abruptly, as though no pause had taken place in our conversation; "for, if you feel, not only that you have loved, but that you have been beloved in your turn, with you happiness is a mere question of time; and Sir James Dornton may well afford to wait for a while, when conscious of success at last."

My share in the dialogue seemed fated to be merely ejaculatory.

"Sir James Dornton!" I echoed vehemently, as by a sudden movement I raised myself from my recumbent position.

"Are you not to be his wife?"

"I would rather die ten thousand deaths!"

"And yet you joined in all the laudatory comments uttered by Lady Madelaine after he left Rooksley."

"I did so with sincerity. He has truly the good qualities for which she gave him credit; but I could never love him."

"Do not assume too much. Habit and perseverance may induce you to feel differently."

"Never!"

"And yet, he is handsome, fashionable, and attractive."

"It may be so—it is," I conceded, overcome by the subtile tactics of a mere girl, and resolved to pour out my whole heart before her; "yet still I persist in my declaration, that I could never love Sir James Dornton."

"But should the indomitable will of our mother so order it?"

"It would only lead to a vain struggle on her part. I would concede nothing."

"Eveleen, you deceive yourself," said my sister eagerly; "you do not possess the strength of character for which you would fain give yourself credit; you have not the moral courage to stand alone in such an unequal contest."

"I shall not stand alone," I answered proudly.

"Then, indeed, have I hopes of you," said Adela, with increased energy; "for all is easy where you are convinced of being beloved."

Every trial that does not touch the one you love, is light, and may be borne bravely; external griefs cease to terrify and subdue, and graze but little the surface of a heart which is filled by one image, while they have no power to pierce it."

"How know you this?" I inquired in my surprise.

"I feel that it must be so. Such a fact requires no teaching. Trust me, Eveleen, I am conscious from my privation that it must be so."

"Adela, I shall never understand you."

"I believe it."

"Never did I expect such sentiments from your lips. You, a mere girl, secluded from your earliest years—without knowledge of the world—without experience—"

"What do you understand by experience? by knowledge of the world? They may be good safeguards, as I construe the words, against deception, dissimulation, and wrong; but the heart alone is needed in the subject which we are now discussing; and, consequently, the heart which has been self-formed in solitude will be more capable of a deep and lasting affection than that which has been fashioned by the qualities to which you attach so high a value. We shall, perhaps, in after-life, ourselves afford an illustration of what I advance."

"And how?"

"Simply by the disparity of our tastes and habits. You will love your husband, I doubt not; but you will also love many other things; pleasure, and dissipation, and the admiration of the world; from all of which I should shrink with loathing, because they would tend to divert my thoughts from the one great object of my devotion."

"It is easy to see, my poor Adela," I said with a smile of pity, "that your love is, so far, all theory. You would soon descend from your pedestal, had you once tasted the delights of all that you now affect to despise; or you would become the most miserable woman upon earth. With your whole soul wrapt up in one object (prettily as the phrase sounds), his absence would infallibly destroy you. Had you suffered what I have already done, you would ere now have ceased to exist."

"Not if I were assured that I was really loved—and this has brought us back to the commencement of our argument—I should then have strength to meet any trial."

"Even the opposition of our mother?"

"Yes; for I could wait until it was overcome."

"All your life perhaps?"

"Scarcely, for I should know that there must come a period when the law would liberate me from the thrall of Lady Madelaine; for the present, I would say, until the proper time arrives, my best text is—patience."

"Very prudent and proper," said I disdainfully; "but who shall protect you in the meanwhile from some other marriage of Lady Madelaine's own devising? While you are exercising your minority in this new kind of philosophy, she may compel you to become the wife of a man whose very name you may consider odious.'

"Compel me, did you say? You do indeed not understand me. I am younger than yourself, Eveleen, in years; but my mind and heart were educated amid the grand and wild scenes of nature, amid an almost unbroken solitude, and under unkindness and neglect; not in a drawing-room, where every toy distracts the thoughts and disturbs the fancy. Mine was a stern tutorage, but it did its work. You have been the pupil of the world, which has done its work also. You have been warned to hide yourself from both sun and wind—I have stood beneath a shelf of rock, and braved the thunder-storm. And do you think that when the whole happiness of my life may be poised upon one point, that I shall hesitate to secure it? Believe me, that there can be little moral energy, little delicacy, and still less good sense, in throwing yourself away, at the will of another—nor is it honest to utter vows which are sure to be broken by so weak and unstable a nature; and to pledge yourself to form the happiness of a husband, when you are not even able to assure your own."

I was at once bewildered and silent. Could this indeed be Adela? I felt as if under the influence of magic. I remembered her usual cold, abstracted indifference—I recalled her bitter energy during our last tête-à-tête—and I could not reconcile the discrepancies of her character. I was, however, painfully conscious of her mental superiority. I felt the insufficiency of my eldership; I was mastered by a stronger spirit than my own. I could have wept with mortification. I had talked bravely: but it was because the sound of my own words lent me courage for the moment: for I well knew that cowardice was still at the bottom of my heart; I had never reduced my feelings to reason; I could not, as she did, make a principle of my conduct, and experience a sense of self-respect to sustain my actions; when once my pride failed, my strength was exhausted.

I was of a weak and yielding disposition, and constantly required support, and my sister had now assumed an attitude which led me to seek it at her hands. That she felt no affection for me, she had been too frank to conceal; but I tremblingly confessed to myself that if I could secure her friendship, I should save myself, in all probability, from a dangerous enemy. Adela already possessed a glimpse of my secret, and I easily convinced myself that its safety could be hereafter secured only by an unlimited confidence. Full of this feeling, I therefore gave free course to my communication. I told her of Devereux's first appearance at Rooksley; of the irritation of Lady Madelaine, who, after having for a time made a jest of our growing inclination, ultimately saw fit to resent it with a vehemence which led her to forbid the entrance of the house to the son of her own friend; and then, but with considerably less fluency, I admitted the fact of our late correspondence; and avowed my firm faith in Devereux's attachment and perseverance.

CHAPTER XXVI.

I DERIVED no assistance from my auditor throughout the narrative, either in word or look. She listened attentively, absorbedly, but she uttered no comment, she made no gesture of surprise or interest: it was only when, with a flushed brow and quickened breath, I had reached the termination of my story, that she spoke; and not even then until, after the pause of a moment, she had convinced herself that I had indeed no more to tell.

"Poor Eveleen!" she exclaimed at last; "you have truly profited by an education based on flattery, and perfected by novel-writers, to have thus succeeded in weaving out a romance for yourself amid the seclusion of Rooksley. I cannot sufficiently admire your skill! It was a wonderful achievement to contemplate at fourteen. But are you sure that Herbert Devereux was, and is, the hero of this history?"

"What can you mean to imply, Adela?"

"Nothing; my words convey no implication. I asked a plain and simple question; and I moreover request of you to answer it frankly and truthfully."

"I have told you nothing but the truth."

"I am bound to believe your assertion; and the rather that such a confidence as you have just made unasked would be a useless and idle weakness on your part, if you still sought to deceive me. Do you now ask my advice or my assistance?"

"I am ready to listen to your advice; and may, perhaps, ere long be under the necessity of requesting your assistance; but what I now desire is simply your opinion."

"Upon what point?"

"Upon every one connected with the entanglement."

"Entanglement! You do not then, yourself, consider the affair as serious?"

"You are mistaken. I am, on my side, perfectly serious; nor have I any reason to believe that Mr. Devereux is less so."

"We had better then, under those circumstances, call it an engagement."

"Call it what you please."

"Then my opinion is that, so far as it has gone, it is remarkably romantic."

"But what think you," I asked with some irritation, "of the inconsistency of our mother, who, after having jestingly encouraged our mutual liking, should suddenly find in it a cause of wrath and resentment?"

"I confess that an accusation of inconsistency, when brought against Lady Madelaine, somewhat startles me. I had not hitherto believed that feminine failing to be one of her peculiarities. I never made the experience myself, for, in my own case, her conduct has ever been uniform in all respects; nor do I think that, in this occurrence, she can rightly be accused of it. The miniature flirtation of two comparative children amused her and diverted her friends. Dancing dogs and quack doctors are never, as you are well aware, admitted beyond the lodges of Rooksley; and people of taste and fashion must be provided with entertainment of some description. But when it became apparent that the boy and girl considered themselves and each other as man and woman—then, indeed, the affair assumed a very different aspect. Did you expect that Lady Madelaine Tilden had any ambition to be a grandmother before she was five and thirty?"

I was stung to the very quick. This was not the tone in which I had expected my sister to reply to the confidence I had reposed in her. I shrank before the ridicule which lurked in her tone and words.

"I care not to speculate upon our mother's feelings," I said pettishly: "I wished to know your opinion of my own position."

"I do not think that you need to disturb yourself on that head," was the rejoinder; "after Mr. Devereux saw and admired you, he probably transferred his gaze and his admiration to the scarlet coat which succeeded you. Nothing could be more natural at his age."

"How then," I asked with offended dignity, "do you account for his appearance here, and the correspondence which ensued?"

"A love of the new and the mysterious, perhaps; or restlessness, and weariness of town, for the season was just about to close."

"You think then that I am to be made a dupe?"

"You must yourself decide that point. Your fate is in your own hands in this case, at least."

"But you believe that he never really loved me?"

"I am merely inclined to imagine that, at such an age, and under such circumstances, a mutual inclination like yours would scarcely admit a name."

"I am nevertheless convinced of his affection."

"In that conviction you cannot do better than encourage a renewal of his intentions. You must be sure of success now, when time can only have increased your talent in winning hearts."

The bitterness of this epigram made me furious; but I was too proud to discover to my sister the extent of her triumph; and I remained perfectly silent, until she rose from her chair, when, as she prepared to leave the room, she said calmly: "End as it may, your secret is safe with me, Eveleen; and as I before said, do not let it distress you. It is a marriage that Lady Madelaine will never allow. She has other and more ambitious views for you. If I can be of service in the mean time, while this love still struggles and exists, make use of me; you may depend upon my sincerity." And before I could utter a word in reply, she was gone.

How heartily did I then regret that I had placed myself so thoroughly in her power! Not one expression of sympathy, not one sentence of affection, had escaped her. I had forfeited my independence. I had wilfully woven the thrall about me: nor was Adela a likely person to allow me to overlook the fact. From the day on which this conversation took place, our relative position was altogether changed. I ceased to contend. I adopted her ideas, coincided in her opinions, and deferred to her tastes. She, on her side, tacitly accepted my concessions, and no longer avoided my society; talking to me continually, whenever we were tête-à-tête, of Devereux; and cleverly increasing, by apparently unconscious comments, the extent of the regard which she constantly affected to discourage. As I have, I believe, said more than once already, she was incomprehensible. Nevertheless, there was, from this very line of conduct, a fascination in her companionship which I was unable to resist. She never spoke of herself. She had displayed no answering trust in me. She seemed anxious to forget her own identity. And thus, we talked incessantly upon the one engrossing subject of Devereux's attachment.

"Where is he now?" she asked one morning, as we were strolling in the grounds. "In order to secure a prize for which all the world are destined to contend, he should be no laggard. He must be well aware that Lady Madelaine is not at Rooksley; he must have seen her at his mother's. How is it then that he does not profit by so favorable an opportunity of renewing his suit?"

As she spoke we were approaching one of the lodges, which was just then under repair; but, as the early dinner-bell had rung, the workmen were all absent; and we consequently continued our walk without hesitation. The building was known as the wood-lodge, from the circumstance of its standing on the edge of an extensive plantation of ornamental timber, and was, in itself, an extremely pretty object. Adela had been silent more than a minute, but I attempted no reply, for just at the instant my eye caught the figure of a tall man crouching among the underwood.—He wore a blue gabardine, a glazed hat with a wide border pulled low upon his forehead, and carried in his hand a formidable bludgeon; but what rendered his appearance more singular, and less alarming than it would otherwise have been, was the fact that at the precise moment in which he caught my attention, he raised a telescope to his eye, and appeared to be taking an earnest view of the windows of the house. As he dropt it, his gaze was riveted upon me, and I saw him start with surprise and make a step towards me; when suddenly becoming aware of the presence of a second person, he stopped as abruptly as he had been about to approach.

A sudden tremor took possession of me. I dared not believe that my suspicion was correct. I could only murmur out: "How like, and yet it cannot be!"

"What cannot be?" asked my sister.

"That man—that peasant—do you see him, Adela? Do my eyes cheat me, or is it really Devereux?"

Taught by these words that my companion knew all our secret, the intruder hesitated no longer.

"Yes; it is indeed Devereux," he answered, springing towards me, while I stood transfixed with terror and astonishment. "It is indeed myself. Have I not earned the right to make this attempt by the weeks and months of wretchedness that I have lately passed? Does it seem so strange to your heart, Eveleen, that it refuses to welcome me?"

"You wrong me, Herbert."

"I must believe so; for I cannot afford to fritter away one brief interval of happiness in doubt. But why these tears? why this violent emotion? Compose yourself, I beseech of you, and listen to me calmly, for a few moments must decide both my fate and your own. In an hour I must be once more on my way to town, where I shall only arrive in time to join my regiment before it marches to Dublin. I do not ask you to write to me; I dare not. The hazard of discovery would be too great, and I am not selfish enough to involve you in unnecessary risk for my own gratification. Nor will I write myself. A letter intercepted by Lady Madelaine must inevitably expose you to her resentment; but I swear, by all that I most revere on earth, never to become the husband of any other woman than yourself. You have already given me the same pledge, but it was only in writing, Eveleen—I saw it, but I did not hear it; and it is to do this, to hear the same vow uttered by your lips, that I am now here. The sounds will dwell in my ear forever, and be the solace of my absence. Surely you will not refuse me this? Surely you will not shrink at such a moment from the ratification of your own generous and voluntary pledge?" And he looked earnestly and tenderly into my face, as he raised my hand with ardor to his lips.

I was silent.

"Have you not the courage to repeat your promise?" he asked somewhat impatiently. "Was the vow traced by your pen not intended to be irrevocable? Have you hitherto been merely sporting with a passion which you professed to share? Eveleen, I will not believe you so unworthy!"

"I am helpless," I at length murmured out as I evaded his fixed and searching gaze.

"Helpless!" echoed Devereux, indignantly "show me the being, either of your sex or c mine, who is not helpless, if unwilling to exe that moral courage which makes its own strength and creates its own freedom! Do no be self-deceived, Eveleen; do not, willully o weakly close your eyes before you give me a final answer, to the trials to which, as my affianced wife, you will undoubtedly be exposed ere long. Do not conceal from yourself the difficulties with which you will have to contend in order to secure the inviolability of your plighted word. I am too unselfish to inflict upon you the necessity of either falsehood on the one hand, or repentance on the other. If there must be a victim, I am prepared to become the sacrifice—my own misery will be enough, without the addition of yours."

I only wept.

"When my departure from town has taken place," pursued Herbert, "and your mother's year of mourning has expired, she will, beyond doubt, desire your society, and you will be launched into the ocean of a London life, where nothing will be left undone to seduce your fancy, and to intimidate your will. Lady Madelaine will, probably, employ both menace and authority; she may even condemn you once more, for a time, to the seclusion of Rooksley—she may endeavor to pervert your truth by flattering your vanity or your ambition. You see how fully, how earnestly I have calculated all these contingencies—not coldly, Eveleen; of that you cannot suspect me, but with a burning brow and a throbbing pulse.—All this may—must, I fear, be the consequence of your truth to me—but surely, my own love, I can at least offer you the recompense of your noble sacrifice! No care, no tenderness, no devotion shall be spared when you are indeed my wife, my love shall make you forget even the price a which it was purchased. My gratitude shall be undying, like my affection. Your happiness shall be the one great effort and ambition of my whole life. Speak—I have been frank and honest, though it has cost me a bitter pang. I have done my duty; and now my fate is in your hands. You know that you have been the first and only vision of my soul. Speak—and make me at once the happiest or the most wretched of my sex!"

Again his eyes were fastened eagerly upon me. I felt his arm about my waist: I was faint and giddy. My cowardice was upon me. I had no longer a will nor a wish. I riveted my gaze upon the earth. I gasped out I knew not what of the pain which his want of confidence had given me. He eagerly pressed me to be frank; to be just alike to him and to myself; and I felt inclined to promise all he asked, but my fear was greater than my passion.

"Speak for me, Miss Tilden!" he exclaimed, turning vehemently towards my sister; "if I have, indeed, so soon and so utterly lost all my influence over Eveleen, perhaps you, her friend, her confidante, may still possess it. This strange, cold indecision maddens me. I cannot endure it much longer. Let me, at least, hear through your medium what is to be the recompense of my deep and uncompromising affection."

Adela, who had hitherto been standing a few paces apart, on hearing this appeal, moved to my side, and was about to speak, when the shrill voice of Lady Flora, evidently approaching the lodge, was distinctly audible. I rushed from the clasp of Devereux. "Fly!" I cried impetuously; "I am lost if she discovers you—"

"What have you to fear, Eveleen?" he asked sadly, and almost reproachfully; "none here know me save yourself."

"Nevertheless I beseech you to be gone. My agitation will betray me.—Farewell. Do not doubt my affection. The grave would be more welcome to me than another engagement. Calculate fearlessly upon my constancy—upon my truth. I will be only yours—but fly—leave me—leave me, or I shall die upon the spot."

"Alas, Eveleen; this weakness gives but poor earnest of the future!"

"Devereux, I implore you to be gone, or you will be my ruin."

"Farewell, then, since such is indeed your will. All uncertainty is now over for me. I am to be the sacrifice of a childish terror. Heaven bless you, Eveleen! You are yet young. You will soon love again. May he who wins you cherish you as fondly as he whom you discard!"

He was about to turn away, when Adela held him back.

"It is too late," she said calmly; "you have been seen, and your retreat at this moment would be even more suspicious than your presence."

"Alas! alas!" I gasped out, as I wrung my hands in agony. "What is to be done? We are both lost."

My sister smiled. "You need not feign indisposition, Eveleen; you are safe, for you have no part to play. You, sir, will perhaps have the kindness to assist me in supporting her. The drama will suffice for the audience."

Devereux had scarcely extended his arms to sustain my trembling frame, and began to murmur his reproachful tenderness into my ear, when Adela called loudly upon Lady Flora to hasten her approach with Bottlemore, who was following close behind her. They had no sooner joined the group than my sister turned with a civil courtesy to Devereux, and, thanking him for his timely aid, dismissed him. I gave one last look in the direction which he had taken, and saw him disappear behind the scaffolding of the lodge.

Once assured that he was indeed gone, ceased to struggle with the weakness which had overcome me. I closed my eyes and fainted.

CHAPTER XXVII.

When I recovered from my swoon, I found myself stretched upon my bed, and Joséphine busily employed in laving my temples with Hungary water. I looked anxiously for my sister, but she was not beside me.

"Mademoiselle Adèle s'est retirée depuis un moment," said my attendant, without subjecting me to the exertion of an inquiry. I was relieved by her consideration, and once more closing my eyes, I fell into one of those dreamy reveries which partake both of waking thought and sleeping uncertainty; where the soul and the fancy appear to have disenthralled themselves in some degree from the weight of reality and life; and yet not to have altogether freed their wings from the clogging soil of mortality. The scene of the wood lodge passed circumstantially before me. I verily believe that I heard in my heart the echo of every sentence that had been spoken, as accurately as it was originally uttered; yet, nevertheless, I doubted whether I dreamt, or merely obeyed the prompting of a tenacious memory. I had, moreover, no sensation of regret or of satisfaction: no emotion whatever was excited within me. A soothing and placid calm cradled me, as the mother's arm cradles her slumbering babe. It was a strange—almost a supernatural species of enjoyment, an atmosphere of etherealism, on which I appeared to float without any volition of my own. It was a state sweeter than sleep, because I was conscious of existence; more delicious than waking, because no painful feeling troubled my visions. It was a twilight of the spirit, which, like that of nature, softened and toned down every salient and rugged object, and invested all about me in the sweet and vapory shadows which lend a mysterious charm to all upon which they rest.

But this intermedial state of being (if such an expression may be permitted to me) could not endure forever, arising as it undoubtedly did from the shock which had been given to my nerves, and the long and heavy faint from which I was only slowly awakening. I became gradually conscious of violent suffering in my head. The pulses in my temples beat strong and hard, and the pulsations of my heart were quick and painful. The vapors were passing from my brain, and, as they rolled away, the sensation of mental as well as bodily uneasiness came back upon me. Again the meeting of the morning rose full upon my memory, but now it brough bitterness, regret, and self-reproach along w .h it. I felt humbled in my own eyes.

I was aware that I had acted weakly and unworthily. How had I met Devereux?—how had I parted from him? Like a peevish child, incapable of acting from either motive or principle. What must he think of me? I, who had unhesitatingly poured out on paper all the romantic feelings of devotion and constancy which his anxious attachment had exacted—who had pledged myself to make all things yield to my love for him—who, in the security of my chamber, had defied fate and authority for ' s sake with passionate vehemence; and fr m whom he had thus acquired the right to e. ect at least exertion and consistency? I s eddered as my reason taught me that it could e only with contempt! Once before had we een separated under circumstances which had crushed my pride into the dust, but that had been through the agency of another; and even had I shown weakness then, my age would have excused it. It was too plain; I had no strength of character. Adela had read me rightly. With all my haughty and despotic self-will in small things—with all my self-value and presumption, I was utterly powerless at every important crisis. Rushing recklessly upon difficulties, I wanted energy to combat the phantoms which, through my own imprudence, I had evoked.

I felt crushed and miserable under the burthen of my own reflections. I wanted help even to think; and I passed a wretched night, throughout which I never closed my eyes, even for an instant. I no longer understood my own position. Had Devereux considered our separation as a final one, or did he still look upon me as his affianced wife? This was a question which I was utterly unable to answer; nor could I comprehend how it might be solved, for I remembered that he had told me not to expect to hear from him, and warned me to desist from attempting a correspondence by which we should probably both be compromised. Thus every avenue of communication between us was closed, and that at a moment when my peace of mind depended upon an exact understanding of our relative position toward each other. And upon what could I cast the blame of this undignified dilemma? Solely and utterly upon my own weakness and want of self-government. In short, view the matter as I might, the whole evil had originated in myself.

I soon convinced my fears that Devereux's affection was irrecoverably lost to me, while his claim upon my honor remained in full force; and I need scarcely confess, that I believed my love for him at that moment to be more powerful than ever. I pined for daylight. I had now no hope, save in Adela. Yes—my spirit was humbled even to this! Once my thoughts turned towards Lady O'Halloran; but I felt relieved when I remembered that she had been absent in town for several weeks; for how could I have rallied my courage sufficiently to tell her such a tale? No—Adela was my only resource; and to her I should be spared the mortification of detailing the cause of my embarrassment.

I anticipated from my sister an early visit in my chamber on the morrow; but when that morrow came, it brought only a civil inquiry through her maid, to which I replied as briefly as it had been made. Nevertheless, I continued anxiously awaiting her appearance for several hours in vain: when, satisfied that she purposely avoided me, I became more restless and apprehensive than before, and could endure this additional suspense no longer.

Summoning Joséphine, I made a hasty toilet; and, near its close, had the satisfaction of seeing Adela in the grounds, making her way towards the wood which belted one side of the home-park. I threw on my bonnet and shawl in an instant, and started in pursuit. She had evidently not remarked my approach; and when I reached her, she was sitting upon the mossy turf at the foot of a beech-tree, not occupied with a book, as was her usual habit, but with her face buried in her hands, and lost in a train of deep thought. She started as I paused, panting and breathless beside her; and as she raised her head, I remarked that two large tears were resting on her cheeks.

"I have been anxiously expecting you all the morning in my room, Adela," I said, as I cast myself down beside her; "but at last I began to fear that you were purposely avoiding me?"

"Your fears were correct," she replied coldly.

"And wherefore?" I asked earnestly; "surely you have a thousand things to say to me?"

"You are wrong—I have nothing to say."

"Have you, then, already forgotten the scene of yesterday?"

"By no means. You unexpectedly had an interview with your noble-hearted lover, whose attachment is worthy of any sacrifice, however great. You declined to make any—even the most trifling. He left you with a bruised spirit and a wounded heart. Surely there could be no occasion for me to repeat to you circumstances of which you are so well aware as these."

"At least," I said sadly, "you might pity me for having given him this pain."

"What obliged you to do so?"

"Reason and prudence."

"Rather confess that your love for him is not sufficiently great to induce you to run a paltry risk in order to secure it. Your lips would never have hesitated to utter the vow which he claimed from you, had it been written in your heart."

"Do you, then, blame me for having refused to ratify our engagement?"

"Blame you!" echoed my sister, turning her eyes, which were flashing with disdain, full upon me; "quite the contrary. I applaud you for having been just to yourself. A feeble nature should at once, as yours did, yield to events without a struggle, and not venture to encounter trials to which it is unequal."

"Adela," I said bitterly, piqued by her uncompromising frankness, "we should all wait until we are tried, and prove our own strength before we scoff at the weakness of others. Opportunities to do so, I should imagine, are never wanting long to any one, and even the firmest will may be damped. Wait until our mother interferes with your own views, and presses upon you a marriage for which you have no inclination."

"If I love elsewhere—above all, if I am so happy as to be beloved," she answered calmly, "all her interference and all her efforts will be vain. I have already told you this."

"I fancied so myself; but I have discovered my error. As regards your own declaration, I put no faith in it at the time; nor do I now."

"You are wrong. You should not judge of my character by your own. The difference of our education has necessarily influenced our modes of thinking and feeling. Brought up in the arms of those to whom you owe your being, the first sentiments of your heart must have been those of tenderness and submission; you instinctively learned to love and to respect an authority to which you were indebted both for security and comfort. Things have changed. The yoke has become more heavy and more irksome; but the fetters of habit are upon you, and you do not retain even the will to shake them off. My case is wholly dissimilar. The outcast child of an unloving mother, I no sooner became capable of appreciating my position, than I wept over myself. Tears were the luxury of my early girlhood; of those hours when I was dismissed to my sports. I grew up on tears; until I ventured to ask myself by what right and upon what pretext I was thus flung off! You may believe that I could discover no plea which sufficed to satisfy my reason; and I then made it the one great moral business of my life to weigh every detail connected with my misfortune. Under this mental discipline, both my heart and my character have been educated. I trust to be able some day to prove that I have been just alike to my mother and to myself. I have now clearly defined the bounds within which to admit her authority as legitimate; and beyond those I will not yield even a hair's breadth. Judge, then, what prospect there is of her being able to influence me in the most important decision of my life."

"And can you really have come to such a resolution before you are quite sixteen years of age?"

Adela shrugged her shoulders with a contemptuous smile, but made no reply.

"I cannot boast of the same moral independence," I pursued, after a moment's silence; "and I seriously require your advice."

"My advice! A quoi bon?"

"That it may guide and strengthen me."

My sister laughed. There was a mockery in her laughter at times that made my blood leap in my veins; it did so now. "You are merry," I remarked with asperity; "I asked counsel, not contempt."

"I have no advice to offer. Counsel to you would be merely a verbal improvidence."

"Why so?"

"Because you would be, in all probability, afraid to follow it."

"Then, were it your case, you would risk everything to keep your faith?"

"Never mind me. I am in no way connected with the business. But are you so sure that the climax of the adventure is still dependent upon yourself?"

"Surely you do not imagine that Devereux will consider our parting of yesterday as a final one?"

"I imagine nothing. It is certain that he had previously exhibited a rare degree of patience."

"I should be wretched!" I exclaimed, as my tears fell hot and fast—"I should be miserable, were he now to abandon me. I have never loved him so perfectly as within the last few hours."

"That is unfortunate," said Adela, perfectly unmoved by this sudden burst of feeling; "very unfortunate; but quite in rule. You were certainly destined from your cradle, Eveleen, to be a heroine; and no heroine can expect to pass through life without many sharp trials."

"And is this all the consolation which you are able to give me?"

"I consider that there can be none greater. You are already on the stage, and will ere long have the world as your spectator; for you may remember that Mr. Devereux asserted the probability of your soon being withdrawn from Rooksley."

"What will the world be to me?" I asked, as I wiped away another burst of tears. "He will be absent whom alone I shall care to please."

Adela sprang to her feet, and drew her shawl closer about her: "I will continue my walk," she said with a suppressed gesture of weariness; "for you will, I doubt not, find your own thoughts more agreeable society than myself."

I did not seek to detain or to accompany her. I was more irresolute, more depressed than ever; the last straw at which I grasped had floated beyond my reach, and I had no longer any hope of help save in my own firmness. My own firmness! The conviction was an epigram, and a bitter one, upon myself; and the tears that I shed for the next half hour, and which I believed were given to Devereux, were in a great degree wrung from me by mortification and disappointment.

I was aroused from my fit of weeping by the sound of the warning bell from the upper lodge, which betokened the arrival of visitors; but I remained passively beneath my beech-tree. I knew of none that were likely to interest me; and I therefore left, as I generally did, their identity to chance. The year of weeds had expired. My seventeenth birthday was over. My mother had not written to congratulate me; nor, perhaps, all circumstances considered, could she be fairly expected to do so. Of her arrival at Rooksley, I, however, could not dream for a moment, as her last letter from Lady Devereux's, not yet of quite six weeks' date, had mentioned no such intention; and I was in no mood at that moment to be troubled by the appearance of any other person upon earth. Gradually I fell back into the same uneasy train of thought which had before absorbed me, and forgot the interruption altogether. At times a glow of resolution gave me momentary strength, and I resolved to neglect the warning of Devereux, and to write to Dublin, to entreat him to forgive the weakness which must so deeply have wounded his affection; and as I sat there, full of this courageous project, I framed a letter full of pathos and devotion, of which the effect could not have failed to prove all I wished; but then rose before me the memory of my mother, and I shrank affrighted from the audacity of my dream; and if, during my paroxysm of valor, the blood had burned upon my brow, so, on the reaction of thought, I shivered with the chill of one who had suddenly been immersed in water.

The recall-bell, which summoned stragglers in the grounds to the house, at length rang; and very reluctantly I rose to receive the importunate guest, whomsoever it might prove. I saw nothing of Adela in my way, and at once proceeded to the drawing-room. A footman, who was stationed at the door, threw it back ere I could utter an inquiry, and announced me; when, to my astonishment, I found myself in the presence of my mother and Sir James Dornton. For an instant, I doubted the evidence of my senses. It seemed but a few weeks since I had parted from Lady Madelaine, veiled in crape, and enveloped in close and heavy drapery; and now she stood before me, still indeed in black, but attired with an elegance and a research which told no tale of mourning. She was in high beauty, and bathed in smiles. After having touched my forehead with her lips, she turned to her companion, and said gaily—"Will you stroll about the park for half an hour, Sir James, after you have shaken hands with Eveleen? I have a thousand things to say to her; but I will promise that they shall all be said so briefly, that your patience and gallantry will not be overtaxed."

The gentleman bowed obediently; took my hand, which he raised gallantly to his lips, and then, seizing his hat, passed out through the conservatory.

"How earnestly you examine me, Eveleen!" laughed Lady Madelaine. "Am I looking unusually handsome, or unusually plain, that I thus rivet your attention?"

"Beautiful! resplendent!" I replied instinctively. "I never before saw you so beautiful."

"Then you would not feel much surprise, were you to hear that I had already been importuned to take another name?"

"By no means," I said gravely, recovering from my first emotion of surprise and admiration, and falling back upon my own bitter feelings. "There are doubtlessly many who would gladly induce you to do so; my astonishment would be only at their success."

"And may I venture to ask wherefore?" demanded Lady Madelaine coldly, as a cloud gathered on her brow; "does the name of Tilden appear to you to be so distinguished that it could not be worthily replaced? In that case, the Lady Madelaine Glenfillan, who never ought to have borne it, would indeed, in your eyes, commit a heinous offence by assuming another which she might herself consider to be better suited to her birth and rank."

I thought of my father; my heart swelled with indignation; I could not utter a syllable.

"Explain yourself, I entreat, Miss Tilden," continued my mother, more and more irritated. "I understand perfectly from your manner that here is an arrière pensée, and I request that you will express it."

"I would rather avoid a subject which appears to anger your ladyship."

"Anger me! You mistake. This is a matter of feeling, not of temper. Let us understand each other."

"Then, madam, since you press me to speak, I confess I had believed that free to act as you please, affluent, and with two daughters of an age to be companions to you—."

"I comprehend you perfectly," interposed Lady Madelaine with impatience. "You have some idea of reading me a lecture. Do not deny yourself the gratification. Proceed, and tell me that at the age of thirty-five I ought to devote myself entirely to my children; and renounce, for their sakes, my tastes, my influence, and all the pleasures in which they cannot share."

"Believe me," I said composedly, "that I never imagined such an event possible; nor did I ever feel selfish enough to wish it. It was contrary to my inclination that I was urged to make any comment upon your actions. I am quite aware that you are at liberty to please yourself in all things, and that my sister and myself have only to respect your will."

"I am of the same opinion," was the dry rejoinder of Lady Madelaine, "and consequently expect that such will be the spirit in which you will receive the tidings of my approaching marriage with Lord Otterford."

"With Lord Otterford!" I echoed in violent emotion, as I sprang from my chair.

"Even so, Miss Tilden," replied my mother while a flush passed over her face, "have you anything to object to such an arrangement?"

I was silent. My heart was wrung. I remembered past scenes—I remembered Emily Vernon, and my father, and the meeting in the octagon room—I was spirit-sick. I am afraid that, at that moment, even ignorant as I was of the extent of her weakness, I despised my mother.

"As I appear to have nothing to expect, either from your duty or your affection at so critical a moment, Miss Tilden," said Lady Madelaine, harshly, as she also rose, "I will detain you no longer than to request that you will inform your sister of my intended marriage. I shall dispense with her presence, as I have no wish to expose myself to a second insult."

I required no further bidding; but, with a silent courtesy, hastened to profit by my dismissal. I had scarcely reached my own room, when I heard the recall-bell summon the baronet from his walk, and a quarter of an hour afterwards the carriage drove off. The whole affair had been, to say the least, singularly conducted. It was evident that my mother had not even seen Lady Flora; she had specifically declined to see Adela; she had traveled a long distance—scarcely remained an hour in the house—and left without taking the slightest refreshment. And again — why should she come accompanied by Sir James Dornton! It is true, that he was an old friend of the family; but had she not her still older and female friend, Lady Devereux, who would have seemed to be a more fitting companion for so long a drive? Or even Lord Otterford himself, so soon to be her husband, and who might necessarily be supposed eager to conciliate her daughters by so simple an act of courtesy? The more I reflected, the more my astonishment increased. The cool and unhesitating manner in which Lady Madelaine had given her companion to understand that his absence was desired on my entrance, and the passive acquiescence which had followed on his side, showed also a famil

'arity which I could by no means explain to myself, particularly under my mother's present circumstances. My own pale and depressed appearance, which, on another occasion, would not have escaped comment, and probably reproof, had not elicited a remark, although it was too visible to remain unperceived. The whole thing was an enigma.

Nevertheless, I soon turned from this subject of marvel to the still greater one of Lady Madelaine's marriage. The arts of the "Circe" had then prevailed! I had not yet learned to remember the spell of wealth. I was now eager to communicate the astounding news to Adela, and I sought her first in her own chamber; but, not finding her there, I descended to the drawing-room, where she was sitting, still folded in her shawl, and so buried in thought that she was not conscious of my presence until I spoke. The tears were yet trickling slowly down my cheeks, while those of my sister were suffused with so bright a bloom that she looked positively handsome.

"Not yet consoled, Eveleen?" she asked, with a smile; "what said our lady-mother to your grief?"

"It is she who is the cause that I weep," I answered, as I flung myself down on the sofa beside her. "Prepare yourself for strange news, Adela. Her term of mourning is over. Our poor father is already forgotten. She is about to become once more a bride."

"Do you consider that so strange?" she asked coldly; "I have been prepared for such an event for months. You might have guessed that this would be the case when our mother left Rooksley, and that we were not her companions."

"To marry again!" I repeated, not having yet conquered my consternation; "with two daughters of an age to be established, who require to be produced in the world, to be suitably introduced, and to be no longer treated as children. I flattered myself that in this instance, at least, she would not have failed."

"You are to be pitied for having encouraged such a delusion," interposed my sister; "as for me, I am no day-dreamer—I find the realities of life suffice. Little care I how Lady Madelaine may dispose of herself—whether she marry again, or remain a widow."

"But do you not dread the idea of a father-in-law?"

"I never took fright at a name. If he be amiable, courteous, and kind-hearted, he may be of service to me; if the contrary, I have little to fear from him."

She sank again into silence, and soon became once more absorbed in thought. I observed her narrowly, but her indifference was evidently genuine. I almost envied her impassibility.

"Have you then no curiosity to learn the actual name of this new bridegroom?" I asked.

"So little, that I should suffer nothing by waiting until it is officially announced."

"Nevertheless," I persisted, "you cannot fail to be surprised when I tell you that it is Lord Otterford."

"Lord Otterford! Indeed. I congratulate you. His marriage with the mother will probably be succeeded by that of his nephew with the daughter. The drama will prove a comedy after all."

"Adela, this is cruel. You know too well how we parted."

"You will meet again."

"How? Where?"

"In any way—everywhere—nothing is impossible to a determined spirit and a devoted heart."

"Alas! I have no hope. I dare not anticipate happiness to myself from this incomprehensible marriage."

"Anything but incomprehensible in my opinion," said my sister with her usual phlegm; "that Lady Madelaine should so soon have consented to resign her liberty may astonish those who do not comprehend her; but there the marvel ceases. It is the rank of her new suitor which has determined her. Nothing can be more natural, or more consistent with her general character; nor do I impute it to her as a crime; an elevated station was her birthright; and it is a prejudice which claims respect, and is by no means without foundation."

"But tell me seriously, I beseech of you," I said after a pause; "do you believe that Devereux will resent my indecision of yesterday?"

"The last time we spoke together upon this subject you appeared confident of your power; why do you now suppose it to be weakened?"

"I cannot tell, but the more desirable our union appears, the less reliance do I feel on my influence over his heart."

"And does it now appear more desirable than when, with all the ardor of an earnest and honest affection, he was, only a few short hours ago, urging you to unite your fate with his?"

"It does, because I have since reflected deeply. I have revolved all the circumstances in my mind, and I cannot perceive one which should be adverse to us. Devereux is well-born—he is the nephew of my mother's intended husband—independent in his means, handsome in his person, high-bred in his manners. Surely that mother can have no ambition beyond such a son-in-law."

"It is nevertheless possible that she may have other views for you. But were you really to marry Mr. Devereux, are you quite assured that you should love him?"

"What a question! He is charming! I should adore him—"

"And if your love were not returned?"

"My love not returned! I have no fear that such could be the case. I am now a thousand times more beautiful than when he saw me first."

"I admit the fact; but if, meanwhile, he should have formed another attachment?"

"I will win him back."

"You may not succeed."

"I have no fear of failure. This, moreover, is a risk which I must run in common with a thousand other women who are envied by half the world. The essentials of happiness would still remain; affluence, a handsome establishment, agreeable society, freedom of action, and a good position; with all these there can be little to apprehend."

"I disagree with you entirely," said Adela, earnestly; "all these things are desirable, it is true; but it would require far more to make me happy. I must love, and be loved, fondly and exclusively; and did the greatest and most powerful noble of the land offer me a coronet upon any other terms, I would reject it, for it would only burn into my brow."

"And you talk of my romance, Adela! Who is rational and reasonable now?"

"Time will show," said my sister; "and, in the meantime, I hear the dressing-bell."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

My mother was married in the eighteenth month of her widowhood. The event was duly announced by letter at Rooksley, and was accompanied by two costly ornaments, as bridal gifts to Adela and myself; but of any regret that we were not present at the ceremony, or of any wish to see us in town, we received not a word. I had so thoroughly persuaded myself that my mother's union with Lord Otterford must necessarily involve my own introduction, and subsequent marriage with his nephew, that my health and spirits both failed beneath the disappointment, and the rather that I had heard nothing of Devereux from the morning on which we parted at the lodge.

From my sister I received no consolation. She affected rather to pity than to blame my weakness, and did not hesitate to affirm that I was destined to be a puppet worked by the wires of others, and certain to destroy my own happiness without either credit or comfort to myself. When I asked her to answer frankly and definitively the question, whether in my position she would take some decisive step, and make Devereux acquainted with my exact sentiments, she always answered me by the assurance that her conduct could be no rule for mine, as we were differently constituted. "I am in the world, but not for it," she was wont to say, with one of those peculiar laughs which always excoriated my nerves; "I care little for the frowns and threats which can only wound my vanity without disturbing my reason. You have been otherwise brought up. Do not try to force nature: you have not strength for such unequal contention. Had you loved Mr. Devereux, as you fancied you did, and as you are still endeavoring to believe that you do, you would have parted in faith and certainty. The question now is, whether he will not henceforth meet you as a stranger."

This was, from the time in which she first uttered the doubt, the text of all my future reveries. I combated the idea, week after week, and month after month, for it wounded my vanity. Idleness has been justly called the mother of passion, and so it proved in my case. Having no other pursuit, I became the heroine of a romance of my own. My reading supplied me with an infinity of models, and I pleased myself with the belief that no innocent beauty of seventeen had ever been injured like myself by an inconstant lover. Could Devereux have seen me daily haunting the borders of the lake, and looking, in vain, into the hollow trunk of the old willow which had formerly served as our bureau de poste, he must at once have been at my feet. But, alas! I wandered, and wept, and nursed myself into a conviction that my only hope of happiness was centered in his affection, totally in vain. Not a sign of remembrance could I meet in any direction. It was too true—Adela was a prophet—he had forgotten me!

From this morbid state of feeling I was aroused by a letter from my mother. Lord Otterford and herself had just returned from Rome, where they had spent six weeks. It sounded classical and correct, and they both piqued themselves upon their savoir vivre; therefore they went to Rome to look at each other, and to have their proceedings duly set forth in the public journals. In this letter I was desired to prepare myself for an early removal to town; but, save a cold remembrance, there was no mention made of Adela. It was evident that we were to be separated. Lady Madelaine was too thoroughly a woman of fashion to risk a third petticoat in her opera-box, or a second daughter in her morning-room. Il ne faut jamais afficher ses malheurs—at least, all together; and, instead of experiencing surprise, I ought to have felt this at once.

I hastened to announce to my sister my approaching departure, but there was no triumph in my tone. I had exhausted myself in regret and uncertainty. I began to dread a meeting with Devereux, whom, at last, I really loved, and to shrink from the idea of his coldness and avoidance.

"So calm, when you have so long looked forward with impatience to this emancipation, Evcleen!" said my sister, whose very lips had become pale as she read the letter; "it is now my turn to say, 'I cannot understand you.'"

"Listen to me, Adela," I replied, gravely: "if such were your design I know not, but it is certain that the comments you have made upon the confidence with which I have entrusted you have changed my very nature. You have applauded my wavering, vacillating, contemptible tampering with the happiness of Devereux, telling me that I was incapable of more stable conduct—but how? In a manner to make me feel, even to my heart's core, that you despised me for the weakness to which my fear of Lady Madelaine caused me to yield. You have assured me that Devereux had received my last adieu as final, and reminded me that, with my beauty, I could soon command another and a safer suitor. Did you, indeed, purpose so to induce me to resign his affection? Oh! no, no! Where you have learned the bitter lesson is your own secret; but you assuredly know the human heart too well to have imagined that such were the opiates by which it might be laid at rest. I do not even ask you why you have so strangely responded to my frankness when I bared my whole spirit before you, and asked for sisterly counsel; suffice it, that you have driven the arrow home. I can never again love a human being as I now love Devereux."

I spoke energetically and rapidly; and, as I paused, I looked towards my sister. Never did I witness a change so sudden and so complete—cheek, brow, and bosom were one blush; her eyes flashed, her bosom heaved—she gasped for breath.

"What means this, Adela?" I asked, completely awe-struck.

"It is rather I who should put the question," she replied, commanding her emotion by a powerful effort; "how can it affect me, that you should love, or not love, Mr. Devereux?"

"We are a mutual enigma," I remarked, greatly offended.

"By no means," was the ready retort; "you have long ceased to be one to me; but I pray you, act as you may, not to transfer the responsibility of your proceedings to my influence. Leave me, at least, at peace in my solitude."

"I have no wish to do so, Adela—you mistake my meaning altogether. Did you know my present feeling, you would pity rather than blame me. The removal from Rooksley to the home of Lord Otterford is but exchanging one prison for another. Here, at least, I am physically free; there I shall be the slave of both caprice and circumstance. Here I might still live on in a fool's paradise, watching from day to day for his reappearance; there I can never hope to see him, for I know the nature of my mother too well to believe that she will ever forget the past. Moreover, how can I be sure that Lady Madelaine has not other views, and that I may not be persecuted to marry some husband of her own selection?"

"In which case you will yield," said Adela, freezingly.

"Never! I give you leave to smile at my precocious fears, for I am convinced that they are too well founded. I shall not long be an inmate of my mother's house. She wants no full-grown daughter constantly beside her, to make an epigram of her bridehood; and I am to be the victim of her vanity. Were you only to be my companion, I should not shrink so much from the trial."

"Dismiss such a feeling at once," said my sister. "I shall be left quietly at Rooksley until Lady Madelaine flatters herself that she has provided for me elsewhere. Nor can she do me a greater pleasure than to forget my existence until I myself remind her of it. You and I require different handling, Eveleen; she may find amusement in startling the leaves of the sensitive plant, but can derive small entertainment in seeking to crush those of the nettle."

A fortnight after this conversation I was in London. The improvement which had taken place in my appearance made my debut a triumph, and even elicited the congratulations of Lady Madelaine. I was no longer the precocious child of whom the Rooksley guests had made a plaything. My person and mind had both become matured, and I took my place at once in my mother's circle, with a composure and an à plomb which removed all awkwardness, and taught those around me to forget that I was a novice in the world and the world's ways. Lord Otterford was evidently delighted at my success, and I fondly flattered myself that he was exulting in the beauty and fashion of his nephew's bride. He was the most gallant of husbands and fathers-in-law. Raised to affluence from comparatively straightened means, by the noble income of his wife, he saw all en beau, and still played the lover so admirably that it was easy to divine the gratification of both heart and vanity enjoyed by Lady Madelaine. Secure of the only man whom she had ever, in all probability, really loved, my mother was radiant with happiness, and, had she still been a widow, must have proved a formidable rival, even to her own daughter. Still in the full glow of her glorious womanhood; attired, not only by the hands of the Graces, but with all the art of fashion; popular, influential, and wealthy, without a cloud upon her brow or an anxiety at her heart, her peculiar style of loveliness was perfected rather than diminished by time. She no longer appeared desirous to turn aside the incense which was offered up at my own shrine, but, on the contrary, seemed to live over again the days of her own triumphs, when under the guardianship of Lady Sinclair; while her train of admirers, instead of becoming diminished through my means, appeared rather to increase. Our opera-box was ever the center of a brilliant throng; our morning-rooms were crowded by all that was most distinguished both in fashionable and diplomatic life; we had not a moment unoccupied. But the great event of the season was my presentation at court. The queen was pleased to welcome me in a most gracious and flattering manner, and to compliment my mother upon my grace and beauty. The most gallant of princes at once christened us Spring and Summer, and declared that were he possessed of the apple of Paris, he should scarcely know where to bestow it. Invitations poured in upon us from the most distinguished persons in the realm; and, in short, to so glorious a pinnacle had royal favor exalted us, that it was ere long decided that Lady Madelaine, in marrying Lord Otterford, had rather consulted the interests of her beautiful daughter than her own inclination, it was so necessary that Miss Tilden should have a privileged protector. It was so considerate and delicate in Lady Madelaine!

Kind and ever charitable world. It is always ready to stretch forth a helping hand to those who desire to receive it empty!

But where, amid the crowd who thronged my path, was Herbert Devereux? Of my mother I dared not make the inquiry; but, although I had not heard a word from him since we parted, I was aware that he was no longer in Ireland, many of his brother-officers being at that moment on our visiting-list. Three months elapsed, and still I looked in vain for his appearance. I wrote incessantly to Adela, to whom I poured out the full tide of my disappointment and perplexity. Need I say that I also imparted to her my inflexible resolution to remain faithful to him to the last? I reminded her that I was at length emancipated, that I had taken a definite position, that my claim to do so was tacitly admitted; and that, consequently, I must and would sustain in this, the most interesting circumstance of my life, at once my own principles, and the plighted word which I had freely given.

The replies which I received to these lengthy epistles were universally brief, ambiguous, and unsatisfactory. They contained neither congratulation nor warning. Adela still affected to believe that I was incapable of a deep and lasting affection; and, passing slightly over the passages which related to Devereux, appeared more interested in ascertaining the names and pretensions of my new suitors. The most assiduous of these was Sir James Dornton; but, as I never looked upon him in any other light than as an old admirer of my mother's, I did not include him in the catalogue; and the rather, as, presuming upon old acquaintanceship, I attached no consequence whatever to the complaisance with which he resigned himself to all my caprices.

Occasionally, when the memory of Devereux rose up vividly before me, I felt indignant at the persevering attentions of the patient baronet; and treated him with a cold and haughty formality which would have acted as a final dismissal to most men, although it produced no effect whatever upon Sir James. He was just as gay, just as witty, and just as maliciously at ease when I affected a repugnance toward him, as when I showed amusement at his sallies. To my mother he had suddenly become absolutely essential. No project of any description was finally decided before it had been discussed with Dornton. Nothing could exceed his intimacy with Lord Otterford, or his favor with Lady Madelaine. One complaint of my discourtesy toward him would have involved me with both; but that word was never uttered. He appeared tacitly to admit my right of acting as I saw fit, and never evidenced the least consciousness of my change of mood or manner. That he was perfectly heartless I soon convinced myself, and the natural result followed. My vanity was flattered by the devotion of a man of taste and fashion, whose admiration added to my consequence; and whose feelings were, as I firmly believed, quite beyond the reach of injury; cheerful and buoyant in disposition, the varied, ingenious, and witty sallies of the baronet first amused me, then attracted me, and finally I began to miss them during his absence, and to recall them for my own gratification. This fact had, nevertheless, no effect upon my heart. Devereux was still its hidden idol. I even wept at times in solitude over the mystery in which he had enshrouded himself. Not once had his name been uttered in my presence, although Lady Devereux was a frequent guest in Grosvenor Square; and never failed to overwhelm me with attentions and professions of regard. At length I could endure this state of suspense no longer; and chancing one morning to find Lord Otterford alone in the library, I resolved to compel him to make some communication on the subject. He was engaged with a pamphlet, and merely nodded a salutation as I entered the room. The opportunity was, however, too favorable to be lost; and, disregarding his look of surprise, I drew forward a reading-chair beside his own, and entered abruptly upon the subject.

"Perhaps, my lord," I said, as composedly as I could, though I felt that the warm blood was rising to my forehead, "you will be good enough to give me some intelligence of your nephew, Mr. Devereux. I apply to you, because his name appears to be under a ban in this house; and that I do not understand the social excommunication of an old friend."

"Mr. Devereux is at Paris. He has been indisposed, but is now almost convalescent."

"So far well," I said steadily; "but is this all?"

"What more do you require to hear, Miss Tilden?"

"Need I explain it to you?"

"I guess your meaning. You would ascertain the present state of his heart. I am not his confidant, and even if I were I should decline including you in the secret. Should he imagine that he still loves you, he is to be pitied; and the sooner you put an end to the delusion, the more generous and prudent you will be."

"Endeavor myself to make him forget me!" I exclaimed indignantly; "that will I never do. Our attachment is reciprocal. We have vowed ourselves to each other. We have no other hope of happiness."

"Charming conclusion!" smiled my auditor; "and upon what premises do you base such an opinion? Is it upon the strength of Devereux's character? upon his estimable qualities? upon his constancy, and the fervor of his affection? Do not deceive yourself, my dear girl; you know nothing about these. I do not intend to deny him the possession of every virtue with which you have generously invested him. I am not Jesuit enough to probe a young man's spirit; but let me ask you if you have discovered in him what is much more perceptible—an uncompromising delicacy, an exacting upright ness, and a susceptibility of temperament very ill calculated to insure the happiness of a handsome and fashionable woman? Are you aware that he never forgets an action or a word by which his feelings have been wounded?—that he never condescends to reproach, or to complain?—and that he perhaps suffers mortally at the very moment when a superficial observer would believe him to be perfectly calm? Have you made this discovery, and then asked yourself how these tenacious qualities would act upon so volatile a nature as your own?"

"No, my lord," I answered angrily; "I have entered into no such speculations; and I cannot but express my astonishment that you should appear so predisposed against an alliance which I should have thought might be considered as both honorable and eligible for your nephew."

"There can be no doubt that it would be both," was the calm reply; "but I was discussing your prospect of happiness, Miss Tilden, not the interests of Mr. Devereux. I avow frankly that a union between yourself and Herbert would have been a great gratification to me personally; and the rather that, although not blind to his faults, I believe him to be possessed of many high and noble qualities; but, having been made aware that it can never take place, I now consider it my duty to discourage it to the extent of my power."

I rose proudly from my seat, saying as I did so: "I thank you, my lord, for your candor; and I now comprehend my position. Lady Madelaine Otterford has a personal interest in separating us, and you are influenced by her objection. Mr. Devereux and myself have therefore no help to hope from either. Be it so. We are now, at least, both old enough to be aware that we are not to be victimized by the tyranny of our relations, and disposed of like merchandize, without the assent of our own free will. Surely we are not to be denied the control of our future fate!"

"You must excuse my terminating the conversation," said Lord Otterford, as he also rose; "I am in a peculiar and difficult position as regards this affair. I have already heard too much. I pray you spare me all further discussions. If I can be of service on any other subject—and surely your thousand and one adorers must occasionally cost you some perplexity—command me without scruple:" and he extended his hand half laughingly.

The taunt awoke me to a desire of vengeance. "One moment more, my lord," I said, as I laid my hand in his; "there is yet another exile, both from sight and remembrance, for whom I would inquire — Miss Vernon — poor Emily—what of her?"

I felt the fingers tremble which were clasped about my own; and as I looked steadily at my companion, I saw his cheek blanch, and his lip quiver; he rallied, however, by a strong effort, and answered with affected indifference;—

"Poor Miss Vernon! You have not forgotten her then? She was a sweet rose, with a canker at the core. She has been long suffering, but her sorrows will soon be over; her brother writes word that she will not live to leave Naples."

"The faculty call it consumption, doubtless," I whispered through my tears.

"They do. Hopeless consumption."

"And what name would you yourself give to her disease, were your opinion sought?" I inquired emphatically.

"From what I observed," was the troubled reply, "I should have no hesitation in adopting the same conclusion."

"How fair she was!" I murmured, as though communing with my own recollections; "how pure, and gentle, and trusting, as she stood in the octagon-room at Rooksley on that calm summer evening, drinking in, without one misgiving, without one suspicious shrinking of distrust, the honeyed words of love and passion! Do you remember that interview, my lord, when you taught her how greatly her own pure, and placid, and modest charms outweighed those of the brilliant and worldly Circe? Alas! poor Emily—may we not believe that the seeds of death, which have since germed so fatally, were sown beneath that summer evening sky?"

"Evelyen, what mean you?" gasped out my auditor, as he grasped my hand forcibly in his own.

"Consult your memory, my lord," was my reply; "and satisfy your vanity, if it be not unappeasable, with one victim; without seeking to reduce me to the same extremity as her of whom I spoke."

"Do you mean to infer that I—?"

"I infer nothing, I speak frankly and fearlessly. What should I fear? Do we not read each other's hearts? What a cheat is human life! A pale brow droops, a bright eye grows dim, a young heart breaks slowly and silently, and then physicians are called in to give the disease a name; the learned men know nothing of the antecedents; the patient does not confide to them all the detail of the past; not a syllable is breathed of the simulated passion which awoke happiness and hope—not a word is murmured of the falsehood which left its venom to fester in the heart,—and so they throng around the bed; and while the mother listens through her tears for one cheering prophecy, and the brother turns away too proud to betray his agony, they mock the victim, whose only cure must be the grave, with scientific subtleties and idle logic. And then come the hearse, and the bed of earth—and the drama is played out, and the curtain falls. Is it not so, my lord?"

Long before I ceased speaking Otterford had sunk again into a chair, and buried his face in his hands. I stood for a moment looking upon him in silence; but he attempted no reply; and after a while, I turned slowly away, and left the room.

CHAPTER XXIX.

A few weeks after this interview London began to thin rapidly. The season was nearly at an end, and the court had removed to Windsor. To Lady Madelaine, Rooksley was, of course, out of the question; and we accordingly removed to Woodville, a hunting-seat on the border of the New Forest, belonging to Lord Otterford; and which he had, since his marriage, caused to be enlarged and beautified. To me the place was positive enchantment; and I should, had I been happy, have required no other source of amusement than that which was afforded by the features of a country so novel and picturesque; my mother, however, professed no taste for country pleasures; and, accordingly, we were speedily followed by a score of her habitués, among the earliest of whom was Sir James Dornton. Assuredly, his social talents were universal. He was as gay, as thoroughly at home, and as constantly occupied at Woodville, as amid the busy crowds of the metropolis. No ennui could successfully contend against his unvarying spirits. Every day he contrived to discover some new object of interest or amusement. He was a perfect wizard. His influence gladdened our whole circle; but in all his exertions I could not fail to remark that it was my peculiar gratification which he the most zealously sought to insure. In my cause he was indefatigable; and, what was still more welcome, never intrusive. Not a word of love—not a gesture of preference escaped him. His tact was admirable. My mother was loud in his praise when he chanced to be absent; and never lost an opportunity of encouraging his attention to myself; appearing even to forget that he had once worshiped at her own shrine.

The idle, pleasure-seeking life which we led in the country favored this species of chivalric devotion, which affects to expect no return save the enjoyment of the passing hour. Lord Otterford had placed himself at the feet of Mrs. Trevyllian, a faded beauty, who was too indolent to be exacting, and too uninteresting to disturb the peace of Lady Madelaine; and she, in her turn, had passively suffered herself to become the momentary idol of the Marquis of Chaffington, a noble fopling, with light curling hair and delicately small hands, good-tempered, popular, and inoffensive. All the young ladies pronounced him charming; but this was a mistake. He was like a handsome piece of wax-work, pleasant enough to look at, though it required the best will in the world, after the first five minutes to enable you to find patience to listen to him. He talked, moreover, inces santly, and was tolerably happy in the choice of his subjects; but he overwhelmed you with a perfect cataclysm of words, weak, watery, and wearisome.

I sought in vain to effect an intimacy with Lady Devereux; she had replaced her lord, who spent the whole of his time in the forest among game-keepers and rangers, by a worthy old general, whose undisguised admiration of her waning attractions made her feel once more young. In short, with the exception of half-a-dozen insipid pretenders to my own hand, who had contrived to get themselves invited for short periods to Woodville, I found only Sir James Dornton sufficiently unoccupied to command leisure to entertain me. When we rode out, he was always beside me; and, as he was familiar with all the by-roads through the forest, he was our guide, and left no object of interest unseen or unexplained. The small difficulties which occasionally presented themselves in these expeditions were always converted into matter of mirth by his untiring pleasantry; in short, he appeared to have totally laid aside the hyperfastidiousness by which he was generally distinguished, in order to make us fully conscious that we could scarcely dispense with his society.

Finding that he evinced no intention of profiting by the numerous opportunities thus afforded to him of persecuting me with his addresses, I became less reserved in my turn, and no longer feigned insensibility to his wit and good humor. The change evidently gratified him; but I was far from imagining to what extent. Unconscious that he was cognizant of my secret, it had never once occurred to me that he was thus exerting all his powers of pleasing in order to supersede Devereux in my affections; and that, what was the mere relenting of my dislike, could be misconstrued by him into a symbol of success. Such was the case, however; and so thoroughly had he contrived to convince himself of the fact, that he at length ventured to approach the subject which I so much dreaded; yet even then, not as I should have anticipated from a man who could expend enthusiasm even upon trifles, and at times display a depth of feeling which was evidently intuitive and spontaneous. Whenever he talked seriously, or what some would call passionately, to me, it was evident that he labored to do so gracefully; that he rounded his periods smoothly; and seemed almost to seek for phrases which might compensate for the chilling, monotonous, and forced manner in which they were uttered. I well remember that, in one of my letters to Adela, I told her the pleasant baronet would never win a woman's heart; for that, although a gay-spirited friend, he made a most drowsy lover, and only helped the cause of the man whom he affected to seek to supersede.

On a glorious evening, near the close of July, I was alone in the stone balcony which extended across the windows of the room in which all our party were assembled. The curtains were drawn, and the sounds of my mother's harp came faintly through their heavy folds. A small stream which had its source in the neighborhood had been diverted from its original channel, and forced through the pleasure-grounds, and, immediately under the windows, it poured its sparkling waters into a miniature lake bordered with flowering shrubs. The moon was rising, and the stars were walking forth to meet her from every quarter of the firmament; and as I leant there in silence, dreaming of Devereux, and indulging in a thousand vague and fantastic wishes, I almost unconsciously watched the dazzling reflection of each separate star, as it seemed to spring upward from the depths of the sleeping water, in order to gem its surface into a mimic semblance of the blue sky above it. The softened music from the room, the distant gush and fall of the myriad notes of the nightingale, the luxurious breathings of the flowers under the languid impulse of the summer wind, the whisperings, mystic and wordless, of the leaves, and the bright hopes which I was building up, all combined to fill my heart with a calm and placid joy to which I had been long a stranger; nor was I conscious that I wept until a large tear fell upon my hand.

"What are you thinking of so deeply?" murmured a voice close to my ear.

I started, and saw Sir James Dornton at my side.

"The question is scarcely discreet," I answered, with affected gaiety. "I have not yet adopted a confessor."

"You need no such functionary. Should you suppose yourself to be imparting anything secret, if you were to tell me frankly that you were thinking of Herbert Devereux?"

"Decidedly. Had such been the case, and were I to admit it, I should consider that I had transformed you from a friend into a confidant."

"Disabuse yourself at once, fair dreamer," was the retort; "the image of Devereux never rises up before you; you never heave a sigh at his remembrance; nay, you never vaguely recall his memory, that I am not conscious of the fact."

"In that case," I said impatiently, "I am very likely to consider your presence insupportable."

"I apprehend no such injustice on your part. You are too generous to punish me for taking a lively interest in all that affects your happiness."

"I am sorry, Sir James," I replied coldly, "that you should employ your feelings so unprofitably. If you are really as conversant with my secret sentiments as you appear to imply, you must be well aware that I desire no such demonstrations."

"Yet how can it be otherwise, Miss Tilden! Are all the world to be at liberty to admire, to adore you, and to tell you so, save myself? Say 'Yes,' if you will, and I must submit to the decree; but, at least, suffer me to retain the control of my feelings. Do not reduce me to a perfect cipher, simply because I have done you more worthy justice. You are at this moment the victim of a hopeless attachment; it overshadows the brightness of your spirit, it subdues the buoyancy of your nature: deny it if you can. And do you suppose that I can look upon your sufferings coldly?—that I can abstain from the desire to tear away the veil from that bright spirit, to restore the buoyan elasticity of that pure young heart? No, no you cannot so strangely have mistaken me."

"Presuming your inference to be correct, I beg you to believe that when I seek to disenthrall myself, I shall be quite equal to the task."

"I rejoice to hear it; for, were it not for the firm hope of that deliverance, I should become desperate."

"Sir James Dornton! Have you considered your words! Do you remember to whom they are addressed?"

"Perfectly."

"Then, sir, you must concede that they are both ill-judged and ill-timed."

"I will do nothing of the sort; ere long you will be less severe.

"The future must depend upon yourself," I said haughtily; and lifting one of the curtains, I passed into the room without awaiting his reply.

From that evening I avoided every occasion of meeting him tête-à-tête. I could not brook that he should force upon me his advice and his reproaches. I was no longer at ease in his presence. Every word that he uttered, and every look that he turned upon me, seemed to contain an epigram. I would fain have complained of the confidential tone which he had thus suddenly assumed; but to whom could I pour forth my indignation! Lady Madelaine, I well know, would not listen to any blame of her favorite, nor could I have confided to her my mortification and annoyance, without betraying my continued interest in Devereux. Neither could I appeal to Lord Otterford; for, since the conversation which I have recorded, we had never exchanged a syllable, save in public. There was, consequently, no method of ridding myself of this system of persecution, save by my own firmness; and I resolved to lose no opportunity of convincing Sir James not only of my indifference, for of that I flattered myself he was already well aware, but of the positive dislike which he was rapidly entailing upon himself by his inquisitorial bearing.

Isolated as I was amid a crowd—disappointed day after day in the hope which I had cherished, that Devereux must, sooner or later, join the circle of his uncle's guests—angry with myself for having been so unwarily made the dupe of a man to whom my secret was known, I shunned him with a feeling which soon grew into positive hate; nor was it lessened by the perfect sang froid and composure with which he bore every exhibition of my petulance. His quiet and self-satisfied smile never failed to drive the blood to my brow, but I dared not venture upon any decided demonstration of my annoyance. The eye of Lady Madelaine was frequently upon me, and there was a warning in it at those moments, before which I quailed even in the first burst of my indignation. What was I to do? What measures could I adopt, to rid myself of the impassible and pertinacious baronet, who evidently considered me as his own property, and to whom my struggles were mere matter of curiosity and pastime! I pleaded sickness, and kept closely to my own apartments; but this proceeding thwarted the projects of my mother, and I was not permitted to persist in my seclusion.

When, after an absence of three days from the party, I was compelled to reappear, I was besieged with compliments and condolements, which were even more bearable than the light and mocking laughter with which I was greeted by Sir James. He declared that I had been engaged in the composition of some new cosmetic, and that I had made trial of it upon myself with most undeniable success, for that he had never seen me look more charming. His callous mockery cut me to the heart; and I replied with bitterness, as I turned away, and addressed, for the first time in my life willingly, the member for the county in which Woodville was situated, and who was a constant guest at Lord Otterford's.

Mr. Curties was tall, straight, and meagre—one long perpendicular line of humanity; who, had it not been for the peculiar carriage of his arms, might, at a distance, have been mistaken for his own walking-stick. He was very dull—very sententious, and very shallow—well-born, and priding himself highly upon the fact. He also assumed to be well-bred, and it was difficult to define why he was not so; be the reason what it might, however, there was a something wanting, trifling, perhaps, in itself, but still felt to be an omission—a social catalectic, evident at once to the initiated.

Now of all the habitués of Woodville, this man had always struck me as being the most uninteresting and impracticable. In conversing, he invariably looked over his companion; for his giraffe-like throat, enveloped in a high, rigidly-starched cravat, was never bent; and there can be no great interest in a dialogue, during which one of the speakers looks only at the crystal drops of the chandelier. A wrinkle, even in one of his gloves, would have been a relief; but Mr. Curties never wore ill-fitting gloves; and every other article of his dress appeared as if he had been inducted into it in his youth, and that they had since grown up together. His very hair was like that of no other man. It was long, and lank, and smooth, and in surface and tint exactly resembled a piece of fawn-colored satin. His eyes were light blue—very light blue, and almost round; and his eyebrows, eyelashes, and whiskers, had just escaped the danger of being described as red.

A sudden inspiration restored my good humor at once. I resolved to make an escape-valve of the honorable member! Nothing could be better. No one would accuse me of coquetry with so unsympathizing and unsentimental a being. It never occurred to me to remember that some people might consider his princely fortune as an equivalent for the absence of all other attractions; nor was I aware that he himself avowedly lived in terror of fortune-hunting mammas and establishment-seeking daughters. In short, I had never cared to ascertain that he was the "great match" of the county.

All this was very unfortunate; but I was happily unconscious of my temerity; and when I turned upon Mr. Curties the light of the most sunny smile which I could summon à l'improviste from amid the dark clouds of my displeasure, I was quietly congratulating myself on the acquisition of a dangler, of whom Devereux, appear when he might, must have too much self-respect to affect jealousy.

How little do women generally suspect the price at which the plainest men estimate their attractions!

If I had, indeed, committed an error, like that of Sir Peter Teazle, it brought its punishment along with it; for never did fair lady in a fit of petulance entail upon herself such a task as that which I had voluntarily undertaken. A flirtation was my object—a decided flirtation; which might reduce Sir James Dornton to his proper level, and teach him a salutary lesson. I was young, beautiful, and accomplished; I was fashionable, and an heiress; of course I could have Mr. Curties at my feet when I chose to beckon him to that enviable station; and equally of course, I could rid myself of him with a word, whenever I became wearied of his homage. I did not know the honorable member for ——. He was no chien barbet, to fetch and carry at the caprice of a young lady. He had no objection to the attentions of a married woman, for they could only commit herself; but the preference of a single one might commit him, and that was a far more serious matter. He was a "great catch," and as such, he estimated himself; and we all know that "great catches" are not to be approached like common men.

Thus I could not have possibly made a worse selection than I had done, of an instrument of vengeance; and that Mr. Curties should lend himself to my views, so composedly and collectedly as he did, must be altogether attributed to his regard for his host and my relative, Lord Otterford.

I was amused by the look of blank astonishment which spread over the features of Lady Madelaine, as she heard me invite Mr. Curties to occupy the vacant seat on the sofa beside me, and then saw me begin to play off upon him all the artillery of the most finished coquetry. She was not yet aware of the extent of my accomplishments, nor of the zeal with which I had studied to imitate her example. My unfortunate victim was evidently bewildered; I had, until that evening, so pertinaciously avoided him. I had taken so little trouble to conceal how much he bored me whenever he ventured an approach, that his pride was piqued as greatly as his vanity was wounded; and in order to avoid all suspicion of annoyance, he had constantly affected to speak of me with marked admiration. He believed that he had nothing to fear, and was consequently at his ease, which was seldom the case with him when in the society of an unmarried and marriageable woman.

It will be readily understood, under these circumstances, how completely unprepared he was for the sudden demonstrations which it was my peculiar and uncalculating pleasure to make on that particular evening. The poor man fairly lost his à plomb, and remained helplessly at my mercy. Conflicting feelings heightened my complexion, and deepened the fire in my eyes. I was exquisitely dressed; for, be my state of mind what it might, I was woman enough never to neglect that all-important fact. I was resolved to exhibit myself to the best advantage, and I well knew the effect of every pose and of every gesture of which I availed myself. I was brilliant, even witty: and to be witty beside Mr. Curties betrayed no common power. There was scarcely a subject upon which I did not touch, under cover of his monosyllabic replies; even that vampire aliment scandal hung upon my lips, and was seasoned with smiles.

Sir James stood near, with a frown upon his brow which more than repaid my efforts. My mother made a false move upon the board, and was checkmated by Lord Chaffington, to his great and somewhat too audible delight. I had evidently distracted her ideas. Mr. Curties, meanwhile, was sorely perplexed. Flattered by my unconcealed preference, and not quite decided in how far he might desire to encourage its demonstration, he did nothing but smile, and bow, and utter "yes" and "no," sparingly relieved at intervals by an ejaculation of "indeed!" He trembled lest he should be prematurely compromised. Still he was dazzled—and as that was precisely what I intended, I perceived it at once. Like all dull men, he loved to be amused when he could do it safely; so he did not make an effort to escape, and satisfied himself by giving no tangible encouragement to my sudden engouement.

The young marquis had rearranged the chessmen to the music of his own self-gratulations, but Lady Madelaine declined to tempt fortune a second time—she was bent upon separating me from my new companion.

"Eveleen," she said, carelessly, "as you are sufficiently recovered to exert yourself, pray, let us have some music. Sir James Dornton will, I dare say, accompany you with his flute."

I rose at once, and, extending my hand to Mr. Curties with a bland smile, requested him to lead me to the harp. "You must not forsake me now," I added, as he drew forward the music-chair: "I want some one to turn over the leaves, and I am convinced that you will do it admirably."

"I fear not," said the honorable member, hesitatingly: "I am no musician, and may embarrass you."

"By no means. I will prompt you with a nod, thus—so you have only to watch, and there can be no mistake. What shall I play?"

"You are too obliging. I would rather leave the selection to your better taste."

Sir James approached with his flute, upon which he was a proficient, and my resolution was taken at once. I selected a capriccio; upon which it was impossible for that instrument to follow, and dashed at once into its rapid and intricate movements. My manœuvre was thoroughly understood, but it did not produce the effect which I had anticipated. The baronet relinquished his instrument, but he took his stand immediately behind my chair, where he could command every word and look that passed between Mr. Curties and myself. Conscious that such was the case, I had no sooner accomplished my task than I rose and retired to a settee in the extreme corner of the room, and to my infinite satisfaction, I was immediately followed by Mr. Curties, who, as if instinctively, once more dropped into the vacant place at my side. In the next instant Sir James Dornton had turned the music-chair, and was seated opposite to us, with his back to the rest of the party.

"You are a happy man, Curties," he commenced as he turned a mocking smile upon me. "Sooner or later all you millionaires are sure to carry off the favor of the young and fair from we poor devils of younger brothers. Even Miss Tilden, you see, 'the observed of all observers,' cannot withstand you; but beware, lest you should have a score of duels upon your hands."

"Now, on my honor, Sir James," stammered out the affrighted Crœsus, looking down his very long nose, and contracting the muscles of his mouth; "you mistake me altogether—I have no pretensions of the kind. This is the first occasion upon which Miss Tilden has done me the honor to converse with me."

The baronet laughed tauntingly.

"Nay, nay, do not let me alarm you," he said; "we all know that you are county property, and consequently not to be trifled with. But again, I say, beware!"

"I can apprehend no danger in Miss Tilden's society," retorted Mr. Curties with a rigid bow; "I only regret that I can profit by it for so short a time, being compelled to leave Woodville to-morrow morning, with but a very slight hope of being enabled to return during the stay of your delightful party."

I felt the blood rush to my brow. Sir James had triumphed. All the narrow-hearted suspicion and mean conceit of the wealthy bore had been aroused by his inane jest, and I had lessened myself in my own eyes most unavailingly. Do as I would, this man appeared destined to become my evil genius. I hated myself for having even evinced the slightest pleasure in his society. Master of my secret, he well knew his power; nor did any feeling of delicacy prevent his betraying a consciousness that he held me in his thrall. To increase my annoyance Mr. Curties shortly afterwards rose, and slowly made his way to the other side of the saloon; and he had no sooner vacated his seat than the baronet took possession of it, with a nonchalance and ease which seemed to imply that the proceeding was a mere matter of course.

"You must have spent a delightful hour, Miss Tilden!" he commenced, as he fell back among the cushions; "the honorable member for the county which we have just now the honor to inhabit is a delicious companion—so intellectual and charming, especially in the society of pretty women. What a formidable rival for poor Devereux! On my soul, I believe I must write and warn him of the perils which environ his Helen. Do you not think that it would be a generous act on my part?"

"I have no opinion to offer on the subject."

"Tant mieux. You are therefore indifferent whether the rumor of your flirtation reach him or no? This, at least, is encouraging for nous autres. I felt convinced that your late seclusion would prove morally beneficial; but what, in the name of all that is perpendicular, ever impelled you to turn the light of your smiles upon that unfortunate man yonder, who looks upon every unmarried woman as a drawing-room pickpocket,—a species of matrimonial chevalière d'industrie?"

"Your witticisms, Sir James Dornton, are too personal to be pleasant."

"Nay, nay—you are too hard upon me. Were you not an hour ago anatomizing your mamma's pretty page, my little Lord Chaffington, rather freely?"

"Am I required, sir, to justify to you either my words or actions?"

My companion fixed upon me a look that was untranslatable. It seemed at once to dare me to defy him, and to express an assent which he could not venture to put into words. But this solution I at once felt must be erroneous; and I turned away my eyes scornfully as he replied with perfect composure—

"Friendship has privileges even more stringent than that from which you shrink."

"Friendship!"

"Even so."

"But that friendship must first exist, and be admitted."

"Do you deny me the gratification of feeling it for yourself?"

"It is out of my power to do so; its reciprocity is all that I can control."

"And that reciprocity?"

"Is at least doubtful."

"Indeed!" ejaculated Sir James, elevating his eyebrows somewhat disdainfully; "I was not aware that the coquetry of Miss Tilden was quite so expansive. Is it permissible, according to your peculiar code, to admit a mere acquaintance to the bridal rein of your horse, to your solitary lounge in the grounds, and to your music-stand in the drawing-room? Come, come; you are angry, you are indignant, that just as you were angling for a new victim—a souffre douleur, who might enable you to escape me and my importunities—I should show the hook to the poor devil, and scare him from the bait. And why do you endeavor to avoid me? Because I speak to you of Devereux? Only say the word, and I will never so offend again."

"If I could trust your promise—"

"On my soul you may! and the rather that I should much prefer that he had never existed."

"Again!"

He affected to laugh as I uttered the warning; but he was evidently ill at ease. He was to leave Woodville the following morning for a few days. These occasional absences had been of such frequent recurrence latterly, that they had excited both remark and speculation; but Sir James had carefully concealed their object, and turned off every inquiry with a jest. On his return, he was invariably moody and thoughtful for a few hours. I knew that he had been questioned upon the subject by Lady Madelaine, who, since his visit to Rooksbey during her widowhood, appeared to have assumed a singular authority over him; and she was apparently satisfied with his explanation for she never afterward made any comment upon the circumstance. As he now sat beside me, he alluded to his departure: and in order to change the conversation, I requested him to bring, on his return, a particular piece of music which I was anxious to possess. He looked embarrassed for an instant, and then expressed his regret that he could not execute my commission, as he was not going near town. At the moment, it did not strike me that there was anything extraordinary in this fact; and I accordingly paid little attention to it. I remembered it afterward.

CHAPTER XXX.

Two days subsequently to this conversation, as I was preparing for a drive, I was summoned to my mother's apartment. She was still dressing; but when I entered she at once dismissed her women, and motioned me to a seat.

"You are in high beauty this morning, Eveleen," she said, with a gracious smile; "and one season in town has sufficed to show you the full value of your attractions, if I may judge by the coquetry which you lavished so unsparingly upon poor Mr. Curties, an evening or two ago. What was the meaning of that sudden engouement, I pray you? Had you really a design upon his heart?"

"I never even contemplated the possibility of his boasting such a possession," I answered, with a shrug.

"But you laid yourself out to engross his society," persisted Lady Madelaine. "Can it be that his great wealth has excited your ambition? Have you, already, learnt the value of money, and resolved to sacrifice passion to prudence?"

"I deserve to be made a jest for having sacrificed even an hour to such an automaton," I answered, impatiently. "One cannot always account for a visitation of caprice."

"Caprice!" echoed Lady Madelaine, incredulously. "However, I am glad that you were merely indulging a whim (although I would counsel you, in future, not to make your eccentricities quite so conspicuous), for I confess, that Mr. Curties is not precisely the style of person whom I should covet as a son-in-law; unless, indeed, I could secure him for Adela, of which there is little probability; for your dull men are seldom an easy prey, especially when they sleep with their heads on a rent-roll. He is by no means the Thule of my wishes, as regards yourself. I have too much affection for you, to contemplate such a sacrifice with satisfaction."

As she ceased speaking, she looked toward me, with a faint smile, as if to demand my acknowledgments. I made a slight bow, and she continued.

"I am aware"—and she said it with some little hesitation—"that circumstances may have led you to doubt the extent and warmth of my feelings toward you. My position has been a trying one; and the world had demands upon me which I could not slight. I became a mother too early; and children spring into women before the plans of their parents are matured. You are now of an age, however, to understand me better, and to do me justice. Nor is this all. You are also old enough to take a position in the world; and to this fact I have, for some time, given my most serious attention. With your beauty and your fortune, you will find no difficulty in securing an establishment. The important phase of the question is the perfect eligibility of that establishment; and, on this point, you are both too young and too inexperienced to be abandoned to your own judgment."

I was about to speak, but an imperious gesture of the hand silenced me.

"Nevertheless," pursued Lady Madelaine, hurriedly, "you will be glad to learn, that I am altogether satisfied with your deportment during the few months that we have spent together in the world (always excepting, of course, your folly with Mr. Curties, which has driven him from Woodville, to the great annoyance of Lord Otterford); and the rather, as you have taken no pains to conceal your real sentiments, which coincide with my own views. I am quite aware that I might, had I so willed it, have told you at once, and abruptly, when I summoned you to town, what those views were; but there would have been a want of delicacy in such a proceeding, from which I revolted. Satisfied that your guardians would never venture to interfere on a subject exclusively with in the province of a mother, I might have compelled you, not only to an indifferent, but even to a repugnant marriage. I disdained to do this; and, far from enacting the tyrant, or the duenna, I left you at perfect liberty to cultivate, or to decline the friendship of those by whom you were habitually surrounded. You must have perceived, if you have, indeed, done me the favor to reflect upon the whole tenor of my conduct, as regards yourself, that I have left you the complete mistress of your predilections; that I have interfered in none of your avocations; and that—ungraceful and unpleasant, as it could not fail to be, to Lord Otterford, to have a womanly daughter-in-law constantly before his eyes, and under his roof—I have given you time and opportunity enough to decide on your own fate."

"It is decided, madam—it has been long decided."

"I am rejoiced to hear it from your own lips, even although circumstances have for some time assured me that it must be so. Had you been about to commit an imprudence, I should long since have interfered; as it is, I have but to congratulate both you and myself. The only possible difficulty has been removed within the last few weeks; and, to my own approbation, I am authorized to unite that of Lord Otterford who takes the most kindly interest in your welfare."

I was bewildered—overjoyed. Still indulging the fond hope of a union with Devereux, it never occurred to me, that my mother might allude to another person. I was so overcome with delight, that, although I would fain have asked a thousand questions, I could not utter a word. I could only press the hand of Lady Madelaine to my lips in speechless gratitude.

"Enough, enough, young lady," she said, jestingly; "or I shall begin to fear that you are most unfashionably in love, and will become a proverb, after marriage, which is by no means desirable. We must have no more scenes, until I am able to congratulate you as Lady Dornton."

I sprang from my chair as though a thunderbolt had exploded at my feet. "Congratulate me as Lady Dornton!" I exclaimed, passionately. "Was it, then, of Sir James Dornton that you spoke, madam? Of a man who is not only indifferent, but even distasteful to me? Sir James Dornton, whom I have been accustomed, from my childhood, to see only as—"

I paused. I dared not, even excited as I was, terminate the sentence; nor was it necessary. A blush rose to the cheek of Lady Madelaine, and a cloud gathered upon her brow.

"Proceed, Miss Tilden," she said, in a cold tone, rendered slightly tremulous by the emotion which she could not altogether control; "let no feeling of delicacy toward your mother check the expression of your disgraceful and unmaidenly conjectures. I am prepared to bear even insult with patience."

"Oh, forgive me! forgive me!" I faltered out; "forgive and pity me, for you know not from what a dream of hope and happiness your last words have awakened me! You spoke of my predilections, of my preference; and I was misled by the yearnings of my own heart."

"Can you deny, that you have, for some time past, given marked encouragement to Sir James Dornton?"

"If I have done so, it has been unwittingly. How could I encourage him, when my affections were devoted to another?"

"Better and better!" exclaimed Lady Madelaine; "I now begin to comprehend the hollowness of your character. I weakly believed that your late exhibition with Mr. Curties was a mere girlish piece of inconsistency, but I now find that you act upon a system of deceit, and sacrifice every better feeling to your vanity. How do you pretend, Miss Tilden, to justify your rides, and walks, and tête-à-têtes by moonlight, upon balconies, with Sir James Dornton? Do you imagine that you will make the world believe you were unconscious that these things were marked and undeniable encouragement to a suit which has long ceased to be problematical to every one around you? Or can you for an instant suppose, that I shall submit to see a daughter of mine made a mark for the world's scorn! Your own conduct has decided your fate. On Sir James's return to Woodville, you will receive him as your accepted husband, without the slightest symptom of repugnance or hesitation—or, you must abide the consequences."

I wrung my hands in agony. Too late did I perceive the fearful advantage which my own thoughtlessness had given to the projects of my mother.

"In truth, you are a sad victim!" once more resumed Lady Madelaine, as she looked down upon me with withering contempt; "you are steeped in tears—and, for what? Because you are about to become the wife of an accomplished, high-born, and fashionable man, and that you will be an object of envy to half the women in town."

"I would rather die!" I exclaimed, vehemently. "I do not, I shall never love him. We should both be wretched."

"He consents to run the risk."

"He cannot be so selfish, or so base—he knows that I love another—he knows that I am beloved. He will have pity on my tears—on my despair."

My mother laughed scornfully.

"Rise, Miss Tilden; rise, and recollect yourself," she said sternly; "we are not now rehearsing a tragedy, nor am I disposed to hear you rhapsodize on the subject of your boy-lover, Mr. Devereux, whom I suppose to be the object of this tirade. Leave the remedy for his baby-passion in the hands of Sir James Dornton; he is a man of sense as well as a man of the world, and will soon make you ashamed of your extravagance. As to Devereux, he has long ceased even to remember your existence.

This taunt aroused my pride at once. I sprang to my feet, and even ventured to meet the threatening eye of Lady Madelaine without quailing. "The proof that he has not done so, I said firmly, "exists in the fact that you have exiled him from your house—his uncle's house—from the hour in which I became its inmate No, madam; I may be your victim—you may profit by the thoughtlessness which has placed my fate in your power, but you cannot deprive me of the certainty that I am beloved by Herbert Devereux."

"A noble triumph!" exclaimed my mother; "but a sorry one for both of you, if such be indeed the case; for I cannot suppose that even you, Miss Tilden, are so utterly a coquet at heart as to derive any gratification from the prospect of his sufferings; while on your own side, the inconveniences might be greater than you can possibly anticipate. Be advised, while there is yet time. Do not attempt to oppose my will, beneath which you must bend at last The wife of Herbert Devereux you shall never be. Receive with becoming submission the husband whom I have selected for you, and conquer your repugnance by remembering that you have long treated him as a favored suitor, and that you are consequently in his power. And now, retire to your room, and endeavor to make yourself presentable before you are seen by any of the guests. Not a word!" For I was again about to speak. "I shall hold no further conversation with you upon this subject, until you can discuss it in a becoming spirit of obedience."

Before she ceased speaking, she rang the bell violently, and I hurried from the room to escape the observation of her women.

I have no words in which to paint my wretchedness when I again found myself alone. All my love for Devereux had been previously weak and languid to what I felt for him at that moment; while my dislike of the baronet became comparatively stronger and more bitter. I hated myself also for the weakness which had induced me to gratify my vanity and idleness by permitting his attentions. In short, I was miserable; and so far from attempting to efface the traces of my agitation, I gave free vent to my tears and sobs, and encouraged the feeling of desolation and bitterness which had taken possession of me.

Suddenly I thought of my sister. She was in possession of my secret; I remembered the strength and resolution of her character. There was yet hope for me. I determined to confide to her my present sufferings, and to be guided by her advice. I had neglected her too much of late. Absorbed in pleasure, there was nothing around me to recall her image, but now that sorrow had fallen upon me, it rose vividly to my remembrance. I sat down eagerly to my desk, wiped away my tears, and commenced forthwith the outpouring of my grief.

I accused my mother of cold-hearted selfishness, and Lord Otterford of unwarrantable interference. I apostrophized Sir James Dornton; I declared my detestation of him in no measured terms; and I upbraided myself for having solely as I had done. My letter was full of passionate ejaculations, of incoherent vows and exclamations. Finally, having exhausted the vocabulary of expletives, I asked for counsel—humbly, earnestly, as I would have implored the assistance of an oracle; and then I closed my long and lamentable epistle, and began to count the hours which must elapse ere I could hope for a reply.

Sir James Dornton was still absent, and this, at least, was a relief. I excused myself on the plea of a violent headache to my mother and her guests, and remained during the rest of the day in my own room; but on the morrow I did not dare to repeat the experiment. I descended therefore to the drawing-room, and underwent the condolements of the party on my relapse with the best grace I could assume; while, as regarded my mother, I was quitte pour la peur, for I discovered not the least change from her ordinary manner. She turned her cheek toward me with the usual indifference, criticised some detail of my dress, and then employed me in replying to half a dozen uninteresting notes which she had received by the last post. No one would have suspected the scene of severity and anguish which had so lately passed between us.

Two days subsequently, on awaking in the morning, I perceived a letter lying on the chair beside my bed. I seized it eagerly. It was, indeed, the reply of my sister. My fate would now be determined. My heart beat violently. Would she advise resistance? and, if so, should I have courage to resist? Would she counsel me to yield? Would she bid me fling away all hope of happiness? For a moment I dreaded to open the letter; but at length, unable longer to control my impatience, I tore it hastily from its envelope, and read as follows:—

"Do not anticipate, I entreat, any advice from me. There are circumstances in which the heart alone should be the counselor, and yours appears to me to be a case in point. If you are not beloved, your fate is frightful. If you are—believe me when I tell you that there exist others far more worthy of pity than yourself."

I was thunderstruck. The letter had neither commencement nor signature. The writing was disjointed, rambling, and altogether unlike the usual neat and carefully-formed characters of my sister's hand. Brief, abrupt, and obscure, the matter of the communication was as unexpected as the manner. I read and reread it half a dozen times, hoping to detect some hidden meaning, or to convince myself that it was a counterfeit, but I could not succeed in doing either; and at last, worn out with disappointment and mortification, I tore it into a thousand fragments

"It is easy for her to make a mock of my misery," I murmured bitterly to myself. "How can she appreciate the wretchedness of marriage with a man whom I cannot love, and of separation from one to whom I am devoted? How deluded have I been to imagine, because she talked bravely when no trial was near, that she would be as courageous or as clear-sighted when that trial came! I have indeed leant upon a reed! 'There are others more worthy of pity than myself!' Perhaps so. There is the leper on his desolate pallet, watching for death in solitude and suffering—there is the galley-slave, chained to the oar, and laboring away his heart beneath the lash of his captors—there is the beggar in his rags, gaunt with famine, with his death-sobs frozen in his throat. I wanted no oracle to tell me this—I asked for comfort, for solace; and her words, scanty as they are, have but increased the evil. 'If I am not beloved,' she says. Even here, where I am to be victimized, she raises a frightful doubt—'If I am not beloved, my fate is frightful'—but of this love, little as I prize it, I am at least assured. Why should Sir James pursue me, despite my repugnance, unless he loved me? And yet—his words, his looks, his very attentions, are scarcely those of a lover. When beside me, he is frequently absorbed in sudden thought; he has the appearance of a man whose heart is elsewhere—or whose affections are exhausted. What if his affected passion should be a mere fancy—a mere caprice? What must inevitably be the result of such a marriage? Or, worse still"—and here a new terror grew upon me—"what if he should be the tool of Lady Madelaine's cold-hearted policy — if it should be to please her that he has offered himself, to prevent my union with Herbert Devereux? To make me miserable, that he is about to sacrifice himself? I have youth, beauty, fashion, station—all that can flatter his ambition; he is no longer young—he has long been the slave of my mother's will. Alas! alas! I have fallen upon the bitter, the mortifying truth!"

Again I wept; but, after a time, I began to feel ashamed of my own cowardice. "After all," I said mentally, "I cannot be compelled to marry this man. My mother is tyrannical and self-willed, it is true, but she is not omnipotent. I have my weapons, even as she has hers. I have been too easy, too familiar, too condescending to Sir James. I will show him, and all the world, that I am aware of this. He shall now see that I am not, like himself, a mere tool in the hands of others."

I was faithful to the pledge thus tacitly made. Sir James, on his return, no sooner approached me, than I armed myself in all the panoply of my self-appreciation, and became porcupinish in my mood. Not a smile rewarded his liveliest sallies: not an acknowledgment repaid his most labored attention. I was worse than icy—I was hostile. The baronet was evidently unprepared for this sudden change; and I fear that he was clever enough to detect at once how great a share temper held in the affair. Be that as it may, however, it is certain that he was by far too good a tactician to be discountenanced for so small a matter: he only altered his system.

He became reserved and circumspect. To his habitual style of gallant, and occasionally caustic conversation, succeeded respect, sentiment, and deference. He seldom directly addressed me, but he spoke to others in my hearing in those tones and terms which interest and flatter our sex, even despite our prejudices. This able metamorphosis annoyed me. My temper failed more and more as I became conscious that I was losing ground. Frequently when I had prepared myself to utter some cut ting remark, a sudden cloud which gathered upon his brow—a melancholy which darkened in his eyes — made its utterance impossible. Astonished, perhaps conciliated, by these evidences of feeling, I began to hesitate: I might probably have wronged him; what was I to conclude? Could it be that what was in the first instance the mere wish to please my mother, had grown into a feeling toward myself, over which he could no longer exercise a control that would have spared his pride? The idea was at least a flattering one: and I found myself well inclined to indulge in it. Not once did it occur to me that my fortune might play a prominent part in the farce. At eighteen, girls never think so meanly of themselves as to believe that the possession of their affections can be put into competition with that of their purse, or that a few thousands, more or less, may have power to control their destiny; at eight-and-twenty, when the world has educated them, they modify their creed.

I was not sorry when I had argued myself into the belief that I had done Dornton injustice. I relaxed a little, in consequence, in manner as well as in feeling; but my concession extended no further. As a husband I could not look upon him with anything save aversion. Amid all my folly and frivolity I never forgot Devereux, and never ceased to look forward with hope to his reappearance.

CHAPTER XXXI.

My mother looked on in silence. I attributed her neutrality to weariness of the conflict. I wronged her; I should have placed it to the credit of her diplomacy. She was suffering the enemy to exhaust his strength in idle skirmishing. Dictatorial as she was, she did not wish my marriage with her protégé to appear one of compulsion. She was too well-bred to volunteer herself as a spectacle to all her circle; and she had wit enough to see that in my then frame of mind, opposition would only serve to strengthen my determination. The contest between us was unequal. Like her countrymen, the Campbells, Lady Madelaine was content to "bide her time;" while she well knew that the factitious spirit of courage which I had so suddenly summoned would moulder away of itself, if left disregarded, like a column of sandstone. The material of which it was built up was not of a nature to endure. She had communicated her will, and now preserved a dignified silence, leaving the rest to the attentions of Sir James, who might well be supposed to possess more than sufficient experience of the sex, to overcome the stubborn will and childish attachment of a mere girl.

Dornton was, however, by no means so certain of his ultimate success as my mother assumed to be. My conduct was too consistent to have grown out of a momentary whim; and he was, probably, less satisfied with my partial return toward courtesy, than he would have been under a persistence in the ultra measures which I originally adopted. He felt that he made no progress, and, without doubt, he communicated his conviction to Lady Madelaine; for the avalanche suddenly fell when I had ceased to dread its descent.

A new summons to her dressing-room struck a chill to my heart. The hour was indeed come! I sank trembling into a chair, and for a few minutes was unable even to ask myself if I had strength left to contend. Gradually, however, I recovered some degree of self-possession, and began to make formidable promises to my own heart. The happiness of Devereux depended upon my firmness—of this fact I had never permitted myself to entertain a doubt—therefore I was in honor bound not to yield. I argued upon false premises. I little anticipated the trial which awaited me.

"Take a seat, Miss Tilden," said Lady Madelaine coldly, as I entered her apartment. "I shall not detain you long; nor can I bestow much time upon the subject which I am about to discuss with you for the last time. In the first place, I must express my sincere regret that I ever made any portion of my personal happiness dependent upon your prosperity in after-life. My solicitude has been thrown away—but let that pass. No person of dignified mind could have been prepared for the system of heartless coquetry which you have so pertinaciously pursued with Sir James Dornton—a man, who in every phase of his character merited far different treatment. I was about to make you feel your error, and to exact from you not only a prompt but also a cheerful obedience to that expediency, and I will also say propriety, which you have so grossly outraged—I offered to pledge myself to Sir James Dornton that you should be his wife within two months from this time; but he would not receive my pledge. Too delicate to owe you possession to an act of maternal authority, and satisfied, as he asserts, that he has failed to gain your affections, he renounces all pretensions to your hand. Do you understand this, Miss Tilden? Sir James Dornton declines the alliance! This is your first step in life. Is it not a flattering début? You are silent; and perhaps you are right, for it is a circumstance by no means agreeable of discussion either to yourself or your family. We have now done with it forever."

I began to breathe more freely; I even rose to leave the room.

"One word more before we part," pursued my mother in the same cold and caustic tone as before. "Although the cause is removed the effects remain. My daughter, Miss Tilden, is already a marked woman—marked as a heartless coquet. You are at the mercy of Sir James and men who have been jilted as he has been by you, possess little of that forbearing virtue. Had I contemplated your appearance in town for a second season unmarried, your fate would ere now have been fixed forever. Sir James Dornton is not an obscure individual whose sarcasm would fall harmless; he is a man of fashion and figure, popular, witty, and distinguished; whose first sneer would have blighted your prospects. Fortunately, however you are rescued from this peril. Your inconsistent and incautious conduct has determined me no longer to burden myself with the responsibility of your guardianship, or to suffer you to have any voice in any measure in which you are concerned. It is, therefore, sufficient to inform you that I have this day had the grati-cation to receive from Mr. Curties a letter, in which he formally makes you an offer of his hand and fortune."

"From Mr. Curties!" I exclaimed, in amaze.

"Nay, Miss Tilden, why do you affect such violent surprise?" asked my mother, disdainfully. "Had you indeed so very humble an idea of your personal attractions, as to believe that you could with impunity make so marked an attack upon any unmarried man, as that which you indefatigably carried on against Mr. Curties during the last evening of his stay at Woodville? If so, pray undeceive yourself. The result—the triumphant result—of your skill is before you. The gentleman acknowledges himself conquered, and will present himself in form three days hence, to receive my answer. I shall not, however, keep him so long in suspense. That answer will be decisive. I acknowledge both your obligation and my own to Mr. Curties; he has saved our honor; and I have now only to remind you that you are to prepare yourself to meet him as a man so soon to be your husband should be met."

"I cannot be awake," I murmured to myself, as I swept my hand across my forehead, and endeavored to still the beating of my temples, which was almost audible; "it must be a frightful dream!—a hideous nightmare! No, madam," I exclaimed suddenly, shaking off the panic terror which had seized upon me;—"no, madam; you seek in vain to terrify me. You cannot have such a project. Have you never, then, read the German tale of the living man who was attached to a corpse and so thrust forth to exist as he might? the quick and the dead brought together in unnatural contact—the breathing and the breathless linked each to the other by a hateful and revolting bond? Do you talk of me and Mr. Curties as man and wife? do you think that I could exist a month beneath his roof in such a character? If I have acted weakly, idly, I will not shrink from any just rebuke; but such a threat as this is refined cruelty, which I cannot, faulty as I am, have deserved."

"I know not what you may consider to be your deserts, Miss Tilden," replied Lady Madelaine, perfectly unmoved by my agony; "I am only cognizant of the consequences which your peculiar system of conduct has entailed upon you. Your baby-love business with Herbert Devereux made you at once the amusement and the prophetic theme of my drawing-room. I doubt much whether, at the period of my leaving Rooksley for town immediately after my discovery of your extreme levity, you believed that I was at all occupied by speculations for your welfare; but in that, as well as in many other things, you were both wrong and unjust. I looked round upon all the eligible men in my circle; but I did not see there one whom I could dare to hope, would, despite your fortune, assist you to repair the past. It was not until after the death of your father that, profiting by an accidental influence over Sir James Dornton, I induced him to consent to offer himself as your suitor."

As my mother sententiously uttered this offensive declaration, I felt as though my wounded vanity, and, still worse, my womanly pride, prostrated in its holiness and purity, would have suffocated me. Lady Madelaine looked toward me, as if she were prepared for some comment upon her words; but my emotion was so great that I could not articulate a syllable.

"Yes," she pursued, following up what she evidently believed to be her triumph; "fortunately for you, misguided girl, who had already called down remark by your inconsequent behavior, Sir James Dornton had sufficient regard for my feelings to—"

I recovered my self-government in an instant; the excess of my indignation and the extremity of my situation rendered me calm to an extent which surprised myself.

"It is, indeed, matter of self-gratulation to me," I said firmly, as I raised my eyes steadily to hers, "that, when it becomes necessary to repair the effects of my misguided conduct, your ladyship, who are, of course, altogether irreproachable in your relations with the other sex, should have chanced to possess so great an 'accidental influence' over a man generous enough, when he became convinced that he could not make himself master of the fortune and fashion of the mother, to condescend to exchange for them the fortune and youth of the daughter. But, madam, even as the mother would not, so also the daughter will not."

I shall never forget the rage of Lady Madelaine—her quivering lips were as white as her forehead; her hands were tightly clenched; and for an instant I believed that she would strike me; but after a brief struggle, she unclasped her fingers, and fell back in her chair, as she demanded the meaning of my words.

"It is simple, madam," I answered; "and it will suffice to tell you that I remember the visit of Sir James to Rooksley during your first period of widowhood; your long interview, and, above all, your mutual reappearance in the drawing-room; he, gloomy, embarrassed, and taciturn; you, radiant with ill-concealed triumph."

"And what more, Miss Tilden?"

"Nothing; save that I will never marry the rejected suitor of my mother."

"Truly, you do well," said Lady Madelaine with a smile of defiance, "to remind me that we have digressed from our original subject. You perceive that, fortunately for you, there will be no necessity for you so to degrade yourself; for—to pursue my sketch of your past prowess—you had no sooner made yourself the theme of half the county by your encouragement of the man whom you now affect to despise, and cast him aside in his turn, than Mr. Curties presents himself, and saves, as I have already remarked, both your own honor and mine."

I was suddenly flung back to earth again by the mention of that hated name.

"I would rather die than marry Mr. Curties!" I exclaimed vehemently; for once more I was overcome by my agitation.

"But Sir James Dornton has resigned his pretensions—"

"I will not be the wife of either," I said, resolutely.

"The declaration is impotent," was her reply; "I will not even offer you the alternative of returning to Rooksley, for such a concession would only expose me to a probable renewal of the same mortifications. Indeed, your path is at once plain and imperative. Sir James has, as I have already informed you, withdrawn any claims which he had founded upon your good faith. More generous than yourself, he uttered no accusation which he could not prove—gave utterance to no suspicions which he could not justify; and at my first mention of my intention of compelling you to fulfil the hopes which you had not scrupled to create, he did what few men would have had sufficient pride or honor to have done—he declared his resolution to abandon his suit at once. I have already hinted to you what may be the after-consequences of his estrangement; and it is now, moreover, too late to calculate their probable effect in the world. You are fortunate in having secured a new suitor who is ignorant of your antecedents at so eventful a moment."

I was so terrified by the coloring which Lady Madelaine had so ingeniously given to the past, that all my courage abandoned me. I forgot how impossible it was for her to compel me to a hateful marriage—I forgot the pledge which I had given to my own heart to be worthy of the love of Devereux—I forgot Devereux himself. I thought only of the rigid, cold, impracticable Mr. Curties, with his endless monosyllables and untiring self-appreciation. Was he to be the climax of my dreams?—the partner of my after-life! The vision was too bitter to support. Every other feeling gave way before it; and, fairly conquered, I cast myself at the knees of my obdurate mother, and gasped out between my sobs—"Have pity on me!—have pity on me!"

I was too wretched, too thoroughly prostrated in spirit at that moment to remember what a triumph this scene would have been to Adela, could she have witnessed it; how complete a justification it would have proved of all her doubts and of all her prophecies. I was wholly absorbed in self; my pride and my passion were alike dormant.

"No tragedy, I entreat, Miss Tilden," said Lady Madelaine, waving me away; "I can brook no further contradiction. I am indignant at this perpetual disobedience, and will no longer encourage it by the weakness which I have hitherto displayed."

Overwhelmed by the cold decision of her tone, I attempted no reply. I buried my face in the cushion of her fauteuil, and wept.

"You fatigue my patience and outrage my pride, Eveleen," she pursued, after a pause; "pray, endeavor to be rational. Retire to your room; or, if you persist in remaining here in defiance of my wishes, cease to make yourself ridiculous, and tell me upon what line of conduct you have decided?"

There was a slight softening in her tone as she concluded her address, which once more awoke in me something like hope. I raised my head, and with clasped hands I faltered out, "Save me—oh! save me from this hateful marriage!"

"I cannot, consistently with your future welfare."

"Send me back to Rooksley—to Scotland—anywhere—let me not be heard of again by the world which has judged me so harshly—I will submit to any exile; but do not compel me to become the wife of a man whom I should infallibly detest."

"If you have no better arguments than these to advance, they will produce no effect upon me," replied my mother. "You can neither return to Rooksley nor to Scotland; we are not enacting a romance. You must marry Mr. Curties, since you did not consider Sir James Dornton worthy of your hand; and if you do not submit with a good grace to a marriage which you have brought upon yourself by your own levity, I shall, without further hesitation, exert my authority, and compel you to pay a proper regard to the dignity both of yourself and your family."

"All is then over!" I exclaimed, as I rose, "and I have nothing left but to die."

Lady Madelaine laughed contemptuously. "From what novel did you learn that phrase, child? It is utterly absurd. A woman does not die because she sacrifices her inclination to her duty. I gave a proof of that very trite truth when I married your father."

I disdained, wretched as I was, to reply to so coarse a taunt.

"Are you not ashamed," she pursued, "to play so poor and mean a part? I have no taste for melodrame, especially when it is got up under my own roof. You will multiply these extravagances without the slightest success; and I consequently advise you to act at once like a rational being, and to accept, as becomes you, a destiny which you cannot either control or avert."

I still stood half-suffocated with sobs, and silent.

For a few minutes my mother also forbore to speak. She had cast herself back in her chair, and appeared to be revolving some project in her mind. I watched her narrowly. At length she once more turned towards me, and said slowly—

"If I only consulted your deserts, Eveleen, I should not swerve from one single resolution which I have declared to you; but I cannot, even exasperated and wounded as I am, forget that I am still your mother. I cannot coldly abandon you to what you declare would be certain wretchedness; and I will therefore venture to take upon myself to hold out to you once more the chance—I may indeed say, the certainty—of happiness. I leave you free to choose between Mr. Curties and Sir James Dornton; for I am so well assured of the friendship of the latter, that I feel satisfied of his compliance with my wishes, when I represent to him that you have repented of your folly; but you must decide at once. I am now going to reply to the letter of Mr. Curties; he shall not be cannot, under the circumstances, be left in suspense or doubt for a moment longer than is absolutely necessary. Lord Otterford has interest in the county, which may be ruined by rupture with a person so locally influential. forbid you to utter another word, unless it be to express your decision."

The alternative was a bitter one; but the difference between my two suitors was so great that, had selection been the only difficulty, could not have hesitated for a moment; even as it was, the idea of becoming the wife of Sir James was less distasteful to me than it had nitherto been, because the personal and social defects of his rival brought out his own qualities in bright relief. Of him I could not, at least, be ashamed. He might make me wretched, but he would never make me blush; nevertheless I could not utter the word which was required of me. I still expostulated, still pleaded—the image of Devereux once more rose up before me, and I regained a little courage; but I was no match for the strong will of Lady Madelaine. She drew her writing-table toward her; selected a crow-quill from the desk, with as much care as though she had been about to transcribe her first billet-doux; and then addressing me once more, she asked with perfect composure—

"Have you decided the fate of Mr. Curties, Miss Tilden? I am about to announce it to him before the letter-bag is closed. Shall I summon him to Woodville, or give him his congé until our departure?"

"Oh, for pity's sake, let me never see him again!" I implored through my tears.

"Then you are prepared to become the wife of Sir James Dornton!"

"He has withdrawn his suit."

"Do not trifle with me, Eveleen; I have already told you that I do not despair of my influence with Sir James."

"But would you subject your own daughter, madam, to the humiliation of seeing her hand accepted as a favor to herself?"

"Assuredly not. I am not so ignorant of the world, or of the nature of men. I shall persuade Sir James that you only acted as you have done, because your coquetry would not be satisfied without he submitted to the slights and trials wherewith you were pleased to visit him, and that you now see your error."

"But even this—"

"Enough, enough!" interposed Lady Madelaine impatiently; "have you left yourself another choice? Once more—what am I to reply to Mr. Curties?" and she dipped her pen into the ink.

"That I am about to become Lady Dornton," I murmured almost inaudibly.

"What an effort of courage!" exclaimed my mother, shrugging her shoulders: "and now go to your room, and bathe your eyes. I can converse with you no longer at present, and must be careful in the wording of my letter.—It is by no means easy to tell a gentleman, with proper courtesy, that he is rejected."

I waited no further bidding, but rushed from the room, just as Lady Madelaine was preparing to throw herself upon the sofa, in order to obtain a little repose after her unwonted exertion. It never occurred to me, poor innocent! that I had been duped. It never struck me that the letter of Mr. Curties, of which I had heard so much, remained invisible. I little suspected, in short, when I cast myself upon my knees, to weep out the bitterness of my sorrow, and to endeavor to collect my thoughts, that Lady Madelaine and Lord Otterford were laughing together over the mystification of which I had been made the victim.

Lord Otterford was revenged.

CHAPTER XXXII.

I did not see my mother again in private for the next four days. When I had succeeded, if not in mastering my emotion, at least in looking more distinctly upon my actual position, I accused myself bitterly for the weakness which I had betrayed; and resolved, without further delay, to declare the impossibility of my adhering to the promise which had been extorted from me. Notwithstanding this determination, however, it was a considerable time before I could summon sufficient resolution to encounter once more the anger and indignation of Lady Madelaine, strengthened, as I was conscious that they must be, by what she would not fail to denounce as a fresh exhibition of my levity. I did, nevertheless, so far conquer my terror, as to send Joséphine to her dressing-room, with a request that she should receive me for a few instants; and never shall I forget the state of agitation in which I awaited the permission I had sought. I might, however, have spared myself the suffering. My mother had doubtlessly little trouble in convincing herself of the purpose for which I sought the interview, and her reply simply announced that she should see me at table.

I felt, even while I despised myself for the weakness, like a reprieved criminal. I was compelled to confess in my own heart how much I feared her, as a sensation of intense relief grew upon me with the conviction, that before witnesses I had nothing to apprehend from her violence. Woodville was still full of guests; the absence of Sir James and Mr. Curties had left but a small blank; and the house was a constant scene of gaiety and amusement. Still, although I hugged myself under a sense of present security, and tried to believe that, even as it had chanced to many of my favorite heroines, something would and must occur to prevent the fulfilment of Lady Madelaine's project, I could not altogether forget that by my inertness I was strengthening her power.

How often did I sigh for a portion of Adela's firmness—how often did the tears spring into my eyes as I remembered our separation, which deprived me of her advice and support at so critical a moment. During my hours of triumph and dissipation I seldom thought of her; and her memory, even when I did so, was always productive to me of mortification and annoyance. Her cold and constrained letter had closed my heart against her; but now, in my sorrow and in my uncertainty, I forgot all, save the decision of character which had at times appeared to lend me a portion of its own strength, and as I wept over myself I regretted her.

My mother, before our guests, was all suavity and kindness; she created opportunities for the display of my accomplishments; and even, although rarely, forgot Lord Chaffington for a few moments, to occupy herself with me. In the bearing of Lord Otterford there was something which displeased me. That he was cognizant of the struggle which had taken place between Lady Madelaine and myself, I could not for an instant doubt; and yet there was a lurking smile playing about his mouth as he looked toward me, and an affectation of exaggerated respect in his manner, which was anything rather than conciliating to my temper, or agreeable to my taste. All the rest of the circle were as idle, as pleasure-seeking, and as selfish as ever. Not one of them searched beneath the surface—why should they? There is nothing which worldlings find so much trouble in forgiving as the sorrow of one of their associates: it breaks in upon their personal comfort—it dislocates the chain of their ideas—it brings them back to the realities of life. In short, if by some unguarded demonstration of sympathy they chance to draw down upon themselves a confidence of suffering, it sounds in their ears like the shriek of the mandrake, which brought ruin upon him who called it forth.

Thus I was cast wholly upon myself; and once I almost formed the resolution of writing, to claim the counsel and assistance of Lady O'Halloran; but this my pride forbade: I could not brook that she should learn how utterly her kind and motherly advice had failed in its object; I could not calmly sit down to tell her that I had lost all authority over my fate by my own idle imprudence; and thus this rational and honest purpose was blighted in the bud.

At noon, on the fifth day succeeding our interview, I was once more informed that Lady Madelaine desired to see me in her morning-room. In spite of my better reason I still hoped; and the rather, as I had heard Lord Otterford inform one of the guests on the previous evening, that Sir Herbert and Lady Devereux were hourly expected at Woodville. I almost forgot my fears as I remembered this. Without doubt Captain Devereux would be their companion; and, perhaps ——! I, however, had not time to follow up the inspirations of my brightening fancy; and it was with a flushed cheek and a flashing eye that I found myself in the presence of Lady Madelaine.

"Upon my word, Miss Tilden," she said, as she looked attentively upon me, "you owe me a greater obligation than you can ever repay. I have made you reasonable; and, as my reward, I now see you by far handsomer than you had ever yet appeared to me. Nothing could be more fortunate. Sir James will pride himself the less upon his generosity."

These words sufficed to destroy the charm. I seated myself in silence, while I felt the blood chill and curdle at my heart. The effect was visible; for my mother hastily added, as she rose partially from her chair, What is the matter, Eveleen? Are you faint? Shall I ring for my woman?"

I shook my head in silence.

"This is immensely provoking!" murmured Lady Madelaine petishly. "I never saw a girl who took so much pains to disfigure her beauty, and to grow old before her time. Pray, exert a little more self-command, Miss Tilden, and remember that you are no longer a child. Rely upon it, that no husband will accommodate himself to the incessant vapors in which you indulge."

The tears fell silently upon my cheeks.

"This is intolerable!" again murmured my mother; "and had better at once be brought to an end." As she spoke, she rang the table-bell, which stood beside her; and desired the servant, who almost immediately appeared, to request that Sir James Dornton would favor her with his company for a few minutes in her own sitting-room.

I bounded from my chair.

"Yes, Eveleen," she said, as she marked my action, "Sir James is here. I have already seen him; but, as I wished to spare you both, I thought it better that you should meet, for the first time as affianced lovers, in private. All opposition is now too late. Let me not have to complain of you in this instance, or I vow to you that I will recall Mr. Curties by to-morrow's post, and you shall become his wife within six months."

I knew my mother's iron will too well to doubt her for an instant; nor, even had I possessed resolution at that moment to contend, should I have had time to do so; for, as she ceased speaking, I heard steps in the library, whence Lady Madelaine's room opened; and, before I could have uttered a word, the door fell back, and Sir James entered, and closed it carefully behind him.

I had meanwhile rushed to the window to conceal my tears, and stood there, half-buried among the curtains.

"Eveleen at last renders you justice, my dear Sir James," said my mother, as he moved toward her; "and we both hope that you will pardon all her past coquetry. It was, as I told you, the inspiration of her head, and not of her heart, and she is heartily ashamed of it; nay, I am not quite sure that it has not cost her a few tears; for, when she first entered the room she was radiant, while now she is as pale and wan as Desdemona. Will you promise to forget the past?"

The baronet bowed profoundly; and then approaching me, he took my hand and raised it to his lips, despite the inclination to prevent it which I dared not betray. "Miss Tilden is too handsome," he said with grave courtesy, "not to be pardoned for the wish to make so great a happiness as that which I am now permitted to anticipate, the reward of some suffering. She was anxious, perhaps, to make me purchase the triumph of her hand from herself, rather than to owe it to the intercession of her family; and her resolution is very flattering to me. I have neither right nor inclination to complain At whatever price so great a boon may be obtained, it can never equal its value."

I bowed coldly and in silence; my pride had been wounded by the apologetic words of my mother, and I revolted at both the tone and manner of my unwished-for suitor.

"I have warned Eveleen that we must have no more flirtations with Mr. Curties," said my mother with a forced laugh.

"I am less exacting," was the instant reply of Sir James. "I think it, on the contrary, vastly amusing; and if, at the same time, it amuses Miss Tilden, I see no reason why she should refuse herself so innocent a gratification. No, no; it is by no means of Mr. Curties that I should feel inclined to be jealous."

The malicious emphasis of his last phrase was not lost upon me. I bit my lips with suppressed rage, but I compelled myself to silence.

"Is Lady Devereux arrived?" asked my mother, as if anxious to change the conversation; "I thought I heard the sound of wheels upon the gravel before your entrance; but, as had given orders not to be disturbed, no visitor was been announced."

"Yes, she is here—all animation and brilliancy; and will think every minute an hour until she has seen you."

"I will not defer the meeting any longer; my welcome is as ready as it is sincere," said my mother, rising from her chair, and advancing to the door of the library.

I understood her intention at once; I was to be left tête-à-tête with Sir James, but for this I had neither strength nor temper; and, accordingly, I withdrew with a stately courtesy from beside him; and, as she disappeared through one door, I escaped by the other.

I hoped that, once alone again, I should become more calm, but I was wrong. I only felt the wretchedness of my position more acutely; and the momentary hope in which I had so idly indulged served to render my increased disappointment the more bitter. It was with a feeling of powerlessness and despair that I sat down to review every phase of my situation in detail. I called up the past—dwelt upon words and looks that I had hitherto almost forgotten; and lingered over them long, very long—but I did not shed a tear; I examined, rigorously and resolutely, my conduct toward both Sir James and Mr. Curties; and, although I was compelled to admit that it had been childish and inconsistent, still I could not bring myself to believe that it authorized the tyranny with which I had since been treated. But when I at last began to reflect that I was now, and by my own tacit consent, the affianced wife of Sir James Dornton, the discarded suitor of my mother—for of that fact I never for a moment entertained a doubt—then again my tears burst out afresh, and for a few seconds I thought that I should have suffocated. Nor was this all. The scene of the morning was still visibly before me; and how had my proffered hand—for it had indeed been proffered, and not asked—how had it been received? With a cold bow and a few studied sentences. I felt that now indeed I was dishonored; that now, indeed, my dignity was humbled. Had not the man to whom I was to be tied for life been solicited to accept me? Had he not been asked to forgive all that he disapproved?—and had he not disdainfully made known to me at once that I was free to smile upon a rival, without one apprehension of wounding either his pride or his self-love?

Let any woman, accustomed to the voice of adulation, and more, to the accents of passion, place herself for an instant in my position; and then let her confess how much more readily she would encounter some real sorrow, which, while it crushed her heart, still spared her self-respect.

How differently would Devereux have acted at such a moment! We are all so apt to appreciate ourselves at the value set upon us by those who love us best, that I was thoroughly désorientée by the events of the few last weeks; and my thoughts once more fastened upon Herbert. "Ah!" I mentally exclaimed, "what would have been his indignation if he had seen my mother soliciting, in my behalf, the indulgence of Sir James Dornton? And I have calmly submitted to this degradation—I have, coward as I am, consented to receive as a suitor the man who, at such a moment, approaches me with covert insult!"

These reflections almost maddened me. I felt as though I should become delirious. I was frightened at myself. Once I rose, in a state of desperation, resolved to seek Lady Madelaine, and to declare to her, even though she should be surrounded by her guests, that I would not become the passive tool of her exacting pleasure; but a fresh terror soon grew upon me, and her threat of recalling Mr. Curties once more chained my steps.

I sent to beg that I might be excused from appearing at dinner; but my request was peremptorily refused. I consequently revenged myself in the only way possible to me; and enraged Joséphine by a careless and ill-assorted costume, which rendered me odious in my own eyes. I was, moreover, as pale as marble; and there was a dark circle about my swollen eyes that betrayed the tears I had so lately shed. I had nerved myself for a reprimand, for I was callous to all minor annoyances; but I ought to have understood my mother better. She had reserved for me a trial infinitely greater.

As I had delayed my appearance until after the second dinner-bell had rung, the party were all assembled when I reached the drawing-room; and I had scarcely crossed the threshold, when Lady Madelaine exclaimed in affected gaiety—"Oh! here is the bride elect at last. Eveleen is presuming upon her privileges already. You must not encourage such pretensions, Sir James, or she will be spoiled before the termination of the honey-moon."

I stopped abruptly where I stood; I could not move forward another step; and I looked helplessly around upon the groups before me, as if awaiting some further trial of my feelings; but for once I wronged them. The sarcastic nature of the baronet, his well-known admiration of my mother, his limited fortune, and the disparity of our ages, joined to the visible suffering imprinted upon my countenance, offered no inducement to their congratulations. A dead silence followed the sally of Lady Madelaine, and I felt grateful to those who had so spared me.

Sir James, as a matter of course, led me to table. Every one, indeed, gave back as he approached, evidently acknowledging his claim.

"Poor Eveleen!" he whispered, as he drew my arm through his; "your mother is, indeed, merciless."

I looked at him in astonishment, almost expecting to detect a mockery in his eye which would belie his words; but I was mistaken. His better feelings had evidently been revolted by an indelicacy in which Lady Madelaine had sacrificed her good breeding to her ruffled temper.

Throughout the whole of the time occupied by dinner, the baronet continued to devote his entire attention to myself; but, despite all his attempts to appear gay and unembarrassed, I could perceive that at intervals he was overtaken by some painful thought, from which he had to exert considerable effort to rouse himself. Once or twice I detected a smothered sigh, which he immediately endeavored to drown under a forced laugh, frequently got up strangely mal-à-propos; and altogether, I rose from table embittered against my mother, mystified by my intended bridegroom, and dissatisfied and wretched in myself.

We had no sooner reached the drawing-room, than Lady Devereux, who, during the presence of the gentlemen, had only recognized me by a nod, beckoned me to her side upon a sofa; and, after touching my cheek with her lips, began to whisper out her surprise at the news which she had just learnt of my engagement.

"Who would have expected, Eveleen, that you, who were the toy of your mother's circle at Rooksley at the period when Sir James was, if not dangler en chef, at least dangler en second, would ever have consented that matters should be reconciled in this way!—Poor Sir James! Nothing can alter the fact that he was the first favorite, although Otterford proved the most successful. However, Lady Madelaine has shown herself to be an able general."

"I do not understand you," I said, coldly.

"Really! I gave you credit for a quicker apprehension; but, perhaps, it is better as it is. At all events, I cannot resist complimenting you upon a concession which must have been very agreeable to your mother for many reasons."

"That reflection is at least consoling," I remarked, with some haughtiness.

"Consoling, Eveleen!" echoed the particular friend of my mother, with an eagerness which proved that she had, at length, found her text-word. "What can you mean by consoling? You were no faded and forsaken beauty, driven to a matrimonial pis aller. You had other alternatives; at all events, another alternative," she added, correcting herself; "why, then, do you talk of needing consolation?"

This outburst, on the part of Lady Devereux, at once astonished and bewildered me. Hitherto, she had rarely condescended to remark my existence; and now, she suddenly assumed a confidential tone and position, which left me at a loss how to proceed. That she was piqued, was sufficiently evident. Could it be because the interests of her son would suffer by my marriage with Dornton? Nothing would be more natural; but, miserable and despairing as I was, I nevertheless remembered that, in the event of my being unable to disengage myself from my tacit promise to Sir James, I should never forgive myself, when once his wife, if I had ever shown sufficient weakness to bewail my fate to an indifferent person, and, far more, to the mother of the man I loved. How dare I tell her, that my heart was still full of her son, when she saw me quietly permit myself to be announced as the destined bride of another person? All these reflections passed hurriedly before me, and I answered, still more coldly than at first; "Surely, every woman needs consolation, who is about to stake her liberty against a chance."

Lady Devereux bit her lips, and looked keenly at me. She had not anticipated so much self-possession on my part, and she was evidently disappointed. "In any case," she resumed, as she threw herself back upon the sofa and closed her eyes, as if to intimate that our conference was ended, "you will be quite secure against the censure of the world, for it cannot accuse you of having married either for wealth or for youth; or, in all probability, from that unfashionable impulse, love. You will have contracted, in every point of view, a marriage of reason—and I sincerely wish that it may prove a happy one."

I accepted my tacit dismissal, with the same apparent indifference which I had sustained during the dialogue, but my heart was bursting. It was then palpable to every one, that I was a mere passive tool in the hands of Lady Madelaine. What did the words of her angry friend imply?—Simply, that I had been sacrificed to Dornton, as compensation for her own preference of Lord Otterford! Every pulse of my heart beat with agony and wounded pride, but I was like a lion in the toils. I had no outward strength: I had only power to suffer, not to strive.

I had seated myself upon a settee, occupying a recess, which was half concealed from view by an Indian screen, and I was thus able to indulge my tears without restraint. Was every day, almost every hour, to produce a new insult! And was I to bear them tamely, and, as though I had earned them by my own misconduct? And then I thought of the mysterious and contradictory manner of Sir James, and I asked myself, if it were possible that I should ever love him. The image of Devereux rose up as I put the question, and the answer was a fresh burst of tears.

The sound of voices in the hall warned me that I must no longer indulge in such feelings, and I hastily removed the traces of my weeping, and shrunk still closer behind my protecting screen.

Lady Devereux opened her eyes, and assumed a more graceful attitude; my mother desired Lord Chaffington to seek for a bottle of Hungary water, among the essences on a side table; two or three men, who had commenced a political discussion in the dining-room, collected upon the hearth-rug to pursue it; Lord Otterford established himself beside Lady Devereux, and immediately commenced a very animated conversation in an undertone; and Sir James Dornton, after one hurried glance round the room, hastily approached my retreat.

"I fear, Miss Tilden, that you are exasperated against me," he commenced, as he placed himself at my side; "and yet, I assure you, on my honor, that I do not merit this extreme displeasure. It is true, that I ventured, like others, to aspire to your favor; but you should do me the justice to remember, also, that I withdrew when I had ascertained, beyond all doubt, that my pretensions were displeasing to you. It was your own voice which recalled me; and although, for a few instants, my pride was at war with my tenderness, and I could not avoid reverting to the unnecessary mortification to which I had been subjected, still, I did not love you the less, because I betrayed how much I had suffered from your coldness."

"All this would be well, Sir James," I replied, proudly, "if you had not previously assumed so perfect a knowledge of all my former life. As it is, I beg you to spare me every mockery of the kind. We understand each other too well. If you could command one generous impulse, you would refuse a hand which, as you well know, has been promised to you, not freely nor willingly, but by the force of another's will. Do this, and my dislike and avoidance will at once be changed into gratitude and regard."

Sir James looked at me, for a moment, as if in pity of my simplicity; and then, endeavoring to take my hand, which, however, I coldly withdrew, as soon as he had touched it, he said, in a low and impassioned accent: "It is easy for you to talk thus, Eveleen; you, to whom I am only, as you have yourself declared, an object of dislike and of avoidance; but, as it is far otherwise with me, I cannot do what you ask. Your possession is necessary to my happiness. For a long time it appeared unattainable, yet still I persisted to hope; and do you imagine, that I now possess courage, willingly to resign the boon for which I have so long sighed in vain?"

"And will the hand satisfy you, when the heart is withheld, I ask, in my turn?" I rejoined. "Truly, your pride is far from equaling your pertinacity!"

"I forgive your scorn, Eveleen," said Dornton, quietly; "ere long you will do me greater justice."

"My fiat will depend upon yourself."

"As my wife—"

"That will I never be, while one chance of escape remains."

"Miss Tilden!" exclaimed my listener, in astonishment; "what am I to understand? Do you intend that I should once more be made a mark for your caprice and coquetry?"

"Sir!" I ejaculated, in my turn, and would have risen, but he held me to my seat.

"Listen, Eveleen," he said, as his eye flashed haughtily down upon me; "all these recriminations are at once idle and ill-bred. Occupied by one vain and impracticable vision, you neither do justice to yourself nor me. Be warned in time. I am not a man whom you can exasperate with safety. You may make of me a tyrant or a slave; I am now in your power; do not, I beseech you, let me see you place yourself, recklessly, in mine."

"Am I not already there?"

"Not as I mean you to understand my words. You are too handsome to be obdurate—too well-bred to be unjust. Of what do you accuse me? Of loving you! Surely, I am not alone in the transgression; although, according to your favorite system,

> 'That in the leader's but a choleric word
> Which in the soldier is rank blasphemy;'

and, moreover, as you will only have to snow yourself in the world, for another season, in order to increase a hundred-fold the number of delinquents, I do not think it reasonable, that I should be the only one called upon to suffer for the sins of the mass."

I still pouted, but I was woman enough to be somewhat touched by the turn of his argument. I was, however, far from well-disposed toward him. He exhibited too perfect a feeling of security; and, in my self-tormenting thoughts, I began to decide that I was destined to suffer every distinct mortification of which my situation was susceptible. Indignant with my mother; irritated against Sir James, whom I mentally accused of tyranny and meanness; terrified at the bare name of Mr. Curties, which always sufficed to check every demonstration of independence on my part, and utterly abandoned to those whose interests were at war with my own, I became perfectly bewildered. Sometimes I began to ask myself whether Devereux had not indeed forgotten me, as Lady Madelaine had asserted; and whether I could not live happy as the wife of Dornton. There was no efficient rival at Woodville to throw a shade over either his moral or physical advantages; the men envied and the women feared him, and I knew this.

After the brief conversation which I have just recorded, Sir James affected never again to remark my coldness. He had evidently pris son parti. He assumed, with an ease for which I loathed him, all the privileges of a declared lover; he became tender, anxious, and devoted. Once more he put forth all the causticity and point of his never-failing wit; all the research and charm of his well-cultivated intellect. Every one was loud in his praise; and eager to ascribe to my influence his increased powers of pleasing. In my favor, however, he made little actual progress. Moments there were in which I was, like those about me, dazzled and fascinated. His personal beauty, his perfect self-possession, and the unhesitating ease with which he discussed every subject, and decided upon the merits of every person; the scintillations of satire, half-witty and half-malicious, which occasionally placed his listeners in the position of children, who, attracted by the beauty of the wasp, entail its sting upon themselves, when they merely seek the amusement of grasping it for a moment; all these definite attributes sustained my attention and mastered my indifference. I had resolved to hate him; I even believed that I should soon succeed in doing so; but my belief was in vain. In order to hate Sir James Dornton, you must have been slighted by him; and this was not my case.

Day after day he increased in wit, in amiability, and in devotion. He created, as it seemed, a new atmosphere about me. Even Lady Madelaine no longer ventured to disturb my gradually increasing equanimity. I soon saw the futility of endeavoring to nourish my vehement dislike, so I abandoned the project, and sheltered myself under a listless indifference. No idea of ever loving him entered into my imagination. Had I not another image shrined in my heart of hearts! I felt convinced that I could never look upon him more favorably; and I rather congratulated myself that I had overcome my extreme aversion. After all, had read more than once that indifference was the state most antipathetical to passion, and most hopeless for a suitor; and I satisfied my pride that precisely to that point I had arrived and that, come what might, nothing could now alter my feeling. Dornton, however, thought otherwise. With but little moral esteem for women, and a very high opinion of himself, his confidence in his own powers was unbounded. He had vowed that he would overcome my coldness and his ingenuity, prompted by a vanity which never slumbered, was constantly exerted for the purpose.

Time passed on, unheeded by me. I forgo

-nat, sooner or later, the day must ultimately -rrive on which I should be required to fulfil my promise, and to become the wife of Sir -ames. Not a syllable had for weeks been uttered to remind me of this fact; and I had lived day after day in a sort of moral apathy, avoiding alike all retrospection and all speculation on the future; I had existed only like the ephemeris, in the moment, and for the moment. I was first aroused to something like a suspicion of the truth, by the frequent visits to town which my mother suddenly found it necessary to make; and in which, while she was only occasionally accompanied by her husband, she was always attended by the baronet. No remark was, however, made before me upon the purport of their journeys; and, for the moment, their only effect as regarded myself was an increase of demonstration on the part of Sir James, to whom these temporary absences appeared to impart fresh passion; and the presence of a hundred pretty and expensive toys which gradually accumulated about me, and of which he was the unwearied donor. I was never consulted upon any point; and I was glad of it. I had taken up my position; and I considered myself already a sufficient victim, without being required to assist in heaping the fuel for the funeral-pyre of my own happiness.

The season was about to commence, and we were preparing to leave Woodville, when my mother abruptly informed me that she had made every preparation for my marriage, which was to take place immediately after our arrival in town.

"Sir James loves you too ardently, Eveleen," she said in conclusion, "to brook the idea of seeing you made a mark for the idle attentions of a host of empty-hearted and empty-headed coxcombs; nor need I remind you that you have yourself personal reasons for avoiding as much as possible any notoriety while you remain unmarried. As Lady Dornton you may defy all malicious comment."

Even at such a moment my mother could not show me mercy.

I retired to my room. For the last few weeks I had forgotten everything, save that I was about once more to enter the world; and that, in all probability, I should again encounter Devereux. I felt that his presence might still give me strength to contend against the fate which had been forced upon me; and, cowed as I was, while I despaired in myself, I had still a hope in him. My last prop was now torn away! My destiny was accomplished. This new anguish did not, as all my previous trials had hitherto done, find a relief in tears. My eyes were hot and dry, my temples throbbed, and a suffocating sickness came over me. I had just strength to totter to the bell, to pull it violently, and to attempt to reach the sofa. I failed, however, in my purpose; before I could cross the floor, I felt a heavy weight pressing upon my brain; and, with one long piercing shriek of terror and of pain, I fainted.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

I HAVE said that the season was about to commence, and that our guests were already preparing to depart; no wonder, then, that when it was announced by the physicians, who had been hastily summoned from the nearest town, that I was suffering from a violent attack of fever of a malignant description, the house soon became deserted. Carriage after carriage rolled from the door, laden with its imperial and traveling trunks; guest after guest shook my mother's hand in silence and well-acted sympathy; and then hastened to escape from a scene of danger, and probably of death. At the end of the second day, of all the gay party which had been at Woodville, buoyant with light and laughter, none remained beneath its roof, save Lord Otterford, who had, as I afterwards discovered, a sorrow of his own to nurse; Lady Madelaine, who dared not abandon me in my extremity, and Sir James Dornton, whose absence must have ruined all his hopes.

For six weary weeks I remained stretched upon a bed of sickness. Hope and indignation had both failed at last, and I had sunk without their support. For days I was delirious, and called upon Devereux to deliver me from the torments to which I believed that my mother was wilfully subjecting me. At these periods my violence was frightful; and the extreme after-weakness consequent upon the physical efforts which I then made, reduced me to a state of helplessness impossible to describe. I could not even think; I only sought to remain undisturbed and unquestioned, and thus to be allowed to pass out of the world unconsciously.

When for a brief space my intellect returned, and that I ventured to open my eyes to the dim light which was admitted into the room, they invariably fell upon Dornton, who appeared never to move from his station near my pillow For a considerable time the impropriety of this arrangement did not strike me; indeed, my ideas still continued so confused, that even when I fixed my eyes upon him, I could not determine his identity. His extreme paleness, his melancholy expression, and the negligence of his dress, were all so unlike his former self, that I experienced no painful emotion on seeing him. His silence and his sadness were soothing to my depressed spirits and prostrated strength. The sight of him did not disturb me from my moral lethargy; and I received from his hands, without opposition, the cordials which were given to me from time to time to sustain the principle of life. The fever had left me before I was conscious of his presence; and when I at length became convinced that it was really Dornton who had watched over me with such unwearying zeal, I no longer possessed either the power or the inclination to contend. The slightest exertion subjected me to long and painful faintings, which were always succeeded by an increased degree of languor and suffering; and I consequently shrank instinctively from every possibility of their recurrence.

At length I was declared to be out of danger; but I was still too weak to stand without assistance, and my chest was distressed by a hollow and racking cough. It was, however, a relief to be able to leave my room, and to watch from the window the first timid approach of spring. I had always derived my best and purest gratification from the contemplation of nature · but after my long confinement to a sick-ed, I was more than usually susceptible to its attractions. For the first time I saw a smile upon the lip of Sir James, as he watched the tears which I shed over a twig of the flowering Judas tree which Joséphine had plucked for me in one of the shrubberies. From that day, I every morning found upon the little table which stood beside my sofa, a bunch of violets, or a cluster of wood-anemones, and I saw by the sparkle which lit up the eye of Dornton as I eagerly stretched out my hand toward them, to whom I was indebted for this simple but welcome act of kindness.

The exactions of a long convalescence are more stringent than those of sickness itself. In the hour of physical suffering, resignation and obedience are all that are required of us, and even to these we are not always equal; but as the moral and mental powers regain their tone, and become conscious of the bodily thrall by which they are held back, they create a thousand wants and wishes, which tyrannize, by their multiplicity, over the invalid; and an irritability which sets reason at defiance. Illness awakens the fears, and calls into action the sympathies of those about us—convalescence only wearies their good-will, and exhausts their patience. It is the real touchstone of affection.

Judged by this standard, Sir James was admirable. I could not form a rational wish, which was not gratified on the instant; I could not express an annoyance, for which he did not discover a remedy; he seemed to multiply himself, in order to suffice to all my caprices; was constantly on the watch to save me from casual fatigue or agitation, and silenced my mother by a look, when, by her weariness of the task imposed upon her, she was disposed to impress upon me the extent of the sacrifice.

All this was very attractive—very hostile to the undying affection which I had vowed in my heart to Devereux. I no longer understood my own feelings. Dornton had become necessary to me. I began to reflect, not certainly with pleasure, but assuredly without terror, on my engagement to him. I even asked myself, whether his continual assiduity and cheerfulness might not, perhaps, produce more home-happiness than the languid tenderness of Devereux; and the scale of feeling wavered with every new mark of affectionate attention which I received from him.

Such was the state of my mind when Sir James received a letter, which rendered it imperative that he should immediately proceed to Ireland. In the present day, such a journey would be too unimportant, and too speedily accomplished, to appear worthy of mention; but such was far from being the case at the time of which I am writing; and it was with a look of consternation that he placed the letter in my hand.

"Read it, Eveleen," he said, in an unsteady voice; "and, at least, tell me that you pity me."

I ran my eye rapidly over the paper, and then, glancing towards my mother, I strove to smile as I replied, "I feel almost inclined to reserve my pity for myself."

I had never anticipated that these few words would have produced so powerful an effect. I forgot, at the moment, how rarely I had suffered Dornton to perceive that he was essential even to my comfort; I had received, not welcomed his attentions, and this admission of his importance to my happiness overwhelmed him with triumph.

"Can you be sincere, Eveleen?" he asked delightedly, as he seized my hand, and pressed it to his lips.

"Do you believe that I am ungrateful for all your care?" I asked in my turn.

"And should you really miss me in my absence?"

"Really—and the rather that I know no one either able or willing to supply your place."

"Dare I then crave a boon in return for my poor services?"

"Assuredly, and if it be in my power to grant it, I will do so cheerfully."

"Will you pledge yourself to this?"

"Nay, now you are striving to alarm me," I said hurriedly, as a weight pressed upon my heart, and I felt my lip tremble; "name your desired reward, and I will tell you if it is in my power to bestow it."

"It is in your power, and your power only," answered Sir James, as he bent his knee before me, and again possessed himself of my reluctant hand. "Eveleen, you can no longer doubt either the depth or the sincerity of my affection. After living so long constantly in your presence, this threatened separation seems to me worse than death. I can imagine but one consolation—but that one—oh, Eveleen, if you have ever felt the torture of doubt, the misery of absence, you will at once understand the fulness of the consolation which I would entreat."

"I do not comprehend you," I faltered out almost inaudibly.

"Is your heart indeed so mute, Eveleen? Can it not prompt you to the truth? Were you only mine before I depart on this hated journey—would you only consent to become indeed mine—my own—my wedded wife. Speak, Eveleen, do I indeed deserve so great a boon?"

"It is a sorry jest, Sir James," I said, as soon as I could find breath for utterance; "would you lead me from the death-bed to the altar without a pause? Do I look like a bride, with this pale face, and this wasted form? No more of this, Sir James, if you really wish to see me one day yours."

"I dissent from you entirely, Eveleen," said my mother, suddenly looking up from a book upon which she had affected to be engaged; "and I at once declare myself in Sir James' favor. His proposal has, I frankly admit, relieved me from much embarrassment; for I have not forgotten, although it appears to have escaped your own memory, the terms upon which you have now been living together for the last three months. Do you imagine that the world has made no comment upon the circumstance? Do not deceive yourself. Your own absence during the season might not perhaps have been remarked; but with Sir James Dornton it is otherwise. His project is not only rational, but in every way expedient."

I could only bow my head, and weep.

"Let this wretched affair of Emily Vernon's teach you more wisdom," pursued Lady Mad claime after a moment's silence, which Sir James did not attempt to break; "after wearing poor Mrs. Vernon to a shadow by making her drag her anxiety and her trouble from place to place, in order to ward off, if possible, an attack of what she quietly allowed her doctors to denominate consumption, she leaves as a bequest to her victimized mother the confession that she has died of a broken heart."

"Died!" I exclaimed convulsively. "Is Emily Vernon indeed dead?"

"She died at Nice, just as you were taken ill," coldly replied Lady Madelaine; "nor should I have mentioned the circumstance to you now, had it not been to draw the deduction, that, had she acted rationally, and not romantically, she would, in all probability, be still alive; and to remind you that there is a warning in her history."

"Dead!" I repeated once more, for my aroused memory had brought vividly before me the fair, fresh image of the gentle girl who had loved me in my childhood. "Can she be dead? She was so young, so fond, so loving!" And, regardless of the frown of my mother, I buried my face in my hands, and gave free passage to my tears.

"This is terrible!" said Dornton, glancing indignantly at Lady Madelaine; "at once terrible and ill-timed."

"Has Lord Otterford heard this cruel news?" I asked involuntarily, as I once more looked up.

"Of course. It is, long ere this, known throughout London. The Vernons are all exaggerated in their notions."

The secret of my stepfather's melancholy was now revealed to me. It was the working of remorse.

Nothing more was said on that occasion relatively to my marriage, and as I lay down to rest, I trusted that the subject would not be resumed until the return of the baronet; in this hope I began to reflect that perhaps our separation might prove a blessing to me in my present frame of mind, as it would enable me to judge, from the effect produced upon my feelings by his absence, of the actual state of my affections: and self-consoled by this argument, I gave another sincere sigh to the fate of poor Emily, and then resigned myself to sleep.

I was, however, a great deal too sanguine; for no later than the ensuing morning, it was again question of this hurried and ill-timed marriage. The subject was mooted by Sir James, followed up by my mother, and finally pressed upon me by Lord Otterford.

I have said little of the latter since his marriage, for, in truth, there had been little to say. The hand of Lady Madelaine had satisfied at once his passion and his ambition; and he had become a mere man of fashion, wasting his time on trifles; the best dresser, the best rider, and the least officious personage of his circle. The fashion and beauty of my mother flattered his vanity; and as he was too thoroughly conversant with her inborn egotism to have any fear that she would ever sacrifice her principles to a caprice, he left her perfectly free to avail herself as she pleased of both. Moreover, he was somewhat of a bon vivant, and an excellent judge of wine, and consequently exhibited a few symptoms of incipient gout, all which lowered him to the mere level of a worthy, well-bred, but by no means interesting personage.

Lord Otterford's salient quality had been his fascination, and his immense tact with "the sex;" and as he forswore all gallantry after he became a husband, although he continued to be an agreeable companion, he no longer possessed any distinctive social feature. It is a melancholy fact that the ball-room butterflies who commence life as "ladies' men," commonly close it as mere human nonentities. And it was only now—now when he had ceased all effort to render himself attractive—that the punishment of his former falsehood had come upon him—now, when the charms of the woman whom he had so long coveted had paled beneath long custom and companionship, that the vision of the fond girl who had loved him—who had trusted him—and who had died when that love became a crime, was brought against him in all its purity; and that conscience, when it rose before him, pointed with a rigid finger to her bier, and whispered that the ruin was his work.

In spite of the affection which I had felt for the unfortunate Emily, of the distaste which I had nourished of himself, and of my own better reason, I pitied him. He was evidently stricken to the soul, and wounded even in the midst of his self-indulgence. I alone suspected the cause of his depression; and he was so well aware that to me it could not long be a mystery, that his eye sunk before mine whenever I addressed him; and he scrupulously avoided on his part all further intercourse, than that trivial exchange of courtesies exacted by good breeding.

It was, consequently, with some surprise that I now heard him support the arguments of Dornton. He represented to me the useless cruelty of exposing the man to whom I was affianced, to the unceasing anxieties, and doubts, and apprehensions, by which he must necessarily be tormented, during an absence so little anticipated at such a moment; but there was no violence, no bitterness in his reasoning. He admitted the rationality of my objections, although he would not allow them to be of sufficient weight to counterbalance the arguments by which they were opposed. He brought before me the debt of gratitude which I had contracted—the untiring devotion of which I had been the object—the fact that I had received Sir James as a suitor—and, above all, that the period originally named by my mother for our union had long passed; and all these tangible circumstances were rendered more prominent, and more embarrassing, by the tender entreaties of Sir James, who, on his knee before me, protested that he would never rise from his position until I had consented to his happiness.

This painful and fatiguing scene endured so long that my strength gave way under the excitement. I pressed my hand to my forehead, which was throbbing almost to agony. "Be generous, Sir James," I said at last; "you know that I am unequal to this trial. How can you ask me to become your wife under such circumstances? The very movement which such an event must create about me, would, in all probability, plunge me once more into the fearful state of suffering and alienation from which I have only just escaped."

"All this, and more, has been alike anticipated and prevented, dearest Eveleen," inter posed Sir James, as he pressed my hand to his lips and to his heart; "three days hence I must commence my journey; and, until the moment of my departure, I will not ask you to ratify my happiness. Lady Madelaine consents that the ceremony shall be performed here, in the saloon; she has already secured a promise that a special license shall be prepared against the moment in which I go to claim it; let me but call you my wife, but have the right once to clasp you to my heart before I am separated from you, and I will depart by the mail which passes Woodville in the evening, full of security in the present, and of trust and confidence in the future."

I listened breathlessly; and I instantly understood that all further opposition would be worse than useless. Everything had been prearranged and predecided. I had only to fulfil my destiny. What chance of successful competition remained to me? How could I, poor, timid, irresolute being as I was, oppose the indomitable will of a Lady Madelaine? or the passionate entreaties of a man who had for months devoted himself to my caprices?

I feel that, even now, I am endeavoring to excuse my weakness; as though the reader could not detect, in every detail of my life, the want of moral courage which made me alike the tool and the victim of every will with which my own came into contact! Enough that, as may have been foreseen, I yielded. Weary of resistance, bewildered by the arguments advanced, anxious to escape by any means from the persecution to which I was subjected; wilfully shutting my eyes to the fact, that, in order to spare myself present suffering, I was sacrificing by one word all possibility of future freedom, I at length murmured out my consent, in a voice trembling with terror and agitation.

"But remember," I said, breaking in upon the rapturous acknowledgment of my transported suitor, whose exhibition of ungovernable rapture was to me as fatiguing as his previous pertinacity; "remember, Sir James, that if I fulfil in good faith the promise which you have extorted from me, I expect no less from yourself."

"I have no alternative, and am compelled to verify it, kindest and most adored Eveleen," was his lover-like reply; "and thus, and only thus, I repeat my pledge unhesitatingly."

"And now leave me, I entreat you," I implored earnestly; "I must have time to think. My brain whirls with the excitement which our interview has caused. I feel as though my delirium would return. Have pity upon me, and leave me to myself."

My request was granted. My mother and Lord Otterford left the room at once, the latter only pausing as he passed me to raise my fingers to his lips. Sir James lingered for a moment; but, when he would have approached my sofa, I warned him away, and rang the bell for my woman. As she appeared, he looked toward me reproachfully, and disappeared.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Never was there so melancholy a festival as my marriage! The rector of the parish performed the ceremony, and his daughter officiated as my bridemaid. My simple morning dress of white muslin was half hidden beneath the folds of a superb shawl of Indian cashmere the gift of Sir James, and the only article of any value which I wore. Joséphine almost scolded herself into a fever for weeks afterward, whenever an allusion was made to the circumstance, while to myself it was a subject of the most utter indifference. Pale, depressed, and reckless, I must have looked to the worthy rector and his daughter, and an official-looking personage, who was presented to me as Mr. Thornton, when I entered the saloon leaning upon the arm of Lord Otterford, who had stationed himself at the door of my dressing-room, for the purpose of offering himself as my escort, more like a spectre than a bride. Sir James and my mother were already doing the honors to our reverend guest, and his pretty, happy-looking daughter; who, all blushes, smiles, and tremor, did not appear to the last thoroughly to understand how her present important office had devolved upon her.

I had been so painfully absorbed by my own fears and reflections, regrets and bewilderment, that I had taken no part whatever in the scanty preparations which were made for the marriage; and, consequently, when Dornton approached me, and placed a small casket in my hand, requesting me, in a suppressed voice, to present it to Miss Grenval, I did so mechanically with as cheerful a smile as I could summon to my lips; nor did I take the slightest interest in the action to which I had been prompted, until I was aroused from my state of moral lethargy by the delighted comments of the happy girl, who was soon occupied in adorning herself with the pearls which it had contained.

I looked at her in wonder and in envy. I had never known the joy which such a gift could produce, upon one unaccustomed to the costly toys which form a necessary portion of the existence of the wealthy and the idle; and, as she stood before a glass, arranging her newly-acquired treasures upon her person, I lingered over her glowing cheeks, her sparkling eyes, and her low, self-gratulatory expressions of wondering admiration; while I felt the tears rise painfully to my own hot and weary eyeballs, and glanced at my pale cheeks, my bending form, and my look of hopeless melancholy. Strange to say, I was calm, perfectly calm. My pulse beat steadily, and there was not a quiver on my lips. I had exhausted all violent emotion within the last two days. I had wept, and knelt, and wrestled with my misery; and I had sunk under the fatigue of so unequal a contest. I scarcely knew myself. I had no longer either a hope or a fear; I was simply passive.

Lady Madelaine was magnificently attired, and both Lord Otterford and Sir James were in full dress; but no attempt had been made on the part of my mother to induce me to exchange my simple wrapping-gown and close cap, for a costume more befitting the occasion. Content to carry out her great project, she affected to overlook all minor points; she had cleverly avoided subjecting me to any preliminary fatigue; and thus husbanded my strength and energies for the eventful moment which was to make me the wife of her protégé. Her smile was radiant. Her triumph made her carriage almost regal. I watched her also; and felt a sort of vague astonishment that those around me should be so cheerful and so brilliant, when I was sad and faded.

Sir James was all animation, all suavity, all delight. I do not attempt to repeat his extravagant acknowledgments, his ardent professions, or his tender gallantries to myself. I scarcely remarked them at the time, and only felt that they distressed and overpowered me. The calm, gentle, and low-voiced congratulations of the rector were far more welcome, however ill-placed. His suppressed tones were soothing to my over-wrought nerves; and when I saw a tear glistening in his eye, I could have flung my arms about his neck, and wept out my grief upon his bosom.

In about a quarter of an hour, my mother took my hand, and led me toward a table, behind which the grave-looking stranger, whom I then discovered to be a lawyer, was seated, intently poring over sundry papers and parchments. I believe that I have elsewhere mentioned the fact of Lady Madelaine being the sole guardian of Adela and myself; and it appeared that on this occasion she appeared in her official capacity. Certain it is, that she informed me, as Sir James drew forward a chair for my accommodation, that there were some documents for me to sign before my marriage, which were in the keeping of Mr. Thornton. To hear was to obey. I was utterly ignorant of business in every shape, and equally careless of the consequences on the present occasion. So soon, therefore, as the parchment was spread before me, and the proper spot cautiously indicated by the lawyer, I wrote my name without comment or hesitation; after which Sir James, my mother, and Lord Otterford followed my example.

This done, a brief and desultory conversation ensued; and at its close, the whole party moved toward the spot where the rector had already taken up his station. There was a certain solemnity in the arrangement. I walked first, supported on the arm of my father-in-law; Lady Madelaine followed with Sir James; and Miss Grenval closed the procession under the escort of Mr. Thornton. My heart beat quickly for an instant, as I found myself kneeling beside my future husband; and a giddiness came upon me, which rendered me almost unconscious of what was passing before me, and of the scene in which I was an actor.

The ceremony was soon over. The servants, who had been admitted to the entrance of the saloon, disappeared; the folding-doors, which opened upon Lord Otterford's private room, were flung back; and Mr. Grenval had the happiness of handing Lady Madelaine to a table covered with a profusion of gastronomical luxuries. Sir James, happy and triumphant, supported me to the seat which had been assigned to me; and the pretty daughter of the rector followed on the arm of Lord Otterford. It was fortunate that the amiable divine possessed unwearied animal spirits, and a benevolence equally untiring, or our breakfast would have passed entirely in pantomime. Lady Madelaine was too full of self-exultation to be loquacious; and Lord Otterford made no effort to throw off the languor by which he was oppressed; while Sir James neither looked at nor spoke to any person but myself, save in monosyllables; and my solitary bridemaid was evidently dying to escape, in order to pour forth her delight to her family.

As everything must terminate, however, sooner or later, so our weary breakfast at length came to a close; and I believe that every individual of the party, not even excepting the worthy and amiable rector, felt glad of the release. Although the good clergyman had put a cheerful face upon the business, it was nevertheless evident that he suspected some mystery, of which he easily understood that I was the passive victim; and there was a fatherly interest in his look, and a kindness in his accents, when he took leave of me, by which I was much more touched than by the renewed congratulations which he doubtlessly considered it expedient and correct to offer.

CHAPTER XXXV.

We were no sooner alone than Lady Madelaine, instead of retiring to her dressing-room, as I had anticipated, and thus affording me a pretext to retire also, caused her fauteuil to be drawn nearer to the fire, and seated herself in all the glory of her brocade and jewels. I was about to make an effort to escape, nevertheless; but her first words arrested me, and I was compelled to resume my seat.

"Do not attempt to retire, Eveleen," she said firmly, although the smile which she had called up was intended to make the address somewhat less dictatorial; "we have an immensity of business to arrange, and our time is sadly limited. Although it is very easy for Miss Tilden and Sir James Dornton to get quietly married over a drawing-room fire, they cannot reënter the world with the same absence of ceremony, and, consequently, certain arrangements must be made, and certain plans judiciously carried out, in order that the exigencies of society may be properly complied with. Now these, Eveleen, you cannot, either in your character of bride—or, for the moment, if you will, widow—arrange, combine, or overlook in your own proper person; and I have therefore proposed to Sir James, to take these matters into my own hands, and to spare both you and himself all anxiety and fatigue."

I bowed my thanks. I felt no interest whatever in the arrangements to which my mother alluded, nor did I ask a question. I was pining to be alone. She paused for a moment, as if awaiting my reply; but, finding that I continued silent, she resumed: "In order to do this, I must, of course, leave Woodville, and this fact has occasioned great uneasiness to Sir James. Obliged as he is to absent himself this evening, he has ventured to take measures to prevent your temporary isolation, which, he trusts, will not prove disagreeable to you."

For the first time I listened attentively. I felt that the eyes of Dornton were riveted upon me, and that it was necessary I should say something.

"Whatever your ladyship and Sir James have decided, I am prepared to approve," I said coldly.

"Spoken like the very model of a wife!" exclaimed my mother, with a laugh, which was not altogether one of gaiety. "Our minds are then relieved at once. You are too young and too pretty, Eveleen, to dispense with proper protection. I would not propose Lady Flora, for I knew that you had already enjoyed her society to satiety; and, as my taste does not lead me to cultivate the affections of elderly ladies in general, I was fairly at fault, and could not remove the difficulty. Sir James was, however, more fortunate; and, as you have given us carte blanche to act as we deem best, I am delighted to think that, during our compulsory absence, we shall have the satisfaction of feeling that we have left you under the guardianship of so unexceptionable a person as your husband's aunt!"

My husband! How the words jarred upon my nerves!

"Do you consent, my sweet Eveleen?" murmured Sir James.

"If it be your wish," I replied languidly, "and that your relative will consent to become the inmate of so dull a house and the companion of so sad and—" I was about to add—"desolate a being;" but I checked myself, and only terminated the sentence by my tears.

Dornton rose hurriedly from his chair, and began to curse the fate which compelled him to his odious journey. I witnessed his emotion with indifference, for I knew that go he must, and I only sighed for the moment of his departure. I was extenuated with fatigue, exertion, and misery. All that I wanted was solitude—absolute, unbroken solitude. I wanted to think, to breathe, and to suffer in freedom.

The events of the last few days had succeeded each other with a rapidity that had left me no time to reflect upon their overwhelming effect upon myself, or to look deliberately and calmly upon my present position and my future prospects. Alas! that future—what could I hope from it? I had never, upon one point, deceived myself for a moment; I did not love the man to whom I had given my hand; I did not believe it possible that I should ever do so. My vanity was flattered by his adoration, and my gratitude had been excited by his watchful tenderness during my convalescence. I well knew, however, that this was all—that he had no other hold upon my heart. How, then, could I look into the future with hope, or even with tranquillity? I had seen enough of Sir James Dornton to be convinced that in marrying him I was not about to become the wife of a man who, like Lord Otterford, would subside into a mere domestic husband. The world—the great world—the world of fashion, and dissipation, and luxury, was the only atmosphere in which he could long breathe freely. This was, indeed, the same world of which I had dreamt so fondly from my girlhood—but not the guide who was to pilot me through its mazes. The charm with which I had then invested it was gone, and, as I at that moment believed, gone forever.

I will dwell no longer on the memory of my marriage-day. The dinner was a counterpart of the breakfast, save that while it lasted Sir James did not attempt to sustain anything like a conversation even with me. His eyes scarcely ever wandered from my face; he did not even affect to eat, but he drank wine in a manner quite unusual with him. My mother talked of town; of the fêtes which she proposed to give, and the artistes whom she meant to patronize; affected occasionally to address me as Lady Dornton, and ultimately succeeded in depriving me of the slight degree of energy which I had hitherto preserved.

The consequence of this utter prostration was, however, a fortunate one; for when a servant at length announced the arrival of the mail which was awaiting Sir James at the park gate, and that I saw him hastily spring from his seat and approach me, I gave one suffocating sob, and fainted.

I afterward learnt that it required all the authority of Lady Madelaine to compel him to quit my side; but the necessity for his absence was so stringent, that he had no alternative save obedience. As for myself, when I again became conscious at once of existence and of suffering, I opened my aching eyes in my own quiet apartment, where, by the faint light of a night-lamp, I saw Joséphine and my old nurse watching beside my pillow. Such was the realization of the glittering and romantic picture which I had been used to draw of my wedding-day.

Restored to myself by the departure of Dornton, I was still unable to overcome the fearful lethargy which had taken possession of me. Feelings and events alike were so confused and untangible, that I could neither separate nor retain them. I was just in the position of the man whom Plato, in one of his undying dialogues, supposes to have been imprisoned in a cavern, with his back toward the light, where he could distinguish nothing save the shadows of men passing and repassing on the wall before him. My head was perplexed—my marriage seemed to be a dream; but, nevertheless, a sense of restraint was strong upon me. I no longer felt free even to look into my own heart. It was a waking nightmare.

Had I ever experienced the wish to feel grateful to Lady Madelaine for the gratuitous offer which she had made of sparing me the exertion of undertaking any arrangements for the future, it would have been impossible to do so, when, during the three days which intervened between the departure of Dornton and the arrival of his aunt, she permitted me, without scruple, to see at what an expense, both of temper and of patience, she compelled herself to remain at Woodville in order to receive her, and to preserve at least the semblance of an interest in my comfort. The season had long commenced—she was now untrammeled; my sacrifice had purchased her freedom, at least until she should summon Adela to her side—an event which I scarcely anticipated, although I could not explain upon what plea she could much longer keep her in banishment. No wonder that Lady Madelaine pined to escape from a sick-room and a deserted saloon.

I scarcely gave a thought to the new companion who had been provided for me. So long as Sir James continued absent, I cared not who filled his place—I was content. It was not, however, with utter indifference that I heard my mother, on one of the rare occasions when we were seated quietly together—she languidly employed at her embroidery frame, and I lying back, half-dreaming, upon my sofa—commence a conversation of which the expected stranger was the subject.

"I trust that this Miss Dornton will prove endurable. I have such a horror of old maids, that I quite dread the time which I must spend under the same roof with her."

"Poor lady!" I replied, without unclosing my eyes; "she has more reason to shrink from the prospect of becoming my inmate. Your ladyship's torture will be brief; what you number by hours she may, probably, count by weeks."

"The thing will bear no comparison, Eveleen, and is too absurd. Miss Dornton is in narrow circumstances, and has for many years been residing in a country town, where, too proud of her ancient descent to associate with the petty gentry about her, and too poor to keep up her connection with the neighborhood, she has lived the life of a recluse."

I sighed, and the sigh was one of envy. The woman of whom my mother was speaking so disdainfully was free.

"Moreover," continued Lady Madelaine in the same tone of easy superiority, "will it not be an event in her existence to become domesticated with Lady Dornton? You really know so little of the world, Eveleen, that you do not make a proper distinction, even in a case in which you are yourself interested; and it is, perhaps, necessary that I should hint to you, in consequence, the propriety of asserting your own dignity with Miss Dornton. There is no set of persons on earth so encroaching, where their advances are tolerated, as poor relations."

I thought of Lady Flora, but I made no comment on my mother's words.

"I wish, at all events, that she would arrive," again she resumed, pettishly; "she might certainly have been here before this. It is ill-bred and presuming on her part to make so much unnecessary delay."

"She does not, in all probability, suspect that your ladyship is in such haste to leave Woodville."

"Is that an epigram, Lady Dornton?"

"I am in no mood for epigrams: I simply gave utterance to my thought."

"In that case I shall merely remark, that if [illegible] question has forgotten herself so far as to speculate upon my movements, she is too ready to identify herself with the family into which her nephew has married."

"The fault is mine, madam," I said, somewhat impatiently, "or the insolent egotism of my mother jarred upon my feelings, bowed down as I was alike by the past and by the present; "pray do not suffer me involuntarily to prejudice you against her. It was an idle suggestion, and one which I had, perhaps, no right to express. You must forgive me, for I am ill and sick at heart, and scarcely am aware of the exact purport of the words I utter."

"Ill and sick at heart!" echoed Lady Madelaine, as though she had not every reason in the world to believe that such must be the case; "really, Eveleen, you talk strangely for a bride. You involve yourself in the most fantastic annoyances, and then you assume the attitude of a martyr. If you had listened to reason, and become the wife of Sir James when he first proposed for you, as any rational young woman, under the circumstances, would have done, there would have been no necessity for this ill-timed separation, and he could have left you in town, under my protection, when he had been seen once or twice with you in public."

"You mistake me, madam."

"How so?"

"I am regretting neither the absence of Sir James, nor the impossibility which exists of my appearing in public."

"We will pursue the subject no farther in that case."

"As you please."

"One word more, however. If you are, in a fit of unbecoming romance, pining yourself away in memory of Mr. Devereux, it becomes my duty to remind you that you are now Lady Dornton."

"I know it, madam," I gasped out, as the blood rushed over my brow—"I feel it!"

"I hope so; and now we will select some other topic."

What that topic might have been, I was destined never to know; for at that very moment a carriage passed under the window, which we each felt must contain the expected guest. For one moment my heart beat quick. Was I about to meet a friend or a jailer?

The door was thrown open by a servant, Miss Dornton was announced, and she immediately entered, leaning upon the arm of Lord Otterford, who had assisted her to alight. My mother courtesied coldly and in silence, and then resumed her seat; while the look of surprise which I detected upon the countenance of the visitor hastened the movement which I was making to rise and receive her. Her first embarrassment over, Miss Dornton glanced from Lady Madelaine to myself; and immediately that she met the smile and the outstretched hand with which I was slowly approaching, she turned rapidly to welcome both; and then gently seated me once more among my cushions, and placed herself beside me.

"How shall I thank you, madam"—I commenced; but Lady Madelaine interposed.

"Miss Dornton will be kind enough to excuse your exerting yourself, Eveleen; she is already aware that you are an invalid, and that you remain in the country only because quiet has been prescribed for you. You must not imagine, madam, that Lady Dornton is naturally either valetudinarian or melancholy—quite the reverse; but she has had a very severe illness, and is still suffering considerably from weakness."

"Poor young creature!" was the kind-hearted rejoinder; "her marriage at such a moment must have been a great trial to her, and the absence of Sir James have made it doubly painful."

My mother coughed a little high-bred cough which superseded the necessity of a reply.

"I trust that you have not suffered from your journey," I said hastily, not well knowing how to frame an answer to her remark.

"You remind me, Eveleen, that we have been inhospitably forgetful," again broke in Lady Madelaine; "Miss Dornton will necessarily require both refreshment and repose. Lor-Otterford, the bell, if you please. Miss Dornton will find everything provided in her dressing-room."

The well-bred old lady at once understood the motive of my mother, and rose. Joséphine was summoned to conduct her to her apartment, and our first interview was over

CHAPTER XXXVI.

On the following morning Lord Otterford and my mother departed. I saw them abandon me without a sigh; nor do I believe that their hasty disappearance caused one regret to my new guest.

Miss Dornton was very diminutive in stature, but had evidently been a pretty woman in her time. Her figure was still smart and well preserved; and there was a shrewdness in the expression of her countenance which gave assurance of the vivacity of her intellect, even tempered as it was by the benevolence which evidently formed the prominent feature of her character. She was the very perfection of fastidious and somewhat pedantic neatness. Her dress was rich, but somewhat scrupulously plain; and it formed no bad type of her moral nature. She was full of good, strong sense and womanly sympathy, but she possessed neither sentiment nor imagination. For the tangible sufferings which she could see and comprehend, she had always a tear or a word of pity; but for those which grew out of either moral or mental struggles she was impracticable and callous. She could understand a headache or a fainting-fit, but she could never attribute them to anything deeper than a mere physical cause.

Like all persons long accustomed to live alone, she was very taciturn and self-centred, pious, and occupied. She could better have dispensed with her shadow than her work-basket; and did not appear to have settled herself comfortably until she had ascertained the distance of Woodville from the parish church, the name of the rector, and the hours of the services. She was evidently a worthy, kind-hearted old lady; but, as regarded companionship, Sir James might with equal propriety have provided me with a portrait of one of his female ancestors.

I did not, however, regret this fact; Miss Dornton answered the purpose for which she was intended admirably. Her protection was unexceptionable for myself, and liberated my mother from an ungrateful duty, ungraciously performed. Well-bred, unassuming, and self-centred, she was the very antipodes of Lady Flora; and I was rejoiced that her taciturn habits enabled me to indulge in my own reflections without any solecisms in civility.

It was not until I had been for several days domesticated with the meek old lady, and become satisfied that I should meet with no interference from her in any way, that I began seriously to understand my real position. The undefined feeling with which Sir James had inspired me, the blended gratitude and admiration which, in his best moments, he had awakened in my heart, required his perpetual presence to assure its duration. While he soothed my hours of pain, and beguiled those of lassitude, I leaned upon him for support and companionship; but, as during his absence, these failed, so his charm failed with them. How different was this pale and borrowed light from the enduring flame which Devereux had kindled in my spirit! Circumstances had, indeed, somewhat quenched it, but it still existed; and might, as I was compelled to acknowledge to myself, be but too easily reillumed. I dwelt upon all that had passed between us; I recalled his every look, his every word, and his every gesture, during our short but eventful interview near the Wood Lodge; I made a few faint struggles to resist these dangerous memories, but I was too weak in purpose to wage successful war against my own heart.

This wrestling of affection against duty recurred so constantly, and created so painful a degree of depression, that it was a continual obstacle to the reëstablishment of my health. I was conscious at last that a less patient and considerate companion than Miss Dornton would have been desirable for me at such a crisis. She, poor lady, satisfied of the enviable fate of the woman who had secured so unexceptionable a husband as her nephew, never looked beneath the surface for a hidden evil; she never dreamed of that sickness of the mind by which the body withers; and so long as I punctually and obediently swallowed the drugs prescribed for me by my physician, she felt no further responsibility.

In my healthier moments I made a resolution to emancipate myself from the trammels of my own emotion, but I was soon compelled to own that I was powerless without assistance. In this dilemma my thoughts once again recurred to Adela. The hurry of my marriage had rendered it impossible that she should be present; nor, indeed, trusting to the last that I should be able to escape a union with Sir James, had I urged Lady Madelaine to summon her. Consequently, I felt myself to be blameless as regarded this apparent neglect; and as I imagined that now I had irrevocably sacrificed myself to my mother's will, she could have no pretext for refusing to me the society of my sister, at least while I remained in the country, I pondered over the idea until I became sincerely and earnestly anxious to see it realized. Miss Dornton, to whom I communicated my wish, appeared to be annoyed at the suggestion; but as she gave no reason for her objection, I resolved upon following out my project without any further appeal to her authority She was probably jealous that I should prefer the society of my own sister to that of my husband's kinswoman, and the companionship of a younger person than herself It was a little weakness for which I readily forgave her, but which it was needless to indulge.

The result of my deliberations was the following letter to Adela. It cost me some resolution, for I remembered the ill-success of my last missive; but I resolved to persevere.

"I have changed my name, my dear Adela, and I hope that the one which I now bear will insure the happiness of my life; but all is, as yet mere speculation. The absence of Sir James, on business connected with some Irish property, makes me dull enough, and renders my recovery very slow. Come, and help me to regain alike my health and spirits, my dear sister. It will be a charitable act, for which I shall be most grateful. The pleasure of seeing you beside me will make me forget that I ought to wish for the presence of another."

This letter, short as it was, had cost me some study, and I looked upon it as a sublime effort of courage. My heart had assuredly little to do with the expressions which it contained on the subject of Sir James; but my pride was roused, and I piqued myself upon the manifestation of a little heroism, which might serve to secure me against the comments of my sister; while I did not doubt that Adela, glad at any price to escape from the tedium of Rooksley, would not hesitate to procure Lady Madelaine's consent to so simple and natural an arrangement.

Several days passed by before I received any reply, but, as I had calculated that such must inevitably be the case, I waited as patiently as could. At length two letters were delivered to me, of which one was from my mother, and the other from Adela. I tore open the latter with a beating heart. These were its contents.

"Dear Eveleen,

"I had been informed of your marriage, but was ignorant alike of your own feelings, and of those of Sir James. He doubtlessly loves you, as you talk of anticipated happiness. Enjoy so agreeable a prospect: I shall take more interest in its realization than you may, perhaps, feel inclined to believe. I can do no more. I should be the worst person in the world as your physician, either in mind or body. We so seldom think alike, and we, in all cases, act so differently, that I should be more likely to trouble your new-made felicity than to increase it."

My mother simply ratified in her note the refusal of Adela. She had, as she declared, left her free to act as she saw fit when my invitation was communicated to her by my sister; believing, after the reluctance which Adela had expressed to becoming my guest, that she should do me no kindness by attempting to overcome what was evidently a rooted repugnance.

And this was all; and I sat for a time lost in conjectures before these two cold, concise, and matter-of-fact epistles. To what cause was I to attribute so heartless an abandonment on the part of my only sister? That we had never either felt or professed an overweening affection the one for the other was undoubtedly true, but this was, under the circumstances, a proceeding on the part of Adela which almost betrayed aversion. I feverishly searched into the very recesses of my heart to discover, if possible, its cause. I well knew that my sister's feelings were extreme in all things; and, eventually, with a burning brow and a throbbing pulse, I decided that she had sought to manifest, in this cutting letter, her contemptuous censure of my infidelity to Devereux, and in her refusal to visit me—an unequivocal demonstration of her disdain.

The witness of their own conscience never suffices to the weak-minded; they require, in order to sustain themselves in their own eyes, and to retain their self-esteem, the approbation of others, especially of those decided and indomitable spirits who compel their respect. This was precisely the position in which I then found myself. I acknowledged the supremacy of her moral strength, and I required its support to pillow my own weakness—its fiat to justify my own acts.

Humbled and ashamed, I never sought for a moment to discover a counter-argument with which to combat the opinion that I believed her to have adopted. On the contrary, I once more wept over my cowardice—my everlasting custom when, by my own weakness, I had plunged myself into difficulty. The little edifice of virtue and duty, frail as it was, which I had occasionally striven to build up, was overthrown at once. I no longer sought to excuse myself, upon the plea of either gratitude to Sir James, or filial obedience to Lady Madelaine. I flung all such arguments to the winds as idle sophistries; and for a time dared to think that the heart could not, and should not, be controlled. I shuddered, but I clung to my dangerous theory. I saw the precipice at my feet; but I scorned to retreat a step!

So unwholesome a state of mind could not, however, endure long in a nature as yet undepraved. The storm of passion swept over me, and I saw my future path of life overstrewn by the fragments of past peace which it had rent away in its progress; but I felt grateful that I could look upon them without positive remorse, and I glorified myself on the conviction. Alas! had I, in that hour of returning reason, only known WHERE to turn for real comfort, how much after-suffering would have been spared to me! But I have already confessed that of pure, humble-minded, heaven-trusting religion I knew nothing. I sought for strength in myself, where I never found it; and virtue in my own heart, which was as unstable as water.

The terror of my sister's sarcasms aroused my temper. I began to ask myself why I should defer to the judgment of a mere girl, who only reasoned upon theory, and who knew nothing of the world which she professed to scorn, or of the feelings which she affected to analyze and to control! I could not, however, cheat myself in this way; as my anger subsided, my fears returned. My mind was mastered by that of Adela.

It seemed to me that if I could only induce her to listen to me; if I could only explain to her my reluctance, my opposition; if I could only tell her of all my tears, all my beseechings, my physical weakness and my mental fatigue, she would sympathize with my sacrifice, rather than blame me; but while I enumerated all my past struggles, and invoked their memories, I forgot that I was undermining my own peace, and assuming the attitude of a victim, when I should be endeavoring to gather strength for the performance of the new and imperative duties which had grown up about me. In a mental effort to justify myself in the eyes of another, I was rendering myself more faulty in my own.

And while all this tumult was warring within me, Miss Dornton sat by my side as calm and passionless as an automaton. There was something fearfully irritating in the ceaseless motion of the knitting-needles which she scarcely ever laid aside. I have watched them at times until I have with difficulty suppressed a groan. We were together for weeks; and had she only once changed the aspect of the labor upon which they were employed, I could have supported even them with something like philosophy; but this poor relief, trifling as it was, never came; she was engaged upon a measureless length of what I think she called fringe; and with which she had a horrid vision of garnishing some old-world piece of furniture which had belonged to her grandmother. I never inquired what it was; but it appeared to me that its dimensions must be somewhat on a par with the limits of Salisbury Plain.

Let those laugh who will at this digression; but let them at the same time be assured that petty and perpetual annoyances, such as these, are to the suffering spirit what the rose-leaf was to the vase of water—the trifle which cause them to overflow!

Thus time crept on. The dreary, cheerless, leafless winter had robbed even Woodville of its charms. The lake was frozen beneath the windows; the birds were silent among the boughs; the rare shrubs and plants which, during the months of sunshine, made the grounds almost rival in their gorgeousness and variety the rich profusion of the tropics, were removed to the conservatories, or huddled beneath matting. To find beauties amid such a scene, the inmate should possess a light heart. To the unhappy, a winter of solitude is a mere season of suffering. To me this withering of nature was morally unwholesome. It appeared to sympathize in my hypochondriacism, and to encourage my mental lethargy. I would have given all the splendid and useless toys by which I was surrounded, and which seemed to mock the abandonment of friends and relatives, for one cluster of wild roses, or one bunch of violets.

Even a winter with Miss Dornton, however, could not last forever. The spring came at length; I could again wander unattended through the shrubberies, and indulge in dreams of the future which were never likely to be realized. Sir James had not explained to me the nature of the business which had detained him so long in Ireland. His long and eloquent letters were filled by passionate regrets and enthusiastic anticipations. I have hitherto made no allusion to our correspondence, simply because it jarred upon the train of feeling to which I had habituated myself. Each letter that I received broke upon my spirit like a discordant note upon the ear; and it was well that I at once decided upon answering these matrimonial epistles at the very moment of their receipt, while the influence of Dornton's harmonious and tender periods was still strong upon me, or I know not how I should ever have accomplished so difficult a task.

Thus, as I before remarked, I was in perfect ignorance of the causes which compelled Sir James to so prolonged an absence; while I was so well satisfied with their effects, that I did not care to ascertain their nature. I was still weak, and thin, and pale; and both my vanity and my indolence found their profit in the solitary existence which I was leading. The London season was, however, no sooner at an end, than Lady Madelaine hastened on the wings of maternal tenderness to the retreat of her invalid daughter; but it was to me a consolation to reflect, in my moments of bitterness, that the sacrifice was considerably lessened by the fact that she brought in her train a score of dear friends, all anxious, like herself, to replace the noise and smoke of town by the luxurious villegiatura of a well-appointed country-house.

Had I been weighed down by no latent grief, it is possible that nothing would have been more agreeable for me than the movement of the gay and reckless crowd by which I was suddenly surrounded; but their hollow and heartless trifling offered no remedy to my diseased and unsettled mind. At first I found it difficult to sustain so extreme a change. I was compelled to restrain my tears, to stifle my sighs, and to appear as free from care and from anxiety as themselves. I had not forgotten the indifference with which Lady Madelaine had made my love for Devereux the common theme of herself and her associates; and, thanks to the comments of these same individuals upon others of their acquaintance, I required no prompting to understand at once how much my peculiar position placed me in their power. I knew that, married while yet a mere girl, and contrary to my own inclinations, I should be an object of curiosity and speculation to all the high-born idlers among whom I was thus thrown into constant companionship; that I should be scrutinized, and criticised, and not always in the kindest spirit; and that I must keep an incessant watch, not only over my words and actions, but over my very thoughts.

Fortunately the constraint which I deprecated proved salutary to me; by dint of endeavoring to delude others, I ended by deceiving myself; by doubting if I had not exaggerated my trials; and whether dissipation and self-indulgence might not overcome the vapors by which I had so long suffered myself to be oppressed.

I resolved to solve the problem, and I succeeded. My melancholy would have experienced no sympathy; my satisfied vanity and ready partnership in pleasure made me welcome to every one. I became gradually less inclined, even when alone, to indulge in those long fits of weeping which dimmed my eyes and clouded my complexion; I found myself speculating upon my probable success in such or such a dress; endeavoring to recall certain words and looks of admiration which had been directed toward me during the preceding day; in short, although I occasionally sighed, partly from real regret, and partly from long-acquired habit, my woman-nature was once more thoroughly aroused; and although I am quite sure that I never should have been induced to make the acknowldgement, I was comparatively happy. The image of Devereux was not obliterated, but it had become much less distinct. The letters of Sir James were no longer a mere matter of course, but a necessary ingredient of my existence. They were filled with comments upon my own beauty and attractions; and they kept my vanity, and consequently my amiability, at the culminating point. On their receipt I regularly communicated them to Lady Madelaine; not from any principle of deference or duty—I do not wish to affect a virtue which I did not possess—but in order that she might see and understand the price at which my personal merits were held by the husband upon whom she had compelled me to bestow them.

My good-humor returned; my accomplishments were once more exerted for the amusement of my mother's guests; I was declared to be more charming than ever, and Sir James the happiest of men, who could never be sufficiently grateful for the concession I had made. All this was charming. Lady Madelaine, adopting the tone of her company, was kind, and even confidential; Lord Otterford gallant and attentive. I was the lion of the house. No wonder that I rapidly regained my health, and, as a natural consequence, the freshness and beauty of which my previous languor had deprived me.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

I was awakened one morning by the unusually abrupt entrance of Joséphine.

"You have disturbed me," I said somewhat impatiently; "are there any letters?"

"No, miladi," answered the soubrette, unmoved by my pettishness; "but Sir James has just arrived, and I thought it my duty to inform miladi at once."

I ought not to have felt surprised; he had already informed me of the period of his return, but the effect of her words was painful. My feelings were so contradictory, so various, that I could not disentangle them. I tried to believe that I rejoiced at his advent; it terminated my singular state of bridal widowhood, and emancipated me altogether from my mother's authority; but still I could not conceal from myself that I had wilfully closed my eyes to its occurrence, and would gladly have deferred it. Fortunately for me, Lady Madelaine, conscious of the part which she had acted, suspected something of the truth, and contrived that I should have ample time to recover my self-possession.

My first meeting with Dornton took place in my dressing-room. He was all rapture and affection. He had succeeded perfectly in the business which took him to Ireland; and only returned, as he declared, to find me a thousand times more lovely than when we parted. My mother soon broke in upon our interview; she had never been more welcome. She congratulated Sir James upon the recovery of a property supposed to be lost to him; insisted upon his thanks for the care which she had taken of his melancholy little wife; and finally regretted that the influx of visitors at Woodville had driven away Miss Dornton; who departed to her country lodging, laden with a costly diamond ring, upon which she evidently set not the slightest value, and an embrace as cold as the jewel. I parted from her, as I had met her, without a sigh.

I was somewhat startled to hear that a large party were to meet at Woodville that very day, in honor of Dornton's return, when our marriage was to be publicly announced. The intelligence was evidently welcome to him; but it was far less so to me. After the agitation occasioned by his return, I should have preferred the comparative quiet of our home-circle. There was, however, no alternative, and I accordingly submitted with the best grace I could assume; only stipulating that, until the dinner-bell had rung, I should be permitted to remain undisturbed in my own apartments. As this arrangement also excluded Sir James, I had to combat for a while his lover-like expostulations; but as Lady Madelaine, anxious that I should appear to advantage, which she well knew could not be the case if my temper were too sorely tried, condescended to second my wishes, I soon dismissed him to the guests, and sat down to ponder in solitude over the trying position in which I was about to be placed, before the unsympathizing circle which had been gathered together at Woodville.

The first person upon whom my eyes fell, as I entered the dining-room on the arm of Sir James, was Mr. Curties; and I felt confused and disconcerted as he advanced to greet me. My delicacy was, however, palpably mistimed, for the worthy member for —— was as calm, as stiff, as rectangular as ever. He even smiled as he glanced from me to Dornton, and uttered a few words of congratulation. I was lost in amazement! I did not possess the solution of the riddle, and I was deeply mortified. This man, according to Lady Madelaine, had loved me, or at least, had been dazzled by my attractions, and under the influence of such feelings had sought my hand and been rejected; yet now, only a few months later, as if to convince me of the transitory effect of my personal merits, he met me as another's bride, with a smile about his lips, and a compliment upon his tongue. What a lesson did this appear to be to my vanity and self-love!

The annoyance was, however, soon forgotten in the flattering comments and congratulations of the other guests, among whom I was glad to remark the good rector and his pretty daughter, who was duly adorned with her bridal pearls. I could not forbear, even thus publicly, pressing my lips to her bright cheek, which crimsoned with delight; while Sir James, who appeared determined to discover a compliment to himself in every one of my actions, paid me back my courtesy by raising my hand to his lips. I could not forbear, from time to time, during the dinner, which to me seemed painfully protracted, glancing at Mr. Curties, in order to discover if he preserved his equanimity. I saw not the slightest change. He ate and drank in perfect composure, and occasionally condescended to address a remark to Miss Grenval, who sat beside him evidently in awe. There was not one symptom of uneasiness to console my ruffled vanity. It was altogether inexplicable.

The devotion of Dornton knew no bounds. He seemed to challenge the envy and congratulations of all around him. He thanked me in the most gallant manner for the magnificent toilet which I had made upon what he was pleased to call our wedding-day, affecting to forget that a woman finds such a duty at all times both easy and pleasant; and as both my mother and Lord Otterford were equally complimentary on the subject of my appearance, I was glad to be convinced that my dressing-glass had not deceived me.

For the first time I felt that I had attained the object of my earliest ambition; I divided the suffrages of the circle with Lady Madelaine; and I had, moreover, the triumph of knowing that I had even over her the advantages of greater youth and greater novelty. I was no longer flattered and pampered as a beautiful child; I had taken my position in society, and my success must be henceforth based upon my womanly qualities. I thought not once of Devereux throughout the evening. The incense that was so profusely offered at my shrine oppressed my brain, and centred all my feelings in self. The past and future were alike shrouded in vapor, and I lived only in the present.

The whole of the evening, until the departure of such of our guests as resided in the neighborhood, was occupied in music, and in the examination of the numerous and costly marriage presents which were awaiting me in the saloon. In vain did I volunteer my services at the harp, and my voice in a trio: neither Sir James nor Lady Madelaine would permit me to use so much exertion in my invalid state. I had suddenly awakened in a new world—in a sort of gilded Utopia! So I remained throned upon my sofa, playing with the jewels and toys scattered around me, content to look and listen to the performances of those whose health was, for the moment, tacitly understood to be less valuable than my own.

We remained the whole summer at Woodville; but I had not been a bride more than a few months when I expressed to Lady Madelaine the desire which I felt to pay a visit to my sister.

"What will Sir James think of so strange a whim?" she asked drily.

"Do you, then, consider it extraordinary," I demanded in my turn, "that I should wish to see Adela after the change which has taken place in my situation? You are aware, madam, that I endeavored to induce her to become my guest, which, for some reason of which I am ignorant, she declined. I confess that I felt deeply hurt, but still I cannot forget that she is my sister, and that, in her present exile, she may well expect so simple a courtesy from me."

"Your delicacy is somewhat wire-drawn, Eveleen," retorted Lady Madelaine; "however, you are yet a bride, and must, consequently, I suppose, be indulged in your caprices. Fortunately, the long and fatiguing journey to Rooksley will be spared, for Adela has been for the last few weeks the inhabitant of my villa at Putney."

"And why was so simple a circumstance kept secret from me?"

"Because it grew out of a speculation of a graver nature. Because Adela had just conceived one of those extraordinary whims which cannot be explained by any rational argument, but to which, young as she is, she adheres with a tenacity that my will has entirely failed to weaken: and as, I confess to you, the fatigue of so wretched a contention is greater than I am willing to encounter, I have at last consented to yield—under certain restrictions."

How well I recognized the iron nature of my sister in this immutability of purpose.

"And what, then, is this strange fancy?" I asked eagerly.

Lady Madelaine shrugged her shoulders. "In the first place, I believe you are not yet aware that the relative who inherited the title and estates of my poor father has formed the somewhat Quixotic project of disencumbering the property of certain rather extensive mortgages; and, in aid of this endeavor, finding that his obligations both as a peer and a landlord were greater than he wished to encounter, he purposes to live abroad with all his family for the next few years, and to let the castle during that time, retaining the land under the superintendence of a bailiff. Now, Miss Adela Tilden, having, as it has since appeared, through the medium of Lady Flora, been in correspondence with the earl, and ascertained that to one of his own connections, who will, of course, appear only as his guest, he will cede Glenfillan Castle at a very small rent, has, child as she is, been continually, from the period of your betrothal, when she found that all chance of your returning to reside at Rooksley was at an end, importuning me to hire the place, and to allow her to make it her home, under the guardianship of Lady Flora."

"Her home!" I exclaimed, aghast; "can she seriously ask you to allow her to bury herself alive at her age in so remote a spot? Does she forget that there will be a long future, and that her proper home, while she remains unmarried, is under the roof of her mother?"

"I have both said and written all that and much more," coldly replied Lady Madelaine, "but I made no impression upon her stubborn nature. She answered I know not what—that I had never been a mother to her—that she should never have a home while it was called mine—that she had lived for years without the affection of her family, and that she had now ceased to wish for it. In short, you can understand her style of reasoning."

I could, indeed.

"Nevertheless," pursued my mother, perceiving that I continued silent, "I still refused to listen to her—"

"Of course; you could not do otherwise. The project was absurd and impracticable—I am almost tempted to say insane!"

"And yet, Lady Dornton, there are circumstances—"

"Oh, no, no; it is impossible that any circumstances, however stringent, could justify so monstrous an arrangement. Had she been five years younger, although such an exile must have condemned her to comparative ignorance, still her bodily health might have been pleaded as a reason for so extreme a step; but now—at the precise period when she should be introduced into the world, in which she will soon be called to play her part—"

"Allow me to interrupt you in my turn at this point of your argument," said Lady Madelaine. "You are just touching upon the circumstance which I was about to explain. How will you laugh, Eveleen—you, young, rich, courted, and beloved, when I tell you that the mere girl who calls you sister, and who shares or might share, all your advantages, save, indeed, as regards beauty, firmly believes that she has taken the world in abhorrence—or rather, to follow her own text more closely—that she holds it in contempt; and when I even went so far as to hint that I might possibly, in a few months, when I had seen you fairly settled at the head of your own establishment, call her to town, and give her every advantage of which she is susceptible, she peremptorily declared that she would never be taken to London alive, to be introduced to the frivolous and heartless society of what was called the fashionable world—that it was not made for her, nor she for it, and that, consequently, she put it to myself whether she should not be less obnoxious to me and less burdensome to herself at Glenfillan than at Rooksley."

"She must be mad!" I murmured, unconsciously.

"Perhaps so. At all events, she is incomprehensible. Nothing will bend her will. Sick of the struggle, as I have already told you, I have at last yielded, and she is at present at Putney with Lady Flora, making purchases of spelling-books and grammars for a school which she is to found, and committing sundry other follies of the same description. As I have declined all farther interference with so impracticable a young lady, I have offered neither comment nor hindrance to her last request that she may be allowed to proceed to Scotland early in the ensuing month."

"I must lose no time, then, in reaching Putney," I said, involuntarily rising from my chair, as though preparing to depart on the instant.

"Resume your seat," said Lady Madelaine, calmly motioning me again to her side. "Are you quite sure that Adela partakes your eagerness for this meeting? Do you feel satisfied that you will be a welcome visitor?"

"Why should I doubt it? I have never injured my sister."

Lady Madelaine bit her lip, and for a moment appeared disconcerted; but she soon conquered the feeling, from whatever impulse it arose, and continued, with an arch smile: "You know the Italian proverb—

'Chi cerca quel che non dovrebbe
Trova quel che non vorrebbe:'

however, I will make no attempt to dissuade you from your purpose. One thing, nevertheless, you must remember, Eveleen—"

"What can prevent my performance of what I now consider actually as a duty?" I exclaimed; "who can say, even young as we both are, that we may ever meet again?"

"I repeat, Lady Dornton, that in so far as I am concerned, I advance no objection to your wish; but you are quite forgetting that you have a husband, and that he may not approve of your repeating your advances to a younger sister, by whom they have already been repulsed."

"Sir James object!" I retorted, with all the scorn of a spoiled beauty; "oh, no; that is, indeed, improbable: I am by no means prepared for any such opposition."

"Possibly; and yet such things are."

"Not in a case like mine. I assuredly did not become the wife of Sir James Dornton to be consigned once more to the nursery. I shall request him to be ready to accompany me to town the day after to-morrow."

"To town!" echoed the voice of my husband, who at the instant entered the room; "do I hear the fair and fashionable Lady Dornton threatening to go up to town, when no one is to be seen there but drapers and dustmen!"

"Why, not precisely, not completely, not avowedly," I answered in the same gay tone; "my fair and fashionable ladyship contemplates only the negative enormity of Putney, to visit her somewhat moonstruck sister, and to endeavor, by a less adventurous journey than that of Orlando, to win back her wits again."

I expected at least a smile in reward of my banter, but, to my extreme surprise, as I raised my eyes to meet it, I saw Sir James exchange an alarmed and rapid glance with my mother, while for a moment the blood forsook his cheek and lips. Lady Madelaine, however, was as calm as ever. She had not been taken by surprise.

"Is it not a wild whim?" she asked, with a smile.

"But Eveleen will not persist;" and he began playfully to smooth down my ringlets.

"Do not mistake me, Sir James," I said, perfectly restored to seriousness; "I feel that I ought to see my sister before she leaves England. She is not happy—"

"Not happy?"

"Assuredly not, or she never would have formed so extreme a resolution. She does not understand what she so lightly rejects. I am resolved to use the influence I possess—"

"The influence you possess!"

"Even so; not only in dissuading her from a project so extravagant, but also by inducing her to confide to me—"

"Confide to you!"

"Really, Sir James," I exclaimed, rather pettishly, "one would imagine that we were rehearsing a scene from Othello: you echo all my words."

"And no wonder," said my mother, coming skilfully to the rescue; "Dornton, knowing what he does of Adela, may well be astonished on hearing you talk of possessing an influence over her, and of inducing her to make you her confidant."

"I am, indeed, thoroughly amazed," acquiesced Sir James; "for I believed her to be utterly invulnerable to either advice or sympathy."

I was not satisfied with this well-acted explanation. It was evident that there was some mystery connected with the removal of my sister, which was to remain a secret from me. I even suspected that it was not voluntary, but had grown out of the scarcely-disguised and invincible dislike which I had long known Lady Madelaine to entertain toward her. All that had passed, therefore, only the more firmly determined me not to yield. I could derive no advantage from this concession to my sister's pride, and of this she must be aware. I was consequently, not without hope that this consideration on my part might, indeed, induce her to unbend, and to explain to me her real motives for so strange a resolution as that which I had just heard attributed to her own free will. Judging from my own experience, I knew that there were moments in which the heart was relieved by imparting its grief; might this not be her case now, when she was on the eve of separation from her family? The mystification which I had detected irritated and disheartened me; I felt as though it involved a return of the mental vassalage that I loathed, and I pledged myself to my own heart to be on this occasion as firm as Adela herself.

"You will accompany me, Sir James?" I said, suddenly, in a tone completely devoid of doubt.

"I regret that it will be utterly impossible for me to do so," answered my husband, in an accent as decided as my own, "and in that fact, my sweet Eveleen, lies the whole secret of my annoyance at your project."

"I thought that you were an idle man, with no more serious business on hand than that of obliging your wife."

"Would that it were so; but that vile Irish affair 'drags its slow length along,' and will admit of no neglect on my part just at present."

"Fortunately," I said, considerably provoked, "I am no coward. With my own maid, and a couple of men-servants, I shall be perfectly and correctly attended."

"Eveleen," exclaimed Sir James, "not for ten thousand worlds would I consent to such a scheme."

"You shall not be asked to do so," said my mother; "I will accompany Lady Dornton."

He thanked her somewhat gravely, for he evidently desired that the journey should be abandoned altogether. He complained of my coldness in leaving him to visit a sister who had never shown me the slightest affection; talked of the ungenial season, and my recent illness; in short, tried all means of altering my resolution, but without effect. Had not my suspicions been aroused, he would probably have succeeded; but, as it was, his multiplied objections only strengthened my purpose. My pride revolted when it whispered that, in some way or other, I had been made a dupe.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

I DID not thoroughly recover my temper until I found myself in the carriage which was to convey my mother and myself to Putney. During the brief interval which had elapsed between making the arrangement and seeing it realized, Sir James had exhausted himself in affectionate attentions, which I received coldly and with suspicion; for I at once discovered that he still entertained the hope of changing my resolution. I felt like a mariner about to explore an unknown shoal; and I looked to my sister to supply the sounding-line.

Once in the carriage, even before we had left the grounds, and while the touch of Dornton's lips was still warm upon my cheek, I recovered my equanimity, and commenced a conversation with Lady Madelaine, by sincerely thanking her for the consideration which had induced her to become my companion; a concession to which I was the more sensible, as my husband had failed to emulate it.

"You are unreasonable to expect so much, Eveleen," she said in reply. "Men detest the lachrymosities of soi-disant broken-hearted young ladies; and Sir James, charming as he is, is nevertheless only mortal."

"But if Adela be, as you imply, broken-hearted, you must surely also be aware of the cause of her sorrow."

"A purely false deduction. I only know that she has succeeded in making her very name odious to me; and that I shall rejoice when I know that she is safely housed at Glenfillan."

"How long ago was it, did you say, since she first made the request?"

"Several months; I really forget the precise period; it was about the commencement of your illness."

"At the time of my betrothal?"

"Somewhat later; and it was to endeavor to make her hear reason, that I urged on your marriage, and left you so abruptly at Woodville. Instead of proceeding at once to town, Lord Otterford and myself traveled to Rooksley, ill-affected as I was toward such a journey; and as I found that nothing but coercion would enable me to overcome her wishes, and that I did not possess the slightest authority over her, unless I condescended to have recourse to force, we decided that she must be treated like an embryo-lunatic as she is, and indulged in her whim until she herself wearies of it. Having come to this determination, Lord Otterford consented to remain a week at Rooksley, while Lady Flora and her amiable charge made their parting arrangements, in order that they might have his protection upon the road; and, as their domestication in Grosvenor Square during the season was of course not to be thought of, we decided upon settling them at Putney until their departure for Scotland."

"You think, then, that it is a mere temporary caprice?"

"I judge like a rational being, and cannot imagine otherwise."

"It is, at least, very singular," I remarked, "that such an extraordinary circumstance should never have been mentioned to me. Has no one, save yourself and Lord Otterford, been made acquainted with it?"

"You must have seen that it was known to Sir James."

"Ah, true! it was evidently no secret to him; and may I ask if he favored your compliance with the wishes of my sister?"

"He very properly declined to offer any opinion whatever upon the subject."

"And Lord Otterford?"

"Very naturally felt with, and for me; as did all the friends whom I considered it expedient to consult. It would, as a matter of course, have been named to you, had I not been anxious, during your illness, to save you from annoyance of every description; and subsequently also, but that I thought it likely to throw a gloom over your meeting with your husband."

"How was it calculated to do this, and why should it produce such an effect?" I asked, earnestly.

"On my honor, Lady Dornton, vous excédez!" exclaimed my mother pettishly; "you catechise like the teacher of a Sunday-school, and seem to forget that my nerves are not made of iron. Pray let me sleep off the irritating effects of our abrupt and uninteresting dialogue. Believe me, your sister will soon convince you that she is not worthy of such a waste of words."

Of course I was silenced, for I still stood in too much awe of Lady Madelaine to brave her displeasure; and although I felt convinced that she only sought to avoid an explanation, I was, consequently, compelled to content myself throughout the remainder of the journey with the companionship of my own thoughts; for while we were upon the road, she perseveringly 'ept, or affected to sleep; and when we alighted, she flung herself into an attitude of languor which rendered her altogether unapproachable.

Contrary to my expectations, Lady Madelaine 'd not drive at once to Putney, but ordered the arriage on to town; and as the dismantled ansion in Grosvenor Square was naturally out of the question, we alighted at a fashionable, out now nearly deserted hotel, whence a messenger was dispatched to inform my sister of our arrival, and our intention of visiting her on the morrow.

When I awoke on the following morning, a feeling of positive sickness crept over me! How would Adela, indeed, receive my visit? and what was I about to learn? With my usual cowardice, I even began to regret that I had subjected myself to the trial; but, nevertheless, I, after some time, found strength in my curiosity, and resolved to conceal my emotion from Lady Madelaine, lest she should take advantage of my folly, and compel me to return to Woodville unsatisfied.

Having come to this doughty resolution, I took unusual interest in the adjustment of my plain but costly morning-dress, aware that there is a prestige about a labored toilet, which is never without its effect upon the young. When this frivolous care was at length over, I amused myself by arranging in a small casket a few fashionable trinkets which I had selected as my marriage gift to my sister; and I was still engaged in so doing, when Lady Madelaine entered the room.

"For whom are you preparing those presents?" she asked, as her eye fell upon the ornaments.

"For my sister."

"It is useless," she said gravely; "Miss Tilden is too high-minded to find pleasure in such toys: do not draw down an affront upon yourself."

"Surely I need apprehend no insult where I mean only kindness?"

"Do as you will—take them in your hand; you will be the most proper judge of the expediency of suggesting their acceptance."

I was already half convinced that it would be useless. I knew how easily my sister's pride was roused; and, with a sigh of regret, I silently consigned them once more to my dressing-case, and followed Lady Madelaine down stairs.

Not a word passed between us, until we reached Putney. I was all dread, curiosity, and agitation, and in no mood for conversation; while my mother had doubtlessly her own memories to occupy her thoughts.

Despite all the coldness with which she had treated me since we parted, my sister, when she entered the room on our arrival, was so pale, so wasted, and so changed, that I could not control my emotion, and the tears streamed from my eyes.

"Are you weeping over me, Lady Dornton?" she asked calmly. "You are fortunate if you can afford to weep for others."

"Oh, Adela, why have you urged Lady Madelaine to allow your banishment?" I exclaimed, as I seized her hand; "I have but just learned the unwelcome news of this intended departure; and even now can scarcely credit that it is in compliance with your own wish."

"Why should you not believe it?" and as she spoke, she seated herself quietly beside me; "you are not ignorant that the human heart is subject to extraordinary changes."

I felt the point of the remark, and my cheek flushed. Lady Madelaine, who saw that I was hurt, addressed some commonplace observation to my sister, who made a brief reply, and a pause to me more painful than even the most bitter sarcasm ensued. I could not speak. Adela sat in silence, as if awaiting the purport of a visit which she had evidently not desired; and my mother threw herself back upon her sofa, and closed her eyes. The spell was at length, however, broken by Lady Madelaine herself, who, wearied by the constraint to which she had for a moment submitted, suddenly rose, declaring that she had some directions to give to Lady Flora.

This was, as I thought, the crisis of my fate. I was dying to interrogate Adela, and trembling at the idea of being questioned in my turn.

We were no sooner alone than my sister turned upon me a long and searching look which seemed to penetrate my very heart.

"Are you happy?" she asked abruptly.

"I have submitted to circumstances, and my reason tells me to deduce what profit I may from my submission.'

"Answer me more frankly—are you happy?"

"Yes—almost—at least I am not otherwise."

"Sir James loves you then!"

"Devotedly; of that, at least, I am convinced."

"And you?"

"Me!—I—"

"Why do you hesitate? Does not the husband whom you have chosen appear to justify your affection?"

I was perfectly unprepared for such an attack as this, and knew not with what arms to repel it. The difficulty roused my temper, and anger lent me courage. Not only did I acknowledge the love which I believed that I felt for Dornton, but I exaggerated his good qualities, and the devotion and self-abnegation which he had displayed in the indulgence of all my tastes and wishes. I was almost eloquent.

"Spare me the details of his perfections," said my sister impatiently, when I at length paused for breath; "you are excusable. Moreover, my opinion is already formed."

Again we were silent. My eyes were riveted upon the floor, while my sister's wandered over the apartment, evidently unconscious of every object on which they looked. I was in agony. The opportunity which I had offered to her sarcasms was so tempting that I every instant anticipated she would overwhelm me by some bitter allusion to Devereux, it was, therefore, necessary that I should take advantage of her silence, in order to prevent it; and I compelled myself to make the effort.

"My dear Adela," I said, "we are for a moment alone; we may soon be disturbed; do not, then, think me abrupt if, without further preface, I beg of you to relieve me from a painful suspicion. Explain to me, I entreat, the true reason of this exile to which you are about to be condemned. Can it be that our mother has compelled you to it?"

"Our mother!" she exclaimed scornfully. "Do you indeed so utterly misunderstand me as to believe that I shall ever act upon compulsion?"

"I do not misunderstand you, Adela; but I know that even the strongest resolutions are sometimes rendered nugatory by a will still more absolute."

"Ha! you imagined that such was my case."

"I did."

"You reasoned upon your own experience; nothing could be more natural. Nevertheless, you were wrong, as you will ever be when you try my actions by the same test. Lady Madelaine has employed no authority to induce what you have somewhat romantically termed my 'exile;' on the contrary, I decided on the step which I am about to take at the moment when your life was considered to be in imminent danger, and when, consequently, my determined estrangement from my mother would have rendered her morally, if not actually, childless; and her remonstrances were comparatively vehement."

"I am lost in wonder!" I said dejectedly; "how unjust have I been in accusing Lady Madelaine of the sacrifice to which you have wilfully consigned yourself."

"There are sacrifices of all kinds," was the reply; "that which I have made is assuredly not the contemplated sojourn in Scotland."

"Can I, in any way, or by any exertion, induce you to abandon your design?"

"No."

"I seem to be surrounded by mystery. Oh, Adela, I beseech you—"

"To do what? To explain to you my motives? Never. My secret is my own, and shall remain so, until—in short, in my turn, I entreat you to respect it—Learn it when you will, you must repent the knowledge."

"Be it what it may," I retorted vehemently, "I condemn it. You have overrated your strength. The existence which, as a girl, was tolerable and even pleasant, will, at your present age, wither you by its hopeless monotony."

"I should have judged so once; but I then mistook my true means of happiness."

"Happiness! Do you hope to find it at Glenfillan?"

"I shall find what I seek; the only benefit which can henceforward avail me."

The words of my sister were so obscure, that they only increased my curiosity. I redoubled my efforts to induce her to confide in me, but she was impenetrable, and at length lost her temper.

"You are indelicate, Eveleen," she said, haughtily; "why do you harass me with entreaties, when I have declared that they will be unavailing?"

"I will do so no longer, since you do not consider me worthy of your confidence; but let me at least entreat you not to take so serious a step without earnestly considering what may, and indeed must be its effect upon the whole of your future life. You know nothing of the world, or of its pleasures; you are ignorant of the happiness of loving and being beloved, save in theory—and remember what bright visions you used to evoke—"

"Enough!" she said sternly; "I want no advice; and even were it otherwise, you are the last person to whom I should apply for counsel."

As all my expressions had been affectionate as well as earnest, I felt offended by the tone which my sister had assumed; and had not Lady Madelaine at that precise moment returned, accompanied by the happy Lady Flora, who walked into the room as though she were already treading upon heather, I fear this so much desired interview with my sister would have terminated in anger on both sides. Our mutual agitation did not escape my mother, and she appeared uneasy and irresolute, when I rose, and proposed that we should return to town. She offered no opposition, however, and with a cold embrace, and hearts more estranged than ever, Adela and I parted.

We had no sooner left the villa than Lady Madelaine, with an anxiety which she vainly strove to conceal, hastened to inquire what could be the nature of the conversation which I had held with my sister, and by which we had both evidently been so much moved; I told her frankly.

"Why did you persist in so thankless an interference?" she asked, impatiently; "pray, permit Miss Tilden to make herself ridiculous in her own way, since she has determined to do so. Setting aside the consideration that your fortune may, hereafter, be greatly benefited by her obstinacy, there are a thousand other reasons which must make her wrong-headedness advantageous to you. Do you not yet understand that your sister's disposition, tastes, and prejudices are all calculated to annoy and injure you, were you to mix in the same society? I will even warn you, moreover, that private conversations, such as this for which lately you were so eager, and which has only tended to wound and exasperate your feelings, can conduce to no favorable result; and are only calculated to produce very disagreeable effects. You will be wise to avoid them for the future, whenever you are flung together, and to make the most of the brilliant position you have secured, without troubling yourself with the sickly fancies of an ungracious girl."

I was quite in the mood to believe that she was right; and I accordingly pledged myself to follow her advice, and to leave Adela to her discontent. The alternative was, at least, an easy one; and the rapture of Sir James on my return to Woodville assisted me wonderfully in the effort.

It was really, therefore, from curiosity at the moment, and not from any lingering remnant of affection, that I one day inquired what had become of Devereux; and as a proof of the perfect composure with which I was able to put the question, I addressed it to my husband, who, with the tact and taste which did him honor, answered as calmly as myself. He had just obtained promotion in his regiment, and was extremely zealous in his military duties, to the great edification of Sir Herbert, and the amusement of his mother. I received the intelligence coldly enough, for I still felt sufficient interest in him to be piqued by his marked and studious neglect; and to experience a little bitterness at the thought that his love for me had been superseded by the poor vanity of rising in his profession. Nevertheless, I rejoiced to perceive that it did not affect my feelings; and my heart bounded as it whispered that I conquered a weakness, for which his fickleness now made me blush.

His fickleness! How amusing are the one-sided judgments of those who will only see one phase of a question! I accused Devereux of fickleness—I who had become the wife of another man, and, moreover, of the very man whom I had long professed alike to dislike and to despise. I knew that Lady Madelaine had closed her doors against him, and I was still her guest; and yet I accused Devereux of fickleness, even after I had parted from him with an injunction to forget me, which my marriage had since rendered imperative.

A few weeks after our return to Woodville, Lady Madelaine and Lord Otterford proceeded to town, in order to expedite the departure of Lady Flora and my sister; but on this occasion, I made no proposal to bear them company. On the contrary, when my mother inquired my intention on the subject, I declared my distaste to another interview with Adela. And as Sir James had thoroughly reasoned and rallied me out of all my suspicions of mystification, and declared his willingness to remain at Woodville until I should desire to follow my mother, I saw her depart with thankfulness that so ungracious a task was spared to me.

A fortnight flew rapidly by. Sir James was all animation and amiability, and exerted himself as strenuously for my amusement as though he lived to no other purpose. I began to exonerate my mother, and to believe that she had guided me aright; but, nevertheless, I occasionally sighed for a wider field of action; nor, as I had reason to suspect, was Dornton altogether indifferent to the same advantage. He never addressed a compliment to me, and he was not sparing of them, but it terminated by an assurance of the effect which I should produce in town, or an expression of curiosity as to how the rivalry of my beauty—and such beauty—would be borne by the blasées belles of the last two seasons. At length on one occasion, I ventured to say timidly—

"Why should we not essay the experiment?"

"Are you serious, Eveleen?"

"Pourquoi pas? I imagine that we cannot remain at Woodville forever."

"I am glad that you have made the observation, dearest," replied Dornton, eagerly; "I will confess to you that it is irksome to me. In short, it is not home. We have not yet tasted the delights of home, Eveleen."

"You are right. We will only remain in Grosvenor Square while we decide upon a house; and then, Sir James, we will assert our independence and emancipate ourselves."

"Admirably decided! And when shall we put our project into execution?"

"Now—this moment, if you wish it."

"Nay, nay, not so fast," laughed Dornton "we must first acquaint Lady Madelaine with our intention, and name to her the precise day on which she may expect us."

"So be it. Let me see—this is Saturday. Tell her that we will be with her on Thursday."

"Suffer me to suggest an amendment, and to propose that we should say Friday; not that we will leave Woodville the later, but we may make two days of the journey. I cannot bear that you should arrive in town, pale and worn with fatigue. Will you oblige me in this?"

I could not reasonably object, and it was consequently so arranged. We made our few parting visits in the neighborhood; and on the Thursday, at noon, bade farewell to the scene of our honeymoon. I was not, however, inclined to be sentimental on that subject. London was before me, with the admiration of the men and the envy of the women. Visions of splendor and triumph rose brightly in the distance; I was about to commence a new life. I undoubtedly talked an infinity of nonsense on the subject of the future; but Sir James was too well-bred to allow me to suspect that he perceived it. How differently did I now perform the journey, which, when I had been accompanied by my mother, was full of tediousness and ennui. I only wonder, when I look back, how my spirits sustained themselves throughout so many hours without flagging for an instant. Dornton looked at me in astonishment. He had never before seen me in such a mood; and he was evidently pleased by my animation, and the effect which it produced upon my appearance. Nevertheless, at the conclusion of the day's journey, I congratulated myself upon the prudence and forethought of my husband, for I was fairly exhausted by my exertions; and while Sir James was still deprecating the insufficiency of the arrangements which had been made for my accommodation, I fell asleep, only to renew in my dreams the bright fancies that had sustained me throughout the day.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

The period of marriage is the one great epoch of a woman's life. It is a condensation of courteous deceit and flattering promise, which require months, and sometimes even years, to annihilate their effects. Custom has ordained that every man should commence his wedded career by a tissue of self-abnegation and devotedness, of which the sex is utterly incapable for any length of time; while the world, never slow to claim its share in any glozing cheat, helps on the illusion of the bride by a species of general and gracious worship, which, just as it wanes to a close, has become necessary to the happiness of its idol, who seldom fails to discover, amid the intoxication of the incense, that its fumes are directed elsewhere. Custom has timed the duration of the sacrifice; and when, at the close of the given period, the bride has degenerated into the wife, the prestige ceases—the married dame is no longer more than a mere unit in the great sum total of the wor'd, and she is quietly handed down from her pedestal to make way for a new victim.

These are trite truths; but they, nevertheless, deserve more and deeper reflection than are commonly accorded to them. How many women, during their period of courtship, stop short in all their anticipations of the future, at the indulgences, and triumphs, and congratulations of the honeymoon! How many wilfully close their eyes to the long years which are to succeed it! It is the fashion to smile, and nod, and felicitate the poor, inexperienced, self-deluded girl who is about to commit matrimony, however ill-advised her selection may appear to her acquaintance. Beyond the pale of her own family, it is rare indeed that she possesses one friend gifted with sufficient moral courage to bid her pause. She might find a warning against any other imprudence; but who would counsel an acquaintance not to marry? A marriage is a feast for the idle gossipry of the circle in which it takes place, and what trifler would destroy its own aliment for so puerile a reason as that of urging prudence upon the party from whom it is to be derived? We have no right to expect so Utopian a sacrifice from the butterflies who, as they cannot live without sunshine, so they care little whence it comes; and the effect of all this folly and false feeling is fatal to its object, who has neither opportunity nor inclination to recollect that the smiling flatterers, who seek only their own amusement in an event which must affect the after-happiness of her whole life, would, although they gladly participate in the festivities of the marriage feast, not waste one hour of their own existence in sharing her sorrows or her tears.

I have often thought that marriage resembled a sky-rocket. How brilliantly and aspiringly it commences, grasping another element in its ascent, as though this flat, dull earth could not content its aspirations, nor afford space for its display; then how dazzlingly it blazes for a moment; and, that moment past, how, one by one, its starlike fires go out, until at length, down-tumbling, dark, and dangerous, falls back all that is left of the false meteor, a few floating ashes and a smoking stick.

Perhaps it is well that young people should not look so gravely upon realities as their elders, for they naturally hunger and thirst for the pleasant things of the world, and might turn away with disgust at its very threshold, were they at once to lift the covers of the tempting banquet spread out before them, and discover that, as at the table of the Barmecide, they were bidden to a feast of empty dishes. I am only quarreling with those who unnecessarily deepen their delusion, and thus render their after-experience more bitter.

In my case I had certainly been spared all idle and anticipatory comments. I had completed a sacrifice, not volunteered a folly; but I was not doomed to escape the after-delusion to which I have alluded. Every bride, situated as I was in the world, must necessarily commence her married career brilliantly; and, moreover, the novelty of my position, the comparative freedom of action, the feeling, or the belief that I was beloved, the natural clingingness of my disposition, the chimera of independence, and the consciousness of increased importance, all naturally tended to impress me favorably toward the individual to whom I was indebted for these advantages. Dornton, moreover, was beside me, anticipating every thought and wish, and blending his own image with every picture of my newly-awakened fancy.

I have said how patiently he encouraged my wild, and, no doubt, unreasonable anticipations, and I was grateful to him for his show of sympathy in my feelings; to me such sympathy was as new as it was welcome. Herein, at least, he had an advantage over Devereux, who had possessed no opportunity of displaying a similar deference to my tastes and wishes; and this fact, coupled with the consciousness that all farther struggle was useless, now that I was irrevocably his wife, helped the cause of Sir James better than a score of arguments. I had been cowed and crossed so long, that I panted to be free and to be happy; and, as I had not yet heard the clanking of the fetters which I had so lately assisted to rivet, so I willingly nursed myself in the belief that the burden would be light, and might even prove ultimately rather a pleasure than a trammel. In short, who cannot guess the hopes and the feelings of a weak and vain young heart, panting for admiration and for liberty?

It was dusk in the evening of the second day after our departure from Woodville, when we reached town; the lamps were already lighted, and the tall dark avenues of houses appeared gigantic in the closing light. I leaned eagerly from the window of the carriage, and inhaled the murky atmosphere with delight. This was to be the arena of my conquests, the theatre of my triumphs. My heart bounded with delight. Suddenly the carriage stopped, and Sir James sprang out and lifted me with great care into the house, whose open door seemed to invite our entrance; but in the hall I paused, for I did not recognize the objects before me. Strange servants, in a livery which was not familiar to me, were busied in receiving us, and the staircase toward which Dornton led me was equally unknown.

"Where are we?" I asked, anxiously; "and why do we not go at once to my mother's?"

"We are at home, sweet love, and Lady Madelaine is here, waiting to welcome you."

Never was surprise more pleasant. I pressed the hand of my husband tenderly in my own; and although my lips were silent, he could read my thanks in the look which I turned upon him. One cause, at least, of his long absence from Woodville was explained, and a portion of the time had been spent in my service.

When the doors of the drawing-room were flung back to give us entrance, a flood of light inundated the staircase, while, instantly that we were announced, Lady Madelaine appeared upon the threshold, superbly dressed and radiant with smiles; and in her suite appeared all such of her friends as she was anxious should extend their countenance to myself. The whole party were in full dress, and, as I glanced rapidly around me, a blush of annoyance rose to my cheek when I remembered my own traveling costume. I was not long suffered, however, to experience this mortification, for before Sir James had made the tour of the room, and replied to the greeting of the guests, my mother approached me, and, with a meaning smile, offered to do the honors of my house while I went to my room to remove my bonnet and shawl. I obeyed without comment, happy to escape from a scene in which I must have appeared like a dark spot in a sea of light, when, guided by a comely-looking housekeeper and attended by Joséphine, I soon found myself in a charming dressing-room, which seemed to have been furnished by the hands of fairies, it was so fresh, so gay, and so luxurious in its arrangements. Nor did I find less pleasure in contemplating half a dozen exquisite dresses, temptingly spread forth to await my selection, and a case of magnificent diamonds, which the housekeeper reverently informed me were the family jewels of the Dorntons, reset under the superintendence of Lady Madelaine, and which her ladyship particularly requested me to wear on that evening.

I was enchanted! I think that Cinderella must have had very similar feelings after the arrival of her beneficent godmother, on the occasion of the ball given by the prince.

I could have amused myself very pleasantly for an hour in examining my new possessions, but Joséphine reminded me of the expectant guests, and I forthwith commenced my somewhat elaborate toilet. In a short time my glass reflected a face and figure which I contemplated with considerable complacency. Never had I been so magnificently attired. Blazing with jewels, clad in white silk brocade, richly flowered, and wearing rouge for the first time, I was enraptured at the effect which I was about to produce, and this feeling alone gave me courage to tear myself away from the friendly mirror. All memory, all regret, were absorbed by vanity; at that moment, the present sufficed to satisfy my heart.

When I entered the drawing-room, I was greeted by that low and flattering murmur which outweighs a score of compliments, and never fails to convince a woman of the exact extent of her personal advantages. Sir James advanced to meet me with eyes beaming with proud delight; and I was too well pleased with myself not to be equally so with him. It was through his agency that I had achieved this triumph; and, as a natural consequence, he became to me an object of increasing interest and consideration. The dinner was recherché in the extreme; and as, for the first time, I presided at my own table, I felt that I was at length independent of the shackles under which I had so long writhed. All the conversation around me turned on the various engagements of the different individuals—on the necessity of my immediate presentation at court on my marriage—on the situation of my opera-box and the importance of securing a ticket for the ball of the beautiful Duchess of D——, which was to take place in a fortnight. I was surrounded by assurances of the admiration and envy which I was certain to excite in the court circle—to all of which Sir James listened with evident gratification

Our party separated at an early hour, for several of the guests had sacrificed other engagements in order to assist Lady Madelaine in welcoming me to my new home; and all were expected elsewhere in the course of the night. Gratified as I had been, I was, nevertheless, not sorry to see them depart; for I was fatigued from excitement and exertion; and although my mother lingered to the last, in order to receive my acknowledgments for the very effective assistance which she had rendered to Dornton, and the expression of my satisfaction at the arrangements which had been made for my reception, both of which I tendered freely and earnestly, she also departed in her turn, and I again found myself tête-à-tête with my husband.

My heart was overflowing with happiness, and I poured forth my thanks to Sir James with an energy for which he was evidently not prepared, and which appeared to produce a great effect upon him.

"You do not then regret, Eveleen," he said, "that you have been induced to intrust your happiness to my keeping?"

"I were indeed ungrateful to do so!" I replied. "And so you were really thinking of me, and of my gratification, during your absence from Woodville?"

"Was it not a duty, as well as a delight?"

"Oh, not a word of duty," I exclaimed laughing. "It is too chilling a consideration for such a moment as this—a blight upon the flowers—a shadow over the sun."

"And yet your duties will be light, my sweet wife; all I ask is to see you happy, fashionable, and idolized; and all this is in your own power."

Nothing could be more charming. And at the close of this little dialogue, we proceeded matrimonially, arm in arm, to explore our new habitation. Even accustomed as I had been, from my childhood, to taste and luxury, I was compelled to admit that I had seen nothing to compare with the residence of which I had become the mistress. The golden wand of wealth had been guided by the hand of elegance; and there was repose as well as splendor in all around me.

Those were the palmy days of boudoirs, and mine was perfect. Lady Madelaine had excelled herself. Her egotism had placed me in a perilous position; and it was necessary to dazzle and amuse me, in order to blind me to the fact. She could not have succeeded better. Admirable tactician as she was, she was well aware that I could be led through my vanity alone to forget, or at least to forgive, the past; and she acted upon that conviction. All assumption of authority was laid aside; she counseled and assisted, but never controlled me. I was plunged suddenly into a vortex of dissipation. My presentation took place under the most flattering circumstances; the queen condescended to congratulate me on my marriage, and the princesses on my recovery. At the ball of the Duchess of D——, I walked a minuet with the Prince of Wales; and on the following day the journals teemed with descriptions of my dress, my grace, and my fashion. All London left their names at my door; and no entertainment was considered perfect at which I was not present. My box at the opera was the resort of all that was great and gifted in the capital; even royalty itself was my frequent guest. Poets were eloquent in my praise; and politicians forbore to argue when I smiled. I had not a moment unoccupied; not a moment for a calm and rational survey of those serious duties, and that awful responsibility, which I had taken upon me. I was a mere feather on the summer breath of the world, wafted hither and thither by the current of every idle fancy, and every puerile ambition. More than once I had listened, not only to the accents of flattery, but even to the withering words of passion; but they had passed by me unheeded, and without quickening a single pulse. Herein, at least, I played an equal game with the world, for I was simply living in myself, and for myself, and had no sentiment to bestow on others.

Dornton, meanwhile, was the very model of a high-bred husband. Ever ready to second me in any scheme of pleasure or expense; ever willing to share in my amusements, and equally satisfied to seek his own when I did not require his attendance, he was never either negligent or intrusive; while his undoubted fashion and unequivocal popularity, flattered my vanity, and satisfied my self-love.

So passed the season; and, on the invitation of Lady Madelaine, we proceeded to spend a couple of months at Rooksley, which, since the departure of my sister and her guardian, had resumed all its wonted elegance. I have since thought that my mother urged this arrangement in order to convince herself that I had thoroughly conquered my passion for Devereux. Be that as it may, however, it is certain that it was not without emotion I once more found myself amid scenes so familiar to me, and so redolent alike of happy and painful recollections. Nevertheless, I can truly assert that my first memory was of my sister. How utterly had the giddy round of pleasure obliterated her image from my mind! I had, indeed, been informed casually by Lady Madelaine, that she had arrived safely at Glenfillan, and expressed her perfect satisfaction at the realization of her project: but this was all that I knew, or had cared to know; and it was only on my arrival at Rooksley, when I was endeavoring, by the repose of an hour, to overcome the fatigue of my journey from town, that I remembered, and dwelt upon her faded look, and the hollow cough which, despite her efforts to suppress it, had escaped her several times during our last brief interview. My reflections were, however, very slightly tinged with self-reproach. Adela's estrangement had been her own work; she was self-exiled from her family; she had not addressed one letter to me since her arrival in Scotland; and if I had been equally silent, I felt that I had only to revert to my last attempt at correspondence with her, in order at once to find my justification.

Of Devereux I scarcely thought at all; and in the dignity of my new character I even tried to smile at the folly of my girlish fancy. I was not prepared to comprehend that the lingering and most happy effects of that fancy, had been to render me insensible to the dangerous homage of less scrupulous admirers. Such a suspicion never crossed my mind. I never dreamed of looking beyond my own will for my strength.

A fatal error, fatally expiated!

CHAPTER XL.

Doubtlessly Lady Madelaine was satisfied with the success of the test to which she had subjected me, when, at the close of a fortnight, she found me as exacting, as self-centered, and as indifferent as usual; for, on descending to dinner on the termination of that period, she congratulated Lord Otterford, in my presence, on the promotion of his nephew, who had just obtained a company in his regiment; and as she did so, I felt that her eyes were fixed steadily upon my face. Sooth to say, this information interested me but little: I believed that the world had done its work upon me, and that I was no longer the fond and feeble girl I had once been; while so long a time had elapsed since we parted, that I was careless on the subject of meeting him again. I imagined the wound in my heart to be healed; I knew not that it was yet too freshly scarred to be safely handled.

Resolved therefore to parade my indifference—and was not this affectation enough of itself to teach me the necessity of caution?—I raised my head from the beads which I was stringing, and said with a polite smile, "Suffer me, my lord, to add my congratulations to those of my mother, on the subject of Colonel Devereux. Sir Herbert must be enchanted." Lady Madelaine glanced triumphantly at her husband; but I suspect that he was less easily convinced than herself upon the subject of my present feelings. From the period of Emily Vernon's melancholy death, he had occasionally given way to fits of depression, which I never failed to attribute to his memory of the past; and it is probable that experience of the power of a real passion had taught him more rightly to appreciate my self-delusion. He had sacrificed his better feelings to the wealth he wanted; I had buried mine under the rose-leaves of vanity, and the glittering pall of dissipation and frivolity. Wretched alternatives both; the one as ineffective as the other, when divested of the prestige of novelty.

The first dinner-bell had rung, and I was still lingering in the drawing-room in order to finish the bracelet which had been the occupation of my morning (and in which Lady Madelaine had, to my great surprise, evinced so extraordinary an interest that she remained beside me to witness its completion), when the door suddenly opened, and Colonel Devereux was announced. The abruptness of his entrance threw me off my guard, and I uttered a faint scream, and suffered the coral beads to scatter themselves over the carpet. My mother, by whom he was evidently expected, skilfully covered the accident by receiving him with flattering felicitations, to which, however, he replied in a brief and agitated manner. Compelled, at length, to approach me, he faltered out a few words of which I could not seize the sense, and which he did not, in all probability, himself comprehend; bowed low without raising his eyes, and then turned abruptly to shake hands with Lord Otterford, who had not risen from his chair; and who did not appear altogether satisfied of the expediency of my mother's present experiments.

Gradually, however, he recovered his gaiety, and overwhelmed his nephew with questions, to which the latter replied "yes" and "no" with apparent unconsciousness of his own utterance, and occasionally in the wrong places; as for me, I affected to be diligently collecting the beads which had fallen, glad to escape, on so innocent a pretext, the searching glances of Lady Madelaine. Nothing was wanting to render the whole scene insupportable, but the presence of Sir James; and five minutes afterward he entered the room with his gun in his hand, to apologize for his delay, and to give us an account of his prowess.

I saw at once that he was prepared for the presence of Devereux, for he did not even attempt to affect surprise, but met him with an extended hand, and a bland smile, as though he were the individual of all others who was most welcome at this moment. The feeling was, nowever, not reciprocal. Devereux, indeed, took the proffered hand, but his repugnance was almost visible, and his coldness beyond mistake.

Affecting not to perceive the chilliness of our new guest, Sir James persisted in lavishing upon him the most flattering attentions; after which he turned to me, expressed his overpowering uneasiness at my paleness, and implored me to be more careful of myself, lest I should bring on a relapse of my illness. All this unnecessary parade of anxiety was torture to me, for at that particular moment I would have given a year of life to have become invisible upon his entrance. I felt at once that my imagined indifference to Devereux had vanished like an icicle in the sunshine, when he was again actually in my presence.

He was surrounded by an atmosphere of fond and pleasant memories. I saw him the same, indeed, whom I had loved, but increased in manly beauty, grace, and self-possession. The world had done its work lovingly upon him, and the period of our separation had been to him one of both moral and physical gain. I had reason to believe that such had also been the case with myself; and, even then, when I ought to have hoped that, like me, he had found an alternative for his early passion, and would now meet me with indifference, I felt my heart beating proudly with the conviction that, once more thrown into contact with me, it was at least improbable that he should do so.

I had never before seriously remembered that Sir James Dornton, handsome and high-bred as he undoubtedly was, had nevertheless numbered forty summers! It was an untoward moment to register the fact. Fortunately for all parties, Lord Otterford, to whom the ceremony of dinner had become by no means unimportant, reminded us that the second bell would ring in a few moments, and that we were still unprepared for the summons.

I had risen from my seat before the words left his lips, anxious to escape, and to find myself alone for an instant. I did not comprehend the revolution which the mere presence of Devereux had wrought in my feelings toward both myself and my husband; nor did I understand the meaning of his own manner. That he was embarrassed was sufficiently evident; for not only had he not addressed to me one intelligible word—that I could readily have forgiven him—but I had not even detected one look turned toward me. What did this fact imply! Did he fear my power over him? Or, did he seek to shun me that my influence was at an end?

I tried to hope that the latter might be the case. I tried to hope so, but I did not: my vanity would tolerate no such wish—no such credence. My principle and my woman-pride were at war. The one was built up on expediency, and the other wrought and throbbed through every pulse of my being; I could not even deceive myself as to the result of my mental struggle. I did not: but as Joséphine arranged my hair, and expatiated upon the "superbe beauté" of Colonel Devereux, I vowed to myself to maintain, not only my dignity as a married woman, but also the supremacy of my attractions, by once more bringing my old suitor to my feet—of course in all honesty and honor. As a lover, I could consider him no more; but I could not brook that he should vow to another woman the allegiance which had been mine. I remembered Lord Otterford before his marriage, and during the life of my father. Neither Lady Madelaine nor Sir James had seen cause for blame in the bond of admiring and devoted friendship which had united them. Neither Lady Madelaine nor Sir James, et pour cause, could demur to the existence of a similar tie between myself and Devereux.

The argument was specious—but, could any one have read my heart, and asked me what indeed it was which I proposed to myself in this compromise with my conscience, I am quite sure that I could have given no rational reply. In short, I did not venture to look into the future. I forgot how weakly and unworthily I had behaved to the man whom I was still plotting to enslave and to secure as the victim of my vanity; and I placed my mother's example before me, as the screen which was to be my protection from the animadversions of the world, and the reproaches of my own conscience.

I profited by the previous delay to remain in my dressing-room for several minutes after the second bell had rung; and nearly exhausted the patience of Joséphine by the caprice which I exhibited with regard to my toilet. We had lived so utterly en famille since our arrival at Rooksley, that I had become somewhat negligent upon this point; and the soubrette was not prepared for so sudden a demonstration as that with which I now favored her. At length, however, all was arranged to my satisfaction. The affectation of simplicity which I had judged it expedient to exhibit, was skilfully calculated and displayed the quiet consciousness of a beauty which required no assistance. I wore neither rouge nor ornaments. I knew that Lady Madelaine dared not risk so extreme a step; and thus the diplomacy of the dressing room was perfect, and all rivalry rendered impossible between the beauty in her first development, and the beauty on the wane.

How often had I promised myself this practical triumph; and how much would it be enhanced on this occasion, by the fact that Devereux would be present to institute the comparison. For a moment I almost forgot the embarrassment of my position.

When I entered the drawing-room, Lady Madelaine alone was seated. The gentlemen were collected in a group, discussing some question of politics, or sporting. No one moved as I appeared. Sir James was gradually slackening in the extreme gallantry of his attentions, although still affecting marked courtesy and affection.

"I am glad that you are at last arrived, Lady Dornton," said my mother, as her eye traveled rapidly over my person; "Colonel Devereux must be famishing after his long journey, and Sir James after his shooting. Colonel Devereux, will you give me your arm to the dining-room!" and, as he obeyed, without once glancing toward me, she swept by in the proud dignity of her matronly beauty, crushing, as she did so, the light drapery of my muslin robe beneath the heavy folds of her black velvet dress.

At table, I found myself seated nearly opposite to Devereux; but so far as concerned himself, he might as well have been established at the antipodes. He did not even appear conscious of my presence: or so, at least, I interpreted the resolute avoidance which he exhibited. Attentive and gallant to Lady Madelaine, he had neither eyes nor ears for me; and, in fact, the dinner was half over before anything beyond a casual remark had been addressed to me by any of the party. My heart was swelling with mortification and wounded vanity.

Was Devereux then always to see me only as the chidden child? Was I never to be permitted to assert myself in his presence? And, was he, too, to adopt the tone of my mother—that mother whom he once professed to dislike and to avoid,—in order to wound my self-respect!

I felt the tears rising to my eyes, and scalding the lids upon which they hung; and I trembled lest they should fall; when, during a sudden pause, Lady Madelaine remarked ironically:

"Lady Dornton is fond of surprises, even in small matters, it would seem. By the time which she consumed at her toilet, I anticipated something brilliant in the way of costume; and, lo! she has made her appearance in her dressing-gown."

"You are a strange little girl, Eveleen," followed up Sir James. "How are we to interpret your pastoral attire? Are we to attribute it to a modesty which disclaims admiration, or to a vanity which demands it, despite all drawbacks?"

"I will not venture to estimate the extent of your generosity," I said, forcing a smile; "but I believe that I have seldom deviated from this same simplicity of which you accuse me to-day for the first time, since we have been a family party." As I ceased speaking, I glanced at Devereux. His eyes were fixed upon me, nor did he withdraw them until I had met the long, sad look with which they were filled. Their expression was beyond mistake. He loved me still—he regretted my loss—he was unhappy: and unhappy through my means!

What a singular problem is a female heart!—Although at that moment I felt as if I could have been happy in his happiness, I was nevertheless rejoiced to feel that he had suffered for my sake, that he was still in the toils—that we were not utterly separated.

From that instant I became gay even to folly; I jested with Lord Otterford, and paid back every epigram, which Lady Madelaine launched against me, with a point which, before the close of the evening, taught her greater caution. I became dazzling from the consciousness of my success, and exhausted all my powers of pleasing with a lavishness worthy of a crowd of listeners. As the brow of my mother darkened, my own became more radiant. She felt my triumph bitterly, and I knew it. Little did she guess the source of the wild spirits by which I was inspired, or her envy would have ceased at once.

My secret saved me while I could retain it. I was in the position of one mortally wounded by a dagger; while the weapon still remains in the wound he can live and pour forth his thoughts, and gaze around him upon the beautiful world which he is about to leave; but the instant that the dagger is withdrawn, death fills the vacuum it has made, and the destruction is complete.

As I laid my head upon the pillow that night, I began to marvel what would be the result of our second meeting on the morrow. There must necessarily be some moment during the day in which we should find ourselves alone; when the restraint under which we had passed the previous evening would be removed; and when he would be at liberty to pour out to me all his regrets, his sufferings, and his reproaches. How should I justify myself? How should I excuse my weakness, my vacillation, my infidelity? Then came the question of ought I to do so, even to him? Ought I to admit that I became the wife of Sir James by coercion? That I went to the altar a loveless bride? That I carried his image in my heart, while my hand was clasped in that of Dornton? How would he receive such an avowal? In what position should I myself stand after so humiliating a revelation?

Ere I at length slept I came to the decision, which those who have studied my character with attention will at once have foreseen. I resolved to leave all to chance, and to be decided by circumstances.

It was cutting through the Gordian knot. When Josephine appeared with my chocolate the following morning, I chid her for having suffered me to sleep so late; and she excused herself by asserting that, confident that the noise of monsieur's departure must have disturbed miladi, she supposed that milady had afterward desired to rest, as she had not rung her bell.

"Monsieur's departure!" I exclaimed in surprise; "who has left Rooksley this morning?"

"Monsieur Devereux is gone, miladi; and Sir James has accompanied him to the post-town on horseback."

"Did Colonel Devereux receive letters by the early post?" I asked anxiously.

Josephine could not inform me. The letter-bag had, as usual, been carried to Lord Otterford; and having ascertained that it contained nothing for me, she had not waited to see its contents distributed. I felt as though I had been hurled from a height: I was stunned with mortification and surprise. No, no; I had deceived myself. Devereux had ceased to love me; and my levity of the previous evening had excited his contempt. I was miserable

All these may appear puerile details to those who care only for the broad outline of actions and events; but such as love to study the intricate details of the human heart, and to unwind the tangled threads by which its impulses and passions are directed, will not so deem of them. Now, as I sit at my desk, with my hair gray, and my brow wrinkled, I feel convinced that had Devereux lent himself to the romantic folly by which my own feelings were governed, his weakness would have worked my cure. I should have discovered among the adulating crowd by which I was generally surrounded, a score of individuals as handsome and as attractive as himself.

It is astonishing with what false tints solitude can invest a man. Had I a score of daughters, I would sooner trust their happiness to the whirl of a London life, under proper chaperonage, than to the quiet of the country with one ineligible suitor; just as, upon the same principle, I utterly dissent from the old and accepted axiom of the danger of a girl of fifteen or sixteen committing some foolish act, and requiring constant surveillance to keep her in the path of prudence. Everyday experience proves the fallacy of this time-worn assertion, which has been repeated so often that it is taken for granted without examination. As a general rule, a woman is never less likely to mar her own happiness than just as she makes acquaintance with the world. Idleness is the germ of all mischief in a woman's heart; and show me the being more busy than a young girl just bursting into womanhood.

The great kaleidoscope of society is newly revealed to her, and she is never weary of watching its combinations. Her whole heart, her whole being, are in full activity: her moral vision, although not obscured, is confused. She is full of aspirations, full of hopes; but, far from centering upon one solitary object, they are distributed and intertwined, and, as a natural consequence, negatived by their own discursiveness.

It is without a single dread of contradiction from those of my own sex who have passed through the two phases of existence under notice, that I declare my firm belief, that at no period does a woman do herself less justice, or dispose of her happiness more recklessly, than during the few years while she is what our Gallic neighbors courteously term "on the return;" when the bloom of early youth tarnished, the light figure become less buoyant, the hopes which once filled her heart crushed or evaporated—still reeling within herself all the faculties of happiness as freshly as she did ten years before—she sees the children whom she petted in their nursery elbow her in the world's crowd as her successors; and feels that the change, which to herself has been almost imperceptible, must be traced in indelible characters to those by whom she is surrounded. Then it is, that, as she thinks of the future—a future which can only deepen the decay, and increase the moral solitude of her own heart—she is unjust to herself. A morbid dread of utter abandonment by that world to whose smile she had been accustomed, creeps upon her. She looks round upon the younger and the happier of its present favorites and shudders at the solitude which, like the darkness of a polar night, is gradually gathering around her. Then it is, I assert, that her peril comes; then it is that, grateful for the interest which she may inspire, and of which she almost despaired, she wilfully mistakes her own feelings. Her want of self-appreciation and that yearning for support and companionship inherent in woman, delude her into the belief that she loves at last. Differently, indeed, does the passion develop itself from the experience or the imagination of past years; but she mistakes the calmness for depth of feeling; and the same system of delusion blinds her to the imperfections of the individual who is rather the alternative of her moral isolation, than the object of her choice.

Here is, indeed, the real triumph of weakness over reason. Hope and ambition are alike extinct, and her strength of purpose sinks with them. In the girl of sixteen, all is hope and ambition, and they are the life-buoys by which she is maintained safely on the surface of the world's waves. Exceptions may be quoted against me. I admit them without dispute; but, as a general rule, I maintain my position.

CHAPTER XLI.

The apparition of Devereux had made strange havoc in my peace of mind, as well as in my self-appreciation. It taught me at once to reflect and to doubt. Because I had listened with indifference to the flatteries of a score of fashionable coxcombs, I had quietly fallen into the belief that marriage had rendered me impenetrable to all attractions from without. I had never taken the trouble to reflect, that if the cowl could not make the monk, so neither could the ring make the matron.

I was awakened with a start to the fact. Whence had I derived my safety? Not from the presence of Sir James, but by the invisible potency of a deep, although smothered passion; and at what a mortifying moment did the truth burst upon me! Just as the novelty of our union wore away, Dornton was beginning to find it possible to derive amusement from pursuits in which I had no share: to enjoy a bachelor's dinner at his club, and a bachelor's stall at the opera; a sporting party, or a boat-race. Not, be it understood, that I repined at this gradual and almost imperceptible change. Had I been less self-centered I might possibly have been wounded, because every handsome young woman imagines, when she marries, that she must inevitably work a revolution in matrimonial habits, and exhibit to the world a model husband, created by the magic of her individual charms. She forgets, poor fool! that custom and possession never fail to rend the diadem from the brow of the divinity; and that, not unfrequently, the most romantic lover degenerates into the most commonplace partner.

In my case, I was spared this mortification, for I had so lively an opinion of my own merits, that it was almost matter of indifference to me; although suddenly aroused to a perception of the fact, the conviction became fatal in another way. I began to remember the circumstances under which I had become a wife: to ask myself wherein I had profited by the alliance which had been thrust upon me; to contrast my sev enteen summers with the forty well-told years of Dornton; to dwell upon the éclat which my beauty and fashion had thrown around the blasé man of the world, and the consequence which my large fortune—for even this baneful reflection of money came at last—had obtained for him among his associates.

I looked at Lord Otterford, and thought how widely the past differed from the present; and with what charming indifference Lady Madelaine had supported the change. The world was with her, and the world's plaudits were the one great ambition of her life. She was not dependent on home. So long as all wore a surface of intact and irreproachable polish, she cared little how cold and ungenial might be the under-current.

This was at least a convenient, if not an encouraging temper of mind, and could I have attained to it, I should at once have dismissed the subject from my thoughts; but such was far from being the case. As the image of Sir James paled and diminished in my mental vision, that of Devereux brightened and expanded to fill up the vacant space; and I flung aside the hard penetrating chisel of reality, to assume the soft and facile pencil of fancy.

Full of youth, and love, and noble aspirations, still upon the threshold of that life into whose inner temples Sir James had already penetrated; what violent contrasts could I not create in my own mind, between the lover of my choice and the husband of my fate! These are the weak speculations, the idle comparisons, by which women lose their dignity of character; and I spent hours in creating and instituting them; nor did the circumstances of Devereux's sudden departure make me less ingenious in this self-torture. I had come back upon the conviction that he still loved me, and I consequently attributed his abrupt retreat to fear. Here I might have paused, and asked myself how I should receive so equivocal a compliment; but I avoided the reference, and only clung to the fact.

The result of all this moral weakness was an increased indifference to Sir James, an added appreciation of my own merits, and a restless anxiety respecting the movements of Devereux.

Company crowded to Rooksley. Lady Madelaine had wearied of the pastoral picture of the family group, upon which she had expatiated so gracefully amid the throngs of London; while I, fully occupied by my own visions, had never breathed a wish for change. The men, when they returned to the saloon after dinner, played high, and discussed political questions; the women flirted and passed in review the personal and moral merits of their absent friends; and I believe that few of these could have complained with justice of being forgotten.

In these evenings at Rooksley I learnt one fact, which I have ever since retained, and of which the experience of each succeeding year has sufficed more fully to convince me: that when a woman emancipates herself deliberately alike from charity and from decency, it costs her no effort to be a wit; nor need she open her mouth without giving utterance to something brilliant. I leave it to casuists to decide which of the two sisters of the fairy tale she most resembles—the one who spoke gold and diamonds, or the other, who cast forth toads and vipers: I only know that many a woman's —I was about to say, reputation, but I retract the word, and substitute—celebrity, has depended, and does to my knowledge depend, in the present day, upon what the French have wittily called a flux de mots—the one more unfeminine than the other.

But, vogue la galère! I am talking of others, and forgetting that my legitimate subject is myself. It may be remembered that Sir James had tranquilized my mind, even before our marriage, on the subject of his utter want of jealousy; and I am bound to admit that he acted in accordance with his professions. Whether he had so truly read the secret of my heart, or so utterly despised the weakness of my nature, that he calmly committed me to the safeguard of my vanity, it is needless now to inquire, while it is certain that he saw all the idle guests of Lady Madelaine at my feet without comment or expostulation. I laughed more than once in my secret thoughts, as I found myself playing the same rôle in the Rooksley saloon which my mother had played during my early girlhood, and which I had looked upon with envy. I had, as a natural consequence, brought with me to the country all the prestige of my success in town; and I played the beauté par excellence without mercy or misgiving. My mother's forbearance was wonderful. She had necessarily fallen back into a demi jour which it must have been difficult to tolerate, yet she did not seem to see it; and, satisfied with the adoration of her own immediate circle, she left to me alike the triumph and the trouble of forming a bright centre to the general group.

Such was the state of things when I suddenly remembered Lady O'Halloran; and I had no sooner done so than I directed Joséphine to dispatch a messenger to the Hall without delay, to ascertain if the family were in the country. I was seated in my dressing-room when the memory of the kind-hearted old lady rose up before me like a reproach, and with it were linked a thousand associations and a thousand regrets. What would the single-hearted, honestly-minded friend of my father now think of the dissipated, reckless Lady Dornton? Would she look on me with pity, or with blame? Had I been wicked as well as weak, the question would have given me no uneasiness; for good old Lady O'Halloran existing, with the tithe of an establishment, in the empty and echoing hall of her husband's ancestors, in order to preserve his memory from dishonor, and the fortunes of her son from ruin, was an object very unlikely to interest that world of which I had now become a votary. But the spell of the past was over her; and, as was habitual with me, her good opinion was essential to my comfort and self-appreciation. Here was another hope of help, though I could not have explained the manner in which it was to be rendered available.

That Lady O'Halloran had not appeared at Rooksley, by no means implied her absence from the country. Lady Madelaine's greeting on a former occasion had been prohibitory of all further intercourse; and the old lady was too high-hearted to incur the risk of a new affront. I therefore awaited with considerable interest the return of my messenger; and had no sooner ascertained that Lady O'Halloran was indeed in the neighborhood, than I ordered my carriage, and hastened to assure her of my continued regard and gratitude. During the drive, I lost myself in a sea of doubt and irresolution. Should I pour out all my feelings before her? Dare I? Could they all be justified? And wherefore should I subject myself to the ordeal of her shrewd and searching judgment? Cui bono? And yet I wanted her pity. I thirsted for her advice, for her support. I did not ask myself if her advice would separate my thoughts from Devereux, or support me in my duties as a wife. I only reflected that I had no resting-place for the sole of my foot, and trusted that the good plain sense of my old monitor would enable me to establish a rock amid the sands.

The first thing which roused me from my reverie was the sudden stopping of the carriage at the gates of the Hall Park; and I was immediately struck by the amended aspect of every object around me. The gothic lodge, which had formerly been in a state of partial ruin, was restored with care and skill; the great avenue, which was the lion of the estate, had been cleared and leveled; deer were grazing over the glades; clumps of young timber, picturesquely grouped, and protected by fences, were to be seen on all sides; and, finally, as I reached the house, the finger of renovation had been so busy that I scarcely recognized the details which met my eye.

Within, as without, the same change had taken place; while the bevy of powdered menials who received me, and who replaced the one grayheaded domestic who had served Lady O'Halloran with all the stately affection of long habit, were clothed in neat but rich liveries. I forgot the lapse of time which had intervened since my last visit to the Hall, and looked around me in astonishment.

I was shown into the library, which, like the rest of the establishment, had assumed an air of opulence and comfort; and where I was courteously received by a stranger, the veriest vision of girlish beauty upon which I had ever looked. Small and slight as a sylph, her eyes were of the deepest blue, and the magnificent masses of hair that fell around her face, and to her shoulders, were of that golden brown which flashes in the sunshine, and darkens in the shade; the smile that played upon her lips appeared habitual to them; and as she rose upon my entrance, and courteously motioned me to the seat which a servant had advanced, I thought that I had never beheld so perfect an embodiment of innocence, sweetness, and polished grace. She was evidently as young as myself, and although easy and graceful in her manner, it still retained a simplicity which mine had long lost. Her dress was as girlish as her person, and was remarkable at a period when the rich massiveness of the materials employed upon the costume of all women of a certain rank was almost oppressive. A plain gown of slight white silk, falling in voluminous folds from her waist, where it was confined by a thick silken cord; hanging sleeves, which were open to the elbow, and revealed an arm of consummate beauty; and a rich collar of Spanish point which covered her throat, and reached to her shoulders, composed her whole costume. She wore neither paint nor powder; and during the few minutes which elapsed before the entrance of Lady O'Halloran, I endeavored in vain to convince myself of the position which she occupied in the family. Her self-possession was so perfect that it was impossible to assign to her the station of a dependent; while the gentle unobtrusiveness of her bearing was, to my judgment, equally incompatible with the assumption of her being other than, at most, a needy relative, adopted by the kind-hearted mistress of the mansion.

I was still undecided on the point when Lady O'Halloran entered the room.

"Is it Eveleen, or Lady Dornton, whom I am to welcome to the Hall?" she asked, as she extended her hand with a gravity which was not habitual to her.

"One and both, my good friend!" I exclaimed, rising to carry the offered hand to my lips. "Eveleen who comes to thank you for your past friendship, and Lady Dornton who ventures to ask for its continuance."

"So far, so well," was the reply; "and in this proceeding, and the feeling by which it is dictated, I recognize the prompting of the well-meaning but unstable heart of my poor friend Tilden's daughter. You are welcome, Eveleen, very welcome in both characters. I have often thought of you with affection and anxiety, my dear child. And now let me make known to you the wife of my son; the beloved Margaret, who has become as dear to me as her husband; and who has by her tenderness given an added value to the close of my struggling and stormy life."

I almost uttered an exclamation of surprise as the beautiful young creature before me bowed and smiled her greeting. All was now explained. It was evident that her wealth had restored the faded honors of the ancient family of which she had become a member; that her extreme loveliness had not been her only dowry; and that beneath the sweet simplicity by which I had been impressed, must nestle the proud consciousness of having shed happiness and peace upon the path of him she loved.

What a contrast did she not offer to myself! We were both young, both wealthy, both handsome; but hers was not the commanding and almost arrogant beauty which distinguished me; it was a loveliness, so pure, so ethereal, so spiritualized, that all idea of rivalry was annihilated as by the stroke of a magician's wand; and I felt no reluctance in admitting the charm under which I bowed.

"And thus, Eveleen," pursued Lady O'Halloran, when our mute but cordial recognition was accomplished; "I have subsided into a happy, indolent, world-shunning dowager; and have little to tell you of myself; but such is far from being the case with you. Are you still sufficiently unspoiled by fashion to open your heart to me? Nay, do not leave us, my child," she said, as the younger Lady O'Halloran rose to leave the room: "you are aware that there is not now between us even the affectation of a secret. And you, my dear Lady Dornton, fear nothing: Margaret is discreet; and I will even admit to you that she is au courant of your early history, and has more than once shed tears over my simple story of your unloved youth."

I instinctively stretched out my hand to the fair girl, who pressed it gently in silence.

How easy was it for me to pour forth to the sympathizing listeners near me all the history of my strange, hurried, and compulsatory marriage. The threats of my mother, my terror of Mr. Curties, my gratitude for the attentions of Sir James. Nay, how comparatively facile was it to admit the vacillation of my own feelings; the uncertainty by which I was beset; the chimerical fears under which I labored; and even the deplorable weakness which accompanied me to the altar! I narrated with a glowing cheek, my triumphs in the world, and the splendor with which Sir James had surrounded me in my new home. Fevered and breathless, I passed on from one phase of my married life to another; until my eloquence was suddenly checked by the memory of the late apparition of Devereux at Rooksley.

When the time is come in which we fear to give utterance to all the secrets of our hearts, the very effort that we make to shroud them reveals the mystery; and thus it was with me. I had been talking hurriedly, impetuously, as though the hours would be too short to hold all that I had to tell, when suddenly I stopped short, with a forced laugh; and folding my mantle about me as a pretext for withdrawing my eyes from those of the dowager, I said flippantly:

"And thus, my dear Lady O'Halloran, I, in my turn, have subsided into a mere wife, with a staid, middle aged husband, with nothing more to hope or to fear; 'content to dwell in decencies forever;' and patiently to watch the refrigeration of the matrimonial fever which is gradually progressing in the feelings and affection of Sir James; as I suppose that all reasonable wives must sooner or later submit to do."

"My dear Lady Dornton!" exclaimed the young creature beside me, in an accent of sad expostulation; "you terrify me—"

"And wherefore, Margaret?" asked her mother-in-law with sudden seriousness. "Can you not perceive that the assumed indifference of Lady Dornton is only intended to conceal some feeling of which she deems it expedient to make a mystery? Remember that she is not here in a confessional, and that we cannot compel her confidence. We must be content with a partial trust. He is a bold patient who applies the probe to his own wound."

I pressed my hands upon my eyes, and the warm tears trickled through my fingers.

"Am I not right, Eveleen? Is not the waning of Sir James Dornton's love, a subject of indifference—even a relief to you? Have you not allowed yourself to look upon your marriage as a martyrdom inflicted upon you by others, when you should have remembered that by proper and prudent firmness, and calm womanly dignity, you might have rendered it impossible? have you not sacrificed the peace and self-respect of the future to the indolent enjoyment of the present? I understand that gesture. You admit the fact. But is this all, Eveleen? Is this all, poor misguided child of my dead friend? Throughout the whole of your story, you have told me only of yourself and of those who were antagonistical to you—I have not heard one word of Herbert Devereux—of the object of your first, and as you declared, of your unalterable love. Why is this? Have you in truth conquered your girlish, and now sinful passion? Have you never met Mr. Devereux since your marriage?"

"But once, madam; but once, and then only for a few hours, scarcely a week since, at Rooksley."

"And what has been the moral effect of that meeting, Eveleen?"

"Lady O'Halloran!" I exclaimed in agony; "have mercy upon me! I cannot answer that question to my own heart. I can only promise to wrestle with my weakness, and, if possible, to overcome it. You can dread no dishonor for the daughter of my father. To more than this I cannot pledge myself. I must bear my burthen as best I may. My girlhood and my womanhood are alike lonely and loveless. For a time I was deceived into a belief that it was otherwise, but my eyes are now opened. I have built up the ruined fortunes of my husband; I have worked out the mysterious will of my mother; and the same chill, unsympathetic atmosphere is still about me."

"Dismiss such morbid fancies. Have you not expatiated to me on the patient care and splendid attentions of Sir James?"

"I do not deny it; but the heart is never long the dupe of such counterfeits. I can understand, comparatively inexperienced as I am, that a woman may tolerate even ill-conduct in a man who really loves her, and may submit to a thousand neglects and mortifications almost without a murmur; while she who is conscious of the growing indifference of her husband, will at last glory in proving to him that she can reciprocate his want of affection, even when he seeks to purchase a love of which he is unworthy, by words and actions as false as his marriage-vow. I do not envy the feelings of the individual who experiences this retorted falsehood, neither can I pity him when he is repaid in kind."

"Eveleen, you make me shudder!"

"And wherefore? Of what value can be the devotion of a wife when it is not deemed worthy of return? Rather desire for me, my dear Lady O'Halloran, a state of mind which will substitute calm, for an impossible and unattainable happiness. The world need know nothing of the fact. How, indeed, in my case, could it arrive at such a conclusion? I feel that Sir James will never fail in his duty as a well-bred and perfectly courteous husband; that he will replace the passion which he is tired of affecting, by the most conspicuous attentions, the most unlimited indulgence, and the most demonstrative respect. The world will not therefore, I repeat, suspect the shallowness of the vase which contains my draught of home-happiness; and to that world I confidently look to revenge me."

I was abruptly silenced by the fixed and frightened gaze which the younger Lady O'Halloran had turned upon me, and which I accidentally encountered. It was as the look of a good genius rebuking an evil spirit. I bowed my head, humbled and heart-struck, before the wondering purity which, wounded and aswedered, seemed to ask itself if it had heard aright.

"Eveleen," said the old lady, in a choked and smothered voice: "come to us often. Your state of mind is fearful. Come to us, and learn to encourage a calmer and a better feeling. You are now deluding yourself bitterly. Beware, lest you accuse others of imaginary wrongs, toward you, in the unwilling consciousness of your own off-falling. Remember, my poor child, that the faults of others are no justification of yourself. Your errors will stand out in as strong relief among those of your fellow mortals as though they stood alone. Remember this, and be warned in time! I do not, I cannot for a moment suspect, that one thought of evil has entered into your heart; but you have talked of reprisals, and of making the world the instrument of your revenge. Believe me that the woman who imagines she can err to a given point, and there pause, deludes herself to her ruin. The first step she takes, is taken at her own discretion, but all after-progress is beyond her personal control; the descent is easy, but the backward path is hard to climb; and few indeed succeed in regaining the way that they have lost. She will find many to lead her down the precipice, but none to lend a helping hand to draw her back. Dear Eveleen, reflect!"

"I do! I will! And now let me leave you, Lady O'Halloran, for I am unequal to further excitement. Do not judge harshly of me; my fate has been a cruel one. If I can conquer it in conquering myself, I shall in a great degree owe my success to your admonitions. Farewell."

"Farewell, my child. Be just to yourself, and all will yet end happily."

My heart was full, as I threw myself into the carriage. It is full now, as I recall that never-forgotten visit. The aspect of the pure and gentle girl, who, like a beam of sunshine, had crossed my feverish and fitful path; the moral worth of the friend in whom my father had confided; the calm and peaceful look of every thing by which they were surrounded, as though their own qualities were reflected by all about them; these objects which, in a different frame of mind, would have imparted to my own feelings a portion of their blessedness, now only served, on the contrary, to ruffle and embitter my pride and my repinings. Such also might have been my fate. What was it now? And what might it become?

I reached Rooksley in time to dress for dinner, and to learn from Joséphine that Colonel Devereux had returned.

CHAPTER XLII.

Now commenced the eventful period of my life. Hitherto my errors had been rather mental than actual; I had plotted, planned, and promised myself a shadowy vengeance which I had possessed neither power nor courage to execute, and even now, I felt that there was a point beyond which, for my own sake, I must not progress. My self-respect and the approbation of the world were necessary to me, and these I resolved never to forego; but still, without doing this, I had much in my power. I could repay slight by slight, tyranny by tyranny I could assert myself. How many a woman has mentally made the same resolve while utterly unable to define her own meaning for the words!

Had Devereux seconded me in the advances which I made to attract his notice, and to invite his gallantries, it is more than possible that, in the then temper of my mind, I might have committed some reckless act of folly which would have drawn down upon me the reproaches of Lady Madelaine, and the remonstrances, or even displeasure of Sir James; but far from affecting to do so, his coldness and indifference were unconquerable; he scarcely appeared conscious of my presence when I was putting forth all the artillery of my fascinations. He neither smiled at my sallies, nor was moved by my complaints; indeed, I might have believed that he had altogether forgotten the former tie between us, had not the pertinacity with which he avoided every occasion of finding himself alone with me, been a convicting proof to the contrary. This was, of all positions in the world, the most trying to a vain and flattered woman, conscious that time had only heightened her attractions. The obsequious devotions of the frivolous and fashionable men about me became vapid and distasteful. I sought only for the admiration and homage of the one who seemed resolved to deny me both; and I became but the more determined to lay the rebellious spirit.

To the society of Dornton, Colonel Devereux was obviously averse; and it appeared to me somewhat singular that Sir James should force it upon him with so much pertinacity, knowing, as he did all the antecedents of his history. such was, however, the case; and from time to time I saw the young guardsman leave the room in order to escape the protestations of regard which he felt unable to return in kind. Living under the same roof, and participating in the same occupations and amusements, it was, however, impossible for Colonel Devereux to avoid me altogether without a decided breach of good breeding, and of that he was incapable; but these casual approximations produced no decided result. He treated me with an excess of respect which was oppressive; with a ceremony that almost exceeded my patience. I had prepared myself for complaints, for reproaches; for all the violence of a passion which had been unjustly sacrificed; and I had resolved to oppose them with arguments of expediency; but all my plans were disconcerted. the cold and consistent bearing of Devereux mortified and stung me to my heart's core.

Reduced to doubting the existence of an affection which had hitherto appeared to me to be beyond dispute, I began to ask myself how I could ever have believed in its sincerity. I looked back upon the past, and strove to find in his former professions of attachment equivocation. Anything was easier, anything was more endurable, than to admit that where I had been loved I was loved no longer.

To lose our conquests is a fate to which we must all, sooner or later, submit with as good a grace as we can assume. It is the penalty of the one sex, enforced by the selfishness and fickleness of the other; but to confess to ourselves that we have done so, is a harder task than many women can achieve, even in the face of the clearest evidence. Hence so many superannuated coquets!

Something more bitter than anger made me resolve to ascertain the fact. I determined to leave no pains untried to ascertain the real state of Devereux's feelings toward me. Had I possessed as much principle as pride, I should have shrunk from such an inquisition; but I have already frankly acknowledged that mine were only the principles which are commonly acquired in the great world, and which seldom interfere with the will of their possessor. They are like a rootless oak, making a noble show until resistance is required of them; but once lean upon them for support, and they give way, and roll their leafy honors in the dust.

I pursued my resolution. I affected the tastes which I knew to be agreeable to my lost lover. I wore the colors he preferred, I avoided the habits which I chanced to hear him condemn; but all was useless. He neither looked nor commented. My ill-success made me nervous and irritable. It was a struggle which I was compelled to bear alone, for I dared not confess to any one the extent of my vain and guilty folly. This fact doubled my suffering; for, naturally expansive, I should have found a certain solace in pouring out all my hopes, and fears, and weakness, to another. The enervating atmosphere of an unbroken solitude of spirit is to that spirit like constant tension to a bow; the spring of each becomes injured by the useless and unprofitable strain upon its strength. Thus it was with me; constantly striving to effect one object, and constantly foiled in my attempts, my temper at last gave way, and I became sullen and imperious.

Dornton expostulated with me. My answer was haughty and impatient. I expected that I should compel a retort, but it was not so. He only smiled compassionately, as he would have done at an exhibition of impotent anger in a spoiled child, and this civil contempt exasperated me. I reproached him with his indifference to my happiness, and even shed tears. I pitied myself that I had become the wife of a man too old to enter into my tastes, or to comprehend my feelings; I profited, in short, by his unpremeditated outburst, to pour forth the full tide of my pent-up emotions; but Dornton remained placidly by my side, unmoved by all the extravagance of my accusations.

"Listen to me, Eveleen," he said at last, "and endeavor to recover your good-humor, without which even your pretty face loses its charm. Look at me! Despite all your reproaches—and you have not spared them—I have remained calm. I am, as you have truly said, too old to enter into your feelings, though perhaps understand them even better than yourself; and it is precisely because I am so much your senior that I cannot afford to hurry on the destructive progress of time, by the withering blight of temper. I am, as you know, a man of the world, and I owe it to that world to be careful of its worshiper. Look at me!" he repeated, assuming an air of playfulness; "why do you turn away your eyes so impatiently! What! a blush, which is not timidity but anger—what means all this?"

I disdained to answer. Sir James drew a chair forward, and seated himself beside me.

"We are in a ridiculous position, Eveleen," he continued, after a short pause; "and one which I would fain have treated more lightly than you now compel me to do. As it is, I will be as serious, if not as energetic as yourself for we have, in truth, a grave subject to discuss."

I shrugged my shoulders, and threw myself back upon my cushions. I was resolved not to yield an inch.

"To be candid with you, my dear girl," pursued my husband, as calmly as though he had been giving an account of his day's shooting; "you have acted very absurdly of late; and if you are not more careful you will compromise yourself terribly. You should consider the imprudence of your system. If you are compromised at your age, you will be superannuated at five-and-twenty; and for what? Nothing, or less than nothing."

I looked up aghast.

"I am quite aware," he resumed, in the same monotonous and unexcited voice, "that the unexpected appearance of a man whom you have loved, and not yet quite forgotten, must necessarily be a trial to you; but you should struggle against so unprofitable a weakness, for your own sake; you should avoid drawing upon yourself the attention of those about you by exhibitions of sullenness and absence of mind; you should have more command over yourself, and more consideration for your husband."

"You insult me!" I exclaimed passionately

"Impossible!" was the reply; "for I do not wrong you. Eveleen, in all that relates to knowledge of the world you are still a child Devereux has piqued your pride; he has over acted his part, and you have emulated him in his folly. There must be an end to this."

"Have you forgotten having once gratuitously informed me that you were not jealous!"

"Jealous!" repeated Dornton, in a tone that would have been contemptuous, had it not been dashed with pain. "And I told you the truth, Lady Dornton. Had it been otherwise—but that is not what I wished to say. You require the counsels of a friend interested in your respectability and happiness; and I am ready to offer them."

"The office of a mentor is doubtlessly more agreeable to you than that of a husband," I said bitterly; "but I will not impose upon you so onerous a task, as that of teaching your wife to disguise her sentiments and play the hypocrite, in order to preserve her honor from the malice of envenomed tongues."

"My anxiety to save you simply proves that I am a rational being; that I foresee the dangers to which your imprudence exposes you; and that I wish to do you a service by preserving your reputation, which, once blighted, can never be restored. Were you more reasonable than you are, I should speak more plainly; but, as it is, we should never understand each other."

"I have already understood too much," I exclaimed indignantly. "You have said with truth, sir, that you are a man of the world; but, knowing this, why did you marry? Why did you place a helpless woman in a position to blush alike for you and for herself?"

"I will not recriminate," said Dornton, with a taunting smile; "and I will add no more than this:—You are entering upon a dangerous career, of which the perils are unknown to you, and of which I possess the clue. I have offered to guide you safely through the labyrinth, and you reproach me for the offer. Would you prefer that I should watch your actions, and listen to your words, in order to discover in them subject of suspicion and discord?—that I should embitter both your life and my own by a ceaseless and senseless jealousy?"

"Yes," I replied angrily, "yes, sir, I should prefer it a thousand times. Your very injustice would be a proof of affection; and anything is preferable to indifference."

"You are a little goose!" laughed Sir James; "you neither know what you say, nor what you wish. The day will yet come, in which you will congratulate yourself upon what you now consider a subject of complaint. Appearances, Eveleen, appearances are the current coin of the world. Watch over them, as the miser watches his hoarded gold. You have wit enough to comprehend that, so long as you can flaunt them in the face of society, your dear five hundred friends will care little for what lies beneath. You are warned—be wary!"

And at the close of this extraordinary and revolting harangue, Sir James rose from his seat, and with an "addio bellissima!" left the room, before I could sufficiently recover myself to utter a word in reply.

I felt stunned. My conviction of the lax morality of my husband had come upon me so suddenly that I was crushed; but, after a time, there rose upon the ruins of respect and gratitude which I had hitherto entertained for him, an emotion of the most withering contempt. This is the most hopeless of all feelings toward a husband. Every other adverse sentiment may be obliterated, or at least ameliorated by time; but contempt is like rust in such a case; the longer it grows, the deeper it eats into the metal, and the more impossible it becomes to remove its trace.

I was no longer a wife in heart, and Dornton was not long in discovering my coldness, but he made no comment upon my conduct. Meanwhile, in the eyes of the world, we were a singularly well-assorted couple, and worthy of envy. We never interfered with each other's avocations or amusements; we were wealthy, and regardless of expense; I was young, fashionable, and admired; Sir James popular and witty. What more could be desired! Who cared what might lurk behind the veil, which, like that upon the altar of Vesta, hid the secrets of the oracle? As my contempt for Sir James deepened, so did my passion for Devereux increase. I became alarmed at last, and tried to believe that I was deluding myself with a spectre, and that when he left Rooksley I should once more cease to be occupied so entirely by one object; but I could not maintain the cheat. The return of his regard was necessary to my happiness; and I eventually came to a compromise with my conscience, and decided that it would suffice to me to secure him hereafter as a friend—only a friend—we could never again be more to each other than friends—but this, at least, we might, and must be. The more I reflected upon this subject, the more distinctly I saw not only the propriety, but even the expediency of the arrangement. We were at present in a false position. Our former attachment was no secret and what did our present marked estrangement imply? The world is censorious. Might it not misinterpret so extraordinary a demonstration of avoidance? I eagerly answered myself in the affirmative. We accept so readily all sophistries which flatter our own wishes.

My resolution was formed. Devereux must be made to comprehend this truth. So far all was easy; but how to effect my purpose was still the question. Lady Madelaine had affected not to perceive the coldness which existed between us; it was consequently evident that she was satisfied with the present state of things, and that no assistance could be expected from her. The mediation of Sir James was equally hopeless, for he would have made the first hint at such an arrangement the subject of a distasteful jest. I could come to no decision.

An expedition to some ruins in the neighborhood had been suggested by Lord Otterford, and eagerly seconded by the guests, when it chanced that, on the morning chosen for the excursion, I awoke fevered and unwell, and found myself compelled to decline so fatiguing an attempt at amusement. The party consequently departed without me, leaving a few civil regrets to replace their society. As I heard the carriages roll from the door, I rejoiced in my temporary solitude; and felt so much relieved by the reflection that I should be alone with my own thoughts for a few hours, that, after luxuriating for a time in this conviction, I resolved to rise and wander through the park. I accordingly made a hasty and careless toilet, and folding my shawl about me, left my room.

As I descended the stairs it struck me that I should do well to provide myself with a book, that, when weary of my own society, I might be sure of a resource; and I accordingly turned toward the library for that purpose. The door stood open, and I had advanced some steps into the room before I became conscious that it was already tenanted. The blood rushed to my heart. Devereux was seated at a small reading-table, placed in the bay of the window. His left hand supported his head, and in his right he held a pen; but he was not writing; he was buried in thought.

"Pray pardon me, Colonel Devereux," I said hurriedly, "I was not aware that you were here."

My voice roused him from his reverie; he rose precipitately, and advanced to meet me like a person suddenly awakened from a deep sleep, who had not yet recovered the control of his actions.

"You have not then been tempted to join the exploring party?" I said, endeavoring to conceal my agitation.

"No, madam."

"And why?"

"What interest could I have taken in an excursion whose —— but you doubtlessly came here in search of something. Can I be useful?"

"Yes, Colonel Devereux; you can join me in a stroll through the park. I was about to take a book as a companion. I will accept your society as a substitute."

He bowed, without making any reply; caught up his hat, offered his arm, and in the next instant we had left the house. For the first few moments we walked forward in silence. Then we talked of the wind, the heat, the picturesque grouping of the forest timber, the tame state of the waterfowl upon the lake,—and while we held this puerile conversation, I felt his arm tremble as it supported mine, and my own heart beat as though it would fain have made its pulsations audible.

Once or twice I almost met his eye as it was hastily averted from my face, and I felt glad of this, for I was conscious that in my simple cambric wrapper, and my close straw bonnet, I must remind him more thoroughly of the Eveleen of former times—the Eveleen whom he had loved—than in the elaborate toilet which I had affected since my marriage. Still, however, he continued silent, or only replied to my observations by a monosyllable. At length I could endure this chilling constraint no longer. My resolution rose up before me, and I determined to take the initiative, since it was evident that he had decided on an opposite course of action.

"Colonel Devereux," I said, with all the calmness which I found it possible to assume; "we have sufficiently discussed both the weather and the beauties of Rooksley; and now we can surely find some more interesting subject of conversation. We are not strangers. Let us be frank toward each other. Why are we so thoroughly estranged? You, without doubt, consider the past more harshly than—perhaps—"

"I have never reproached you, Lady Dornton!"

"You have not. But it is possible that I should have preferred even your reproaches to the cold and cutting displeasure and avoidance that you have exhibited."

"Have I, indeed, made a parade of such feelings? If so, I owe your ladyship an apology for my presumption, and venture to offer it at once."

Tears of mortification started to my eyes.

"Colonel Devereux," I said, somewhat bitterly, "as this is a subject to which we must never again recur, let us, at least, understand each other now. You are strangely altered, and I fear that I have been in some degree the cause of a change which all who regard you must deplore. Believe me that, however circumstances may appear to condemn me—"

"Pray spare alike yourself and me, Lady Dornton. You did not deceive me, I deceived myself. I knew enough of the pliability of your nature to be prepared for all that has occurred. Had it been otherwise, nothing should have induced me to play so supine a part as I have enacted since our separation. Had I been able to trust to your firmness, and to calculate on your coöperation, I would have sacrificed my whole life in the struggle to obtain your hand; but this necessary faith was denied to me; and I was too proud to pursue the heiress, when I was not secure of the affections of the woman."

"Is this generous, Colonel Devereux?"

"I think so; I should be sorry were it otherwise. Am I not borne out in my argument?"

"Can we not forget the past, and be friends?"

"In the eyes of the world? Undoubtedly; although the attempt will appear but a mockery to ourselves."

"In that case let us leave it untried," I exclaimed, as the blood mounted to my brow; "I know not why I am weak enough to hope that my forlorn and cruel destiny can be changed. I should be grateful to you, Colonel Devereux, for completing the bitter lesson which I have studied since my childhood."

"Lady Dornton! Eveleen!" cried Devereux, suddenly grasping my hand, "are you the only victim of the destiny which you deprecate?"

There was an expression in his voice that startled me. I had weakly and wilfully placed myself in a dangerous position. I had advanced to the brink of the precipice knowingly and recklessly; and now, when I felt the ground giving way under my feet, I trembled.

"Listen to me," I said hurriedly, "before you reject my proffered friendship. You are unhappy; you have fits of melancholy, which are not natural either to your age or to your temperament. Need I tell you that I also have my hours of bitterness? The idle triflers by whom we are surrounded have no sympathy with sorrow; they do not guess how grief is sometimes lightened by participation. Like the ephemera that sport in the sunbeams, they disappear on the setting of the brightness to which they owe their being. But we are not like these; let us be friends: the trials of the one will be lessened by sympathy in those of the other. You look surprised—indignant. What can there be in such a proposition to induce either wonder or annoyance?"

"All, Lady Dornton; everything! I congratulate you upon the composure with which you can contemplate the arrangement: I, unfortunately, do not possess an equal share of self-government. I have, indeed, compelled myself to meet you daily, almost hourly, and even to reside under the same roof with you—but my stoicism will scarcely extend further."

"I am to understand, then, Colonel Devereux, that henceforth, save in the interchange of the formalities of society, we are to be strangers?"

"We have no alternative."

I was confounded. There was a shade of sorrow in his accent which checked the words that were rising to my lips, and I instinctively stood still. Devereux paused also, but remained silent. I had withdrawn my hand from his arm; and in order to disguise my agitation I began to tear away the leaves of a shrub beside me. I might have spared myself the subterfuge; for when I at length turned once more toward my companion, he was tracing figures upon the gravel with his cane, as if unconsciously. I felt the necessity of extrication from this self-sought dilemma.

"After your last assertion," I said, "I can no longer affect ignorance of your estimate of my character. All further discussion is needless. When I requested your society I did not anticipate insult; and, least of all, that insult should reach me through you."

"Insult, Lady Dornton! Insult!—Are you making a jest of my struggle to act worthily?"

"Enough, Colonel Devereux, enough!" I interposed with vehemency, "there was no possibility of mistaking your words. And you are right, sir, perfectly right. I have within the last hour heedlessly given you, through a romantic fancy that friendship still existed in the world, an opportunity of misconstruction from which it is your pleasure not to suffer me to escape unscathed. My idle dream is now, however, over; and henceforth I will compel you to respect me."

As I ceased speaking, I bent my head haughtily, and turned toward the house.

"Lady Dornton—Eveleen! You will drive me mad!" exclaimed Devereux, seizing my shawl to detain me; "do you not—can you not understand, that I dare not accept the offer of your friendship—of your confidence—dear and precious as it would be to me? Will you not believe me incapable of indulging a thought which would give you pain? No—you cannot; you do not seek to do this, because you can reason calmly upon the past, and look steadily upon the present. I can do neither; and of this you make a crime."

My heart beat quick; my brow burned; my shawl was still in his grasp.

"You are enigmatical, Colonel Devereux," I remarked coldly, making a second attempt to escape.

"Eveleen—merciless Eveleen! do not abuse your power. You have already made me sufficiently wretched. Spare me now."

"We are both acting childishly," I said, affecting not to remark his emotion; "and have each something to forgive in this interview."

"Much, much," murmured Devereux in a smothered voice. Then, suddenly turning toward me, he added, "Let me at least make expiation for my errors. Let me assure you, Lady Dornton, solemnly assure you, that in all the words which I have uttered this day, there has not been one of which the true meaning was calculated to offend you; and then let me add that I now crave, humbly and earnestly, the proffered friendship, which I was just now mad enough to reject. I will learn of yourself to exercise it with honor and usefulness. Will you not give me your hand!"

I felt that I should have refused to make so sudden a concession, but I could not. All my anger, all my alarm, gave way before the low and earnest tones in which he had addressed me. I laid my hand in his: he carried it respectfully to his lips; and then once more drew it through his arm, and turned to pursue the path which led toward the lake. It was a moment fraught with agitation to both of us. To me it was one of mingled bitterness and triumph; I felt that I was still beloved! The conviction should have made me tremble, but I was too confident in myself to fear. I only whispered mentally, that all the authority of my mother, and all the machinations of my husband, had merely sufficed to sever our hands—over our hearts they had possessed no power!

Meanwhile, as we slowly walked forward in silence, I felt the arm of Devereux press my hand more closely to his side. He, I thought, is, perhaps, at this moment exulting over the same conviction; and I longed to ask him if it were not so; but a feeling of constraint and irresolution had come upon me, and I dared not trust myself with words, although the silence had continued so long, that it had become painful and embarrassing. At length, perceiving that my companion was resolved to render me no assistance, I was about to attempt a renewal of the conversation, when the sound of approaching wheels announced the return of the party, and we at once hastened toward the house.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Lord Otterford, shortly after his return home, opened the letter-bag, and among others, handed a somewhat voluminous packet to myself. My surprise was great to find the superscription in the handwriting of Lady O'Halloran, while the post-mark which it bore was that of Edinburgh. A fortnight had scarcely elapsed since my visit to the Hall, upon which occasion she had made no mention of such a journey. Still painfully agitated by my interview with Devereux, I was glad to retreat to a distant sofa with my letter, marveling, as I crossed the room, what it might portend. It was dated from Glenfillan. My sister was a confirmed and hopeless invalid; and by one of those caprices so usual with the sick, she had written to entreat the presence of Lady O'Halloran in Scotland. The warm-hearted dowager had at once complied with her request; and had obeyed her wishes to the letter, by leaving the neighborhood without informing any of the family of her movements; but, on her arrival at Glenfillan, had found Adela so greatly changed, that she considered it her duty to apprise me of the fact; and also to insist that Lady Flora should write to my mother to the same effect.

"My poor sister is dangerously ill!" I exclaimed, when I had reached the close of the letter, and approached Lady Madelaine. "Have you also heard from Glenfillan, madam?"

"Yes, I have a letter from Lady Flora; she appears to be uneasy about Adela; but old maids always exaggerate evils, and consequently—"

"I assure you," I interposed eagerly, "that there is scarcely room for exaggeration. Lady O'Halloran, who is at present with her, assures me that she has wasted to a shadow; that her physician is almost fearful of administering remedies lest they should consume her slight remains of strength, and that she pertinaciously rejects all his advice."

"Ha! indeed—that intelligence is more serious," replied my mother, looking more annoyed than anxious. "Lady O'Halloran's judgment is not, however, infallible. What on earth could have taken that extraordinary person to Glenfillan! Some people are inexplicable. Adela is always complaining, and creating a sensation in the family. Girls of her age are forever fancying themselves dying, when they are only fostering their own absurd whims. However, Lady Flora will, of course, write again immediately, and if she does not announce any amendment in your sister's health, I must consider what to do."

The idea of sickness and death was so repugnant to me, that I am afraid, under other circumstances, I should have endeavored to share my mother's comfortable self-consolation; but the intelligence had come upon me in a moment of agitation and anxiety, and I felt relieved by the tears which it enabled me to shed. Bad news are almost welcome in such a case, for they form a pretext for the emotion which must otherwise provoke both curiosity and comment; and we consequently feel no inclination to rob them of their just tribute. I wept bitterly, and for a time I cheated myself into the belief that all my tears were shed for my sister. I was no sooner alone, however, than I discovered the fallacy of such a credence, for my thoughts at once reverted to Devereux.

Our recent interview had again plunged me into a state of uncertainty. He had said too much, or not enough. In reviewing my own conduct I was not altogether satisfied, while his appeared to be capricious and enigmatical. I dared not examine too closely the meaning of all his words, and I resolutely dwelt only upon such as might imply either affection, anger, or jealousy, as they were differently interpreted by his listener. I forgot to ask myself what warrant he had for either toward Sir James Dornton's wife.

A few days brought us, as Lady Madelaine had anticipated, fresh letters from Glenfillan.

"You will soon be sisterless," wrote my own correspondent; "each day the disease, be it what it may, becomes more hopeless. Adela no longer looks like a creature of this world. Every tinge of blood has forsaken her cheeks and lips. She moves with difficulty, and cannot walk across the room without support. It is a sore trial to look upon her now, and to think what she might have been; but, for your worthy father's sake, to whom she will so soon be united, I will not leave her till all is over. As for herself, she is perfectly calm, and declares that she desires nothing so much as the moment which is to free her from a world of which she is weary, only on report."

Here, then, was frightful confirmation of our fears; and, despite the considerate declaration of Lady O'Halloran, that Adela looked forward to her death almost with impatience, I could not overcome the horror of the anticipation. I glanced around me upon the luxury to which I was so habituated that I should have heeded it only by its absence, and then on the gushing sunshine which folded all nature in a robe of glory, and lastly on the reflection of my own face, radiant in youth, and health, and beauty, and upon which the tears that were now trickling down left no more trace than does a summer shower upon the blossoms and the leaves.

"No, no," I murmured to myself; "she may bear her yoke bravely, but she cannot wish to leave all these. Poor Adela! so young—scarcely nineteen—how terrible to be struck down, just as she might have learned to cherish life. Surely, surely, there must yet be hope!"

In her letter to my mother, Lady Flora mentioned that their guest had suggested to the invalid the expediency of requesting her presence and my own at Glenfillan, but the resolute manner in which she had replied "Not yet," had convinced them that we should do well to defer our journey for a time. As this arrangement accorded with Lady Madelaine's wishes, she did not hesitate to express her acquiescence in their request, and all my own expostulations were useless.

The season had commenced; and within a week after the receipt of this melancholy intelligence, our party had dispersed only to meet again in town. One of my earliest guests was Devereux; but I was surrounded by morning visitors when he entered the room, and he did not await their departure. As he moved in precisely my own set, I, as a matter of course, met him everywhere; and although no opportunity of recurrence to our last conversation at Rooksley offered itself, and that he was still guarded in his manner, and seldom ventured to show me even those slight attentions which, when there exists no secret consciousness between the parties to lend them a language, signify little or nothing, still I felt that there was no longer so wide a gulf between us. My own house was the one in which he was the least frequently to be found; and he was always careful to come at those hours when, if I chanced to be at home, he was aware that I must be surrounded by guests. Into my opera-box he never ventured, unless he saw that I was attended by Sir James; and this soon became so unusual a circumstance that I doubt if it were remarked when he dropped the habit altogether.

The prestige of the honeymoon was over. The Bride had become a Wife. Sir James was a member of three clubs, where he could lounge all the morning and play all the evening; and it was pleasant to be assured that he had gained the plaudits of all his club-fellows by returning to them unspoiled by his marriage. It is always flattering to a wife to learn that she has worked no reform whatever in the habits of a dissipated husband!

Ere long, I saw little or nothing of Dornton. In the country he had merely fallen off in gallantry; in town he emancipated himself bodily from the thraldom of a married home. He liked to know that his house was frequented by all that was most desirable in London society, and that it was esteemed a favor to be received there as an habitué; but he preferred to ascertain even this fact as news to convincing himself of it personally.

There can be no doubt that my smothered affection for Devereux proved a safeguard to me at that period, and prevented the commission of more than one imprudence, into which my idle vanity would otherwise have hurried me. The language of adulation which met me on all sides, and at all times—the impotent malice of half a dozen fashionable beauties, whom I had, without one effort, bereft of their admirers—the giddy race of pleasure and frivolity which I was running—all conspired to intoxicate my fancy and to delude my heart. Constant letters from the north had satisfied us that, although Adela was slowly and surely sinking, there was no immediate danger of her dissolution; and, as she still resolutely refused to see either Lady Madelaine or myself, I was only too happy to be enabled to turn away from so melancholy a theme of thought, and to sun myself in brighter scenes.

My mother triumphed; five weeks had gone by since we left Rooksley, and Lady O'Halloran admitted, that although the decay of my sister's strength was certain, she had ceased to anticipate so early a result as she had at first looked for, while Lady Flora even talked at random of her youth being enabled ultimately to triumph over the languor under which she was suffering; in short, my mother began to complain, as new letters arrived, of the annoyance of these constant communications on a subject so unimportant as a fit of girlish vapors; they destroyed her comfort and distracted her ideas. Her cause for complaint did not, however, endure much longer—she was not fated to have her nerves worn bare by the unnecessary croaking of two querulous old women, for thus did she always describe the evil under which she declared herself to be martyred. The suspense was not destined to be interminable, nor the martyrdom a lingering one.

While the season was at its height, their majesties signified their intention to visit Drury Lane Theatre in state, and I, in consequence, assembled a party on the day fixed, the whole of whom were to proceed with me to witness the performance. As Sir James declined to participate in the project, my mother and Lord Otterford were among the guests, and our dinner was unusually gay. Lady Madelaine, in high beauty, and conscious of the fact, even exerted herself to fascinate and amuse; and, amid laughter, flattery, and coquetry, we were just about to throw on our cloaks and descend to the carriages, when a servant advanced toward me with a letter. I was about to wave him back, when I perceived upon the superscription the word "Immediate," and I saw at a glance that Lady O'Halloran was my correspondent. I seized the letter, and hurriedly tore it open: "Eveleen," thus it ran, "if you, indeed, wish once more to see your sister in this world, lose not a moment. She now entreats your presence and that of her mother. Do not delay an hour, or you may arrive too late."

In my agitation and horror I read these few fatal lines aloud, and then I turned to ascertain their effect upon Lady Madelaine. For a moment she stood speechless and aghast, the jewels sparkling upon her pallid brow and the velvet shivering above her trembling limbs; then, suddenly throwing herself upon a sofa, she buried her face in her spread hands, and continued silent.

This silence alarmed me. Even overcome as I was by the sudden shock, I had been for so many years prepared for the most extraordinary proceedings on the part of my mother, where her own convenience and comfort were involved, that I augured ill of the pause which had followed so immediately upon the reading of this letter; and, fearful that she would disobey the summons (strong in her horror of death, and her aversion to my dying sister), I hastened to forestall her purpose, should she have contemplated such a refusal. I scarcely knew myself; I did not shed a tear; but calmly and earnestly I issued all the necessary orders for our immediate departure; and I was about to dispatch messengers to the different clubs in search of Sir James, in order that he might accompany us on our journey, when Lord Otterford interposed:—

"It is useless, my dear Lady Dornton," he said, in an accent of perfect conviction; "send to inform Sir James, if you will, of your proposed departure; but make no arrangement for his own. He will not leave town upon such an errand."

I was too much agitated at the moment to remark the singularity of this assertion. I only felt the awkwardness of the fact.

"Are we, then, to travel to the north alone?" I asked, in some alarm.

"I will be your escort; but we must rouse your mother, in order that she may hasten home, and put on her traveling dress. We will be ready for you when you drive to the door."

During this short scene, which passed even more rapidly than it can be described, my guests had begun silently to depart, while Lady Madelaine still sat supine upon the sofa. Her face was so completely concealed that it was impossible to decide under what nature or degree of emotion she was laboring. While Lord Otterford advanced toward her, I met the eyes of Devereux, who had been one of the last to retire. They were full of acute grief. Involuntarily I extended my hand toward him, and he held it for a moment as he murmured, "Poor Eveleen, could not this, at least, have been spared to you?"

These few words unlocked the channel of my tears. As he left the room I looked after him in anguish. Would he have abandoned me at such a moment? Surely, surely, if I had wronged him, he was now revenged.

When my mother rose, and, leaning heavily upon the arm of Lord Otterford, prepared to leave the room, she was as pale as marble, and trembled painfully; but there was a strange expression in her eye which made me shrink. It was evident that she had not shed a tear. She was about to pass me in silence, when I ventured to request that she would endeavor to rally her energies for our long and rapid journey, and to assure her that I would be in Grosvenor Square within the hour.

"I do not doubt it," she replied, in a harsh voice, totally unlike her usually musical accents "You are evidently too eager for this ill-timed undertaking to throw any impediment in the way of its commencement; but you have been somewhat hasty in compromising me in so marked a manner, without waiting to ascertain, in the first place, my own pleasure upon the subject."

"I thought, madam, that you would not refuse the dying summons of my sister."

"Perhaps so; but you should first have satisfied yourself of this fact, or have permitted me to issue my own orders. I do not believe that Adela has expressed a wish to see me. I am satisfied of the contrary. Old women are fond of scenes; it is their revenge upon the habitual monotony of their dreary existence. It is those about her who have committed this act of folly. However, thanks to your want of caution, I am now the slave of circumstances and must submit. Be at my door when you will, Lady Dornton; you shall experience no delay through me."

After this unsatisfactory dialogue, she swept from the room, and I heard her drive off as I reached my own apartment. The more I pondered on her extraordinary conduct at such a crisis, the more inexplicable it appeared. I even doubted at times if she could, indeed, be the mother of Adela. I had, however, little leisure for mental speculation; the grumbling Joséphine augmented most carefully all the little difficulties of a prompt departure, and created a thousand unnecessary delays; but, despite all these, and the fact that the horses had been at the door above an hour before I could effect my departure, I saw nothing of Sir James. He had, probably, been engaged in a rubber of whist, or involved in a heavy stake at rouge et noir.

As I at last stepped into the carriage, I thought of Devereux, and sighed.

CHAPTER XLIV

In the midst of a vast and lofty chamber, hung with faded tapestry, and heavy with its ponderous cornices, its carved doors, and its gigantic mantel of dark oak, stood an antique bedstead of the same material, curtained with the voluminous folds of a crimson satin damask which had once been regal in its richness, but upon which the hand of time had long impressed its touch. These gloomy curtains were drawn aside to admit a flood of sunshine, which, after bathing a range of heathery hills in the distance, and making the surface of a far-off loch shimmer like a myriad of golden stars, came, glorious in the fulness of its power, to peer into that ancient room, and to invest it for one brief hour with all the brightness of which it had been bereft by the withering waste of a century.

That sun-flood fell upon antique porcelain and grotesque ornaments of another age, and without even a name in ours; while, strangely blent with these, it threw out into broad relief a few plain, modern articles of usefulness, evidently selected without any regard either to their beauty or their luxury. A reading-chair, a desk, a book-case, whose pigmy proportions were almost ludicrous in that spacious room, a few fine engravings in frames of ebony, but all expressive of some subject of suffering or terror, were among these. But not a flower, not an instrument of music, not a vestige of female occupancy could be discovered there; and yet, upon the damask-curtained bed, and fully exposed to all the fervor of the bright May sun, lay a pale girl, just at that lovely age when hope and joy should be the sister-twins of life. Her eyes were closed, but it was easy to see that they were not closed in sleep: her long hair was swept back from her brow, and was scattered like threads of gold over the pillow; her hands were tightly clenched above her head, and the long livid fingers looked as though they no longer retained strength to free themselves from their self-sought grasp. Her breathing was convulsive, and her hot breath had parched the thin blue lips through which it forced its passage; at times her features were distorted by a spasm of pain, and her eyes opened instinctively, but the transparent lids fell once more over them as the convulsion weakened.

Beside the bed knelt two aged women, one of whom was frantic in her grief; and who, had she not been restrained by her companion would have disturbed, by her clamorous wailings, the silence of the death-room; the other, tearless, but bowed by sorrow, passed from time to time, with a gentle hand, a handkerchief across the brow of the dying girl, upon which dank drops of moisture gathered after every struggle.

"Adela, my love," whispered this tender nurse, as she leant softly toward her, just as she had performed this careful office; "have you strength to bear the exertion? Your wish is granted; Lady Madelaine and your sister are here."

The effect of this announcement was electrical. My sister—for it was indeed she—suddenly opened her eyes, which were dilated, and full of a strange brightness that was almost scorching. She unclasped her fleshless fingers, pressed her hands convulsively upon her bosom, and for a moment appeared to be struggling with an emotion which almost overcame her waning strength. But as Lady Madelaine approached the bed, and would have taken her hand, she waved her off imperiously; and, in a deep, harsh, laboring voice, she said bitterly:

"Not now, madam, not here; this is my death-bed that you have come to look upon; and all acting is over—approach, nevertheless: come and contemplate your work—come and gaze upon your victim. It was for this I bade you here—it was for this that, for the first time in my life, I have wished and watched for you."

"Adela, my dear Adela—" expostulated the shuddering Lady O'Halloran.

"Let me speak," persisted the dying girl. "Even you, my more than mother—if, indeed, the name of mother can imply tenderness, and patience, and affection, and self-abnegation—as I have read in books that it should do—even you I can no longer obey. Bear with me only for a few hours more, and I shall have done with this world."

From the moment of my entrance into the death-room I had remained concealed from my sister by the curtains of her bed. I felt riveted to the earth, and had not courage to advance a step. I might, perhaps, after a time, have overcome this emotion; but the words to which I listened, and the unearthly tones in which they were uttered, rendered me powerless.

"You have been at least consistent, madam," resumed Adela, so soon as she had recovered from a violent spasm which appeared to rend her chest; "you have been no fickle spirit, no weak hater! I will say nothing of my childhood—but when that was past, did you not wring my heart as never heart was wrung?—did you not thrust happiness upon me, and, when I almost clutched it wrench it away with a withering smile, and bid me bear the trial as I might! you left me no alternative save an early death, or a life of bitterness and humiliation. I have made my choice—it is that which will the best suit your views and wishes—I am about to die: but, madam, I die fearlessly, because I know that there is another world for you as well as for myself."

As the panting girl paused to take breath, Lady Madelaine sank into a chair beside her with a deep groan

"A world of justice," pursued the failing voice, "where the Lazarus of the earth will have the sores of his spirit healed—where the great ones of this life will find their purple and fine linen rent away, and their hearts, with all their miserable, petty passions, laid bare—that world awaits even you, madam,—you, the unloving wife, and the unnatural mother; you, and the tool of your selfishness; the weak and unstable being who has helped you on in your unholy work. May his falsehood be visited upon himself; and may she to whom—"

Thoroughly exhausted by the efforts which she had made, the power of the dying girl abandoned her at once, before she could render the remainder of her sentence audible; the few additional words which fell from her lips were disjointed and meaningless; and, as she sank back heavily upon the pillow, a frightful spasm convulsed her features and distorted her limbs for a few seconds, during which I firmly imagined that she had ceased to exist; but it was not so. When the terrible paroxysm had passed over, she once more opened her eyes; and as they rested on the form of Lady Madelaine, who still retained her attitude of horror-stricken immobility, an expression of intense hatred passed over her features.

"Let her leave me," she gasped out, addressing Lady O'Halloran; "let her leave me —I would, at least, die in peace."

The kind-hearted dowager approached my mother with an extended hand: "Let us retire, madam," she whispered; "your child has need of rest."

Passively and mutely Lady Madelaine obeyed. She took the proffered hand as if to secure its support; and, without once looking toward the death-bed, she left the room, in which nothing was audible save the low and labored breathing of her last-born child. I followed with a tottering and uncertain step.

The near neighborhood of a dying bed would at any time have shaken my nerves—while this was not only that of my sister, but what a death-bed! The peace of spirit, the tears of tenderness, the words of consolation—all had been absent. The spirit hovering between earth and heaven, and which must, ere long, appear before the tribunal whose dread fiat involves an eternity, had elevated itself into a judge; and I had seen the haughty nature of my mother quail and shrink before it. The words of Adela, which were vividly impressed upon my memory, filled me with a vague and undefined terror. My blood, frozen by the spectacle of decay and ruin which my first gaze into the death-room had revealed to me, and chilled more and more by the fearful tones of the invalid, suddenly, as I escaped from her presence, rushed to my heart, and circulated so rapidly that it appeared to suffocate me. That voice of bitter despair—of unyielding vengeance—was still in my ears; that pale and unearthly face was still before my eyes. When I threw myself upon a seat in the room which had been hastily prepared for me, I felt as though the awful memories of the last hour would embitter all my future life. My horror was not lessened by the fact that I could not comprehend upon what the reproaches which my sister had addressed to Lady Madelaine were based; while my astonishment at the patience with which they were supported by her imperious nature, was beyond my power to explain. I could only attribute it to the agitated powerlessness of surprise, or to that solemn respect which is always conceded to the dying.

So soon as I was able in some degree to control my feelings, I desired to be conducted to the apartment of Lady Madelaine. I found her seated, pale and tearless, in the attitude of a person more indignant than depressed At the sound of my approach she turned toward me, and a deep flush spread over her brow, while her eyes flashed with animation. She looked at me steadily for a moment, and then averted her head, and appeared to hesitate, as though she had not altogether decided upon the line of conduct which she should pursue.

"This has been a bitter trial to you," I said, as I placed myself beside her, and would have taken her hand, which was haughtily withdrawn; "I fear there is no longer any hope."

"Hope! of what?" she asked bitterly; "do you mean a hope of the recovery of Miss Tilden? You are well advised to wish it. But I have no inclination to waste time upon your weak romance. Are you satisfied now that you have exposed me to the frightful scene through which I have just passed?—that you have subjected me to insult before a groveling relative, a distasteful acquaintance, and my own child? A secret instinct forewarned me—I would have obeyed it. It was not your pleasure that I should be spared. You placed me under the necessity of condescending to this annoyance, or of becoming the mark for a thousand envenomed surmises. It is you whom I have to thank for all—you, and your odious precipitation. So long as I have life I will never forgive you this!"

I was so accustomed to the violence of my mother, that this strangely-timed outburst would scarcely have surprised me, had it taken another tone; but I was altogether unprepared to be made its object. Already weakened, both in mind and body, by the different emotions which had agitated me so painfully, all my remaining strength gave way before this tide of accusation; and I sank to my knees, crushed and quailing, as though I had indeed been guilty of some crime for which I needed the pardon of a parent. I sobbed out I know not what. I talked of the tie between us, of my dying sister, of my own bruised and blighted heart; I sought to appease my mother by promises, by caresses, and by submission; but I humbled myself in vain: for some time she maintained a resolute silence, while her heaving bosom, her burning cheek, and her flashing eye gave evidence of the tempest that was raging within her. At length she rose, and flinging from her the hand in which I had clasped her own, she said, haughtily, "Be silent and leave me—I wish to be alone."

There was no disputing a command uttered in such a tone; and, wondering as I did so at the violence of the impulse which could have compelled me to such an act of self-abasement, I rose from my knees, and quitted the room in silence. I heard Lady Madelaine ring her bell before I had crossed the antechamber; and as her woman obeyed the summons, she desired that Lord Otterford should be requested to join her in her apartment. It was not, therefore, silence which she coveted.

It was some time before I could recover myself sufficiently for thought; but, when the power of reflection did at last return, I felt as though I were under some strange and unholy spell. All that had taken place within the last few hours was so extraordinary that I lost myself in the wildest and most irrational conjectures. Why did Adela accuse Lady Madelaine of her death, when the exile to which she had submitted herself was voluntary? What meant this death, which she asserted to be her own choice? This happiness of which she declared herself to have been treacherously deprived? This perfidious and weak being by whom she had been abandoned? Who, finally, was that third person whom want of strength alone had prevented her from including in her anathema? Why had Lady Madelaine, even while she was loaded with reproaches, borne all in silence? Had terror and compunction stifled the voice of resentment? Was it natural that a child could have acquired so much power over her impetuous nature if her conscience did not whisper to her the justification of those reproaches?

These were the questions which rose rapidly to my mind; but which remained successively unanswered. I was in the midst of doubt; fearing alike to misunderstand what I saw, or to understand too much, when a slight sound caused me to start and look up. Lady O'Halloran stood before me; and I was about to fling myself upon her bosom, when I was struck by the extraordinary expression of her face.

The truth flashed upon me instantly. "All is then over!" I murmured, while a cold shudder ran through my veins.

"Yes! all is over. Her sufferings are at an end."

"Alas!" I exclaimed, as I sank back powerless upon my seat; "dare we indeed hope so? I am still quailing under the impression of her last mysterious words. Did you, dearest Lady O'Halloran, did you—see her die?"

"I did not. A heavy faintness came over me after I had led your mother from the room, and I was consequently absent, for she did not long survive the awful spirit-struggle in which she had engaged; but I already knew all her wishes, and had promised to perform them."

"Can I assist in the solemn duty?"

"You are, at least, particularly concerned in it."

"What does she desire me to do? I pledge myself, be it what it may, and at whatever sacrifice, to obey her bidding."

"I expected no less from you, Eveleen; and feel convinced that you will not falsify your words. I know not the subject of her anxiety, but this packet will inform you." And as she spoke, she placed in my hand a voluminous letter, which was evidently composed of several sheets. I was about to tear it open upon the instant, when by a hurried gesture she prevented my breaking the seal, and pointed emphatically to the superscription, upon which I read: "To be opened only under her own roof, as she values my memory."

"She shall be obeyed," I said, as I placed the letter in my dressing-case, and then carefully withdrew the key. "But have you no suspicion of its contents?"

"None. Adela told me no more than that it contained information on points of interest with which it was necessary you should be acquainted immediately that she had ceased to exist. I respected both her secret and yours, and asked no questions."

I could thank her only with my tears.

"Do not weep for her, Eveleen, weep for yourself," said Lady O'Halloran, compassionately. "It is now too late to grieve over her trials, for they are ended. Yours, my child, I fear, are but beginning. May she so resolutely have expended her little remaining strength, in order to comfort you with a sister's love, and a sister's counsel. That last token of her remembrance occupied many, many of her latest hours of comparative ease and health. She appeared to forget alike her languor and her sufferings while she was engaged upon it. It was in vain that her physician, Lady Flora, and myself warned her of the probable effect of such continual exertion; her constant reply to all our expostulations was an assurance that she should live to complete her task, and that she desired no more."

"Poor Adela!" I murmured, wringing my hands in remorse of spirit.

"Poor Adela!" echoed my companion; "she is now united to the only parent who loved her."

"She is happier than myself," I sobbed painfully.

"But she purchased her happiness dearly, Eveleen. A long life of bitterness was crushed into her nineteen years of blighted existence."

"I know it—I know it; and I did so little to alleviate her sorrows—I so soon forgot her absence."

"The world's lessons are readily learned," said the dowager; "but I must leave you now. My usefulness is at an end, and I am sinking with fatigue. Lady Madelaine has been already informed of the melancholy event, and her horses are ordered for to-morrow at daybreak, as she has declined attempting to obtain some rest. You will accompany her."

"And yourself!"

"Adela exacted that I should see her laid in the tomb of her ancestors. I promised, and I will perform. Lord Otterford remains to share in the pious task, after which I shall accompany him to town."

"And why should I not also follow her to the grave? Let Lady Madelaine depart alone, if she is anxious to escape."

"And the packet?"

"True—true—I know not what it may contain, nor the duties which it may enforce Perhaps the delay of a day may be fatal to her wishes. I will be ready at daybreak."

"Farewell then, my dear Eveleen; I have already taken leave of your mother, and am unequal to another interview, even with yourself. Farewell; and should you ever want a friend, remember me."

She extended her arms, and I threw myself into them. I could not utter a syllable; but she understood my emotion; and after having pressed her lips affectionately to my forehead, she replaced me gently in my chair, rung for Josephine, and left the room.

CHAPTER XLV.

My journey back to town was a wretched one. Prostrated by the emotions I had so recently experienced, and haunted by the memory of the fearful death-bed from which I had only just escaped, I could not have been condemned to a more trying companionship than that of Lady Madelaine. By turns conciliating and threatening, at intervals she fulminated against me the most bitter reproaches for the trial to which she had been subjected by my hasty presumption; and at others she reminded me that Adela had never been either a daughter or a sister to herself and me, and hinted at the immense increase of fortune which necessarily accrued to me through her death. The last argument was powerless. Had I not already experienced the insufficiency of wealth to secure happiness?

I thought incessantly of my hidden packet. It was evident that my mother knew nothing of this bequest; for I learned from Josephine, that immediately after the death of Adela, she had demanded her keys and her writing-desk, and had read and destroyed all the papers that it contained. I was doubly anxious, therefore, to ascertain the contents of that which I possessed; and exhausted alike by the inconsistent humor of Lady Madelaine, my own feelings, and the thirst for opportunity to learn the last wishes and sentiments of my sister, I fancied every minute an hour until we at length arrived in London.

To my great relief my mother suggested that I should leave her in Grosvenor Square, and at once proceed to my own house, alleging, as her reason, the necessity of forthwith making arrangements for our mourning, and adopting some resolution regarding our future movements, until the period when we could again appear with propriety in public. She said something, also, of the inconvenience of a death in the family just in the height of the season; but as I did not perfectly hear the remark, and was, moreover, anxious not to enlighten myself further upon the subject, I made no comment upon her words, querulously as they were uttered.

On entering my home I was by no means surprised to learn that Sir James was absent; but I was not the less satisfied with the assurance. I hastened at once to my dressing-room, threw off my traveling attire, ordered chocolate and lights, and then, having dismissed Josephine with strict injunctions not to suffer any one to intrude upon me, even should Sir James himself return, as I was overcome by fatigue, and felt the necessity of being alone for a time, I threw myself back in my chair, and was for several minutes unable to summon sufficient courage to open the packet which for so many hours I had been pining to read. My dressing-case stood near me, and in it was contained this mournful communication—this voice from the grave—this last solemn declaration which my sister had not deigned to make from her own lips.

What was I to learn? Would she reproach me with my coldness, my carelessness? Or had she, chastened by her approach to that mysterious world toward which she had, during the moments in which it was written, been so surely tending, bequeathed to me the one outpouring gush of tenderness in which she had concentrated the sisterly sympathies of her whole life? I felt as though I were alone with the dead—with the cold, wasted, livid corse of her upon whose dying lips there had quivered neither blessing nor prayer; and I shuddered as I glanced tremblingly about me. But my eyes rested upon no object in unison with the gloominess of such a mood of mind; all around me was luxurious, costly, fresh, and cheerful; and, at length, I shook off the feeling of mental and physical weakness to which I had yielded, and withdrew the papers from their envelope. I must transcribe them as they lay before me. Any attempt at a description of their contents would be still more painful even now, though long and weary years have elapsed since they were put into my hands, than to follow them word by word, and line by line, with a faithful pen.

I broke the seal with quivering fingers. I had argued myself into a state of doubtful courage: I had tried to believe that they would enable me to dwell with greater tenderness upon the memory of my sister, more than ever darkened by that last fatal scene to which I had been a trembling witness; but, as I felt the wax give way beneath my touch, this trust abandoned me.

It is through the most trifling agencies that deep sorrow generally enters into the heart of a woman; from the most inconsequent springs that the full consciousness of her unhappiness is filtrated into her entire being. An indistinct whisper—a word overheard by chance—a gloom upon the countenance of a friend whose usual greeting is a smile—all these become prophecies by an intuitive faculty, incomprehensible even to herself, and which is called into existence on the eve of a misfortune destined to give its color to her future fate; and she murmurs to herself, "I am about to be wretched," with the same innate conviction as that of the wild bird, to which the trembling of the foliage, and the wail of the wind as it sweeps over the high grass and along the surface of the water, reveal the approach of the yet unseen storm.

No wonder, then, if trifles such as these can obtrude their warning, that as I unfolded the papers which were to reveal to me alike the present and the past, and to make the future a blank, no wonder that I trembled.

"I am standing upon the brink of that grave in which my youth and my sorrows will soon be alike buried; but not, as I have reason to believe, alike forgotten. You intruded your confidence on me, Eveleen, to the ruin of all the happiness which this earth might yet have yielded as a requital for the trials of my youth. I am now about to pay the debt. I also will reveal the secret of my life to you; and the result will in your case be without doubt the same; if, indeed, the world to which you have vowed yourself has not quite done its work."—

My agitation increased with every sentence. I could scarcely breathe from terror! What was I about to learn! What meant this ominous threat to reveal a secret which was to plunge me into misery! I swept back the hair from my forehead. The moisture which had risen to my eyes had disappeared. I was fevered by a terrible anticipation. Again I fastened my eyes upon the writing. It was firm and flowing—not a pulse of the writer had quivered. I proceeded.

"Fear and hatred were the first feelings which were taught to expand in my young heart. When I became old enough to comprehend my position, I found myself an alien from my family—branded like Cain—but, unlike him, guiltless of the crime, while suffering its penalty. I learnt to pronounce the name of my mother only to shrink before the idea that it called up—of my sister, only to quail before a humiliating and bitter comparison. The victim of injustice and disregard, I soon began to look into my own heart, and to pay back in distrust and indignation, the wrongs of which I was keenly susceptible.

"The frivolous, but dazzling advantages which you had received from the education bestowed upon you; your luxury, your indulgence, and the insolent vanity which was their fruit, contrasted with my own privations, continued to do their slow but certain work; and when we met at Rooksley for the first time, I know not which was the most distasteful to me, yourself, or she whom, in its wrath, heaven gave me as a mother.

"After a time your advances toward friendship, and the consciousness that my own acquirements and character were very superior to those which I had so long held in jealous dread, almost reconciled me to a trial of your real feelings; but I was not long in discovering that you were a mere puppet, whose wires were in the hands of Lady O'Halloran; that your lip-deep courtesies to your only sister were simply a concession to the friend of your father; and that your heart was, as it ever had been, centered in self, and totally independent of your words.

"You know that I never on my side cheated you with false seeming; you know how frankly and truthfully I told you that you were incapable of real affection. Oh, that I had retained that belief strongly to the last; and that your idle words, and still more idle tears, when you compelled me to become the confidant of your fancied passion for Devereux, had not led me to believe that even you could love another than yourself. Why are certain expressions made only to be profaned? Why are you, and such as you, who are not formed for the higher and holier impulses of our nature, permitted to bandy words and tones, of which you can neither estimate the force, nor comprehend the value? But these are questions beyond my own reach, and I will not look to you for a reply. In my delusion, I began to love because I pitied you; but the arrogant triumph of your farewell, when you were summoned from our common exile to appear once more beside Lady Madelaine in the gay world for which you panted, soon destroyed the charm.

"Do you remember that in expatiating upon your love for Devereux, you scouted with contempt the suggestion which I made, that your mother wished to make you the wife of another—of one who—in short, of Sir James Dornton? Why should I shrink from naming a man whom, from my inmost soul, I despise beyond all else on earth? Do you remember with what fierce and feverish indignation you repelled the idea? Should you, indeed, have ceased to do so, call back your thoughts—the time is still too recent to require a great effort of memory.

"On my part, your astonished look was not unobserved, when Lady Flora and myself returned the greeting of Sir James on his visit to Rooksley during Lady Madelaine's widowhood, as that of one to whom we were not altogether strangers. The cause was simple: he was grouse-shooting in Scotland, when Lady Madelaine saw fit to summon me at last to what should have been the home of my infancy; and, at her request, he took charge of us to London; but I was at that period so mere a girl, and, moreover, so preoccupied by the approaching change in my position, that I should have forgotten his existence, had not your passionate invectives taught me to believe that you did him less than justice. Yes, Lady Dornton, you it was who first awoke in my heart that feeling of interest in his fate, which those who have themselves suffered from injustice, naturally extend to their fellow-victims.

"I had lived a life of utter isolation. My studies, unlike your own, had been grave and serious. Your experience, real and acquired, startled and enlightened me. I began to understand that I also might, at some future time, find beyond the circle of my own family, that tenderness which had been denied to me within it. I began to listen with more eagerness, and to reflect with more precision; and after a while I combined with my own visions the image of a man who like myself was despised, and probably misjudged. Do not imagine, however, that I even tried to fancy that I loved him: my feelings, unlike your own, were not the sport of impulse and romance: to me he was only a reposing point for my unloved and solitary spirit: an object from which I did not shrink because it had never causelessly and wantonly repelled me. I am not asking for your sympathy: to me even at that moment it would have been valueless: judge, therefore, what it must be now.

"You left Rooksley, and I wept when I lost sight of you—but it was not your departure that I mourned: it was this new wrong done to myself. You had, however, left your influence behind. You had opened up a new world to my solitary musings, and made me feel that solitude tenfold more bitter. I longed to annihilate time, and to attain the age when I also should be introduced into the world: not to pamper myself with its vanities, not to pollute myself with its deceit, not to degrade myself by its falsehood, but simply and solely to commence my search after that one only being who was to be to me—to the poor unloved and deserted Adela—at once a fond protector and a tender friend. Surely I did not ask too much of fate! I was willing to receive this boon as a compensation for all else on earth. Others have so many to love them—I only asked for one, and that one ——but all this is worse than idle: there is another feeling in the human breast fiercer and quite as firm as love. I shall not have died before I learn it.

"You are, perhaps, not aware that ere you had been long in town our mother made a hurried journey to Rooksley: the pretext was some forgotten papers, too precious to be intrusted to indifferent hands. Certain it is that she was accompanied by Sir James Dornton. I was in the park when they arrived, and to my surprise was summoned to receive them. This was an unexpected, and would have been an equally unwelcome attention on the part of Lady Madelaine, who was not apt so promptly to remember my existence, had I not been also informed who was her companion. Curiosity at once overcame every other feeling. I should, at least, have an opportunity of judging by my own observations in how far he merited the disdain and dislike with which you had overwhelmed him, and I hastened to return to the house.

"It is probable that my hurried walk had given a glow to my complexion, for—I remember it well, as it was the first and only time that it occurred—Lady Madelaine herself glanced at me with complacency, and even deigned to utter a few words of approbation at my altered appearance, as Sir James approached to greet me. How different did he appear from the picture that you had sketched! He looked steadily, almost searchingly upon me, with a smile before which my eyes fell, while I felt the rushing blood crimson my cheeks and forehead. His voice was low and soft as he addressed me; and whenever I subsequently glanced toward him, I still met the almost ardent gaze which thrilled to my very heart. I listened eagerly to his conversation with my mother, in which he betrayed a constant anxiety to include me, but I was at that moment less than ever capable of exertion. Nevertheless I felt that, for the first time in my life, I was not altogether overlooked. On one occasion, when Lady Madelaine was engrossed for a few instants by her sister, Sir James addressed himself to me, and exerted all his powers, and they are great—what is there on earth more brilliant than the scaled coat of the serpent whose bite is poison?—all his graceful eloquence, to convince me that, in his eyes at least, I was worthy of regard and courtesy: and I welcomed the soothing effort as the parched wilderness welcomes the refreshing dew of heaven.

"The papers, as Lady Madelaine asserted, were found; and once more Rooksley was restored to its monotony; but its gloom was gone. As I saw them drive from the door, all had become more bright about me: I was a new being. Something whispered me that Sir James was not gone forever: that the papers had been an imaginary want; and that I was the actual object of this visit. But how? the blood leapt to my heart: I remembered with an indescribable thrill of delight that my mother had reminded me that in another week I should be sixteen years of age, and that it was time for me to be more careful of my appearance. I was full of a mysterious joy. I should not, probably, so readily have combined circumstances apparently so trifling: and decidedly I should never have been so powerfully affected by what were, after all, the mere courtesies of a man of fashion and my mother's friend, had not your superior knowledge taught me where and how to form the combinations. As it was, however, the new sentiment by which I was inspired exalted me in my own eyes. I was more than ever convinced of the possibility that I should one day be loved as others were; and to the curiosity which I had felt regarding Sir James, there succeeded the gratitude due to the man who had first afforded me a brighter glimpse of the cheering and sustaining prospect.

A week passed away—a week of bright and happy dreams; when once more Sir James Dornton arrived at Rooksley. I was agitated with joy, but that joy was unmixed with surprise. I had had, from the hour of his departure, an intuitive conviction of his prompt return. He also had his pretext. He came at the request of my mother, but he did not explain the cause of her sudden solicitude, nor did I waste one word on the inquiry. In her absence I was less constrained: for a few hours I was his hostess, and I exerted myself to do the honors worthily. After dinner he proposed a saunter through the grounds.

"Lady Flora, according to her daily habit, was already half asleep in her chair, and declined to accompany us; the eyes of Sir James flashed with delight; and in five minutes we were buried in the shrubberies.

"I do not spare you one detail, Eveleen. You are proud of your destiny. Poor tool of another's will! Married to a man who never loved you, at the bidding of a mother who consulted only her own interest in the disposal of your hand.

"What had I to fear? Lady Flora slept: and for her, during the next few hours, time was consequently annihilated, while I leant upon the arm of the first being who had given me a value in my own eyes. Is it then marvelous that an hour had not elapsed since we left the house, ere I ascertained that Lady Madelaine knew nothing of this visit? or wonderful that when I expressed my fear of her displeasure, he should find it an easy task to allay that fear? Let those who seek to blame me appreciate my position.

"Before we parted I felt that I was loved. What woman can be deceived when the feeling is not feigned? I did not wish to receive an assurance that it was so, but rather thanked in my heart the delicacy which left the decisive words as yet unuttered. Occasionally, as we conversed, my companion looked earnestly at me, and listened with an eagerness to which all flattery would have been inadequate. By a single word, a single look, he encouraged me to continue speaking; and I was proudly conscious that every hour I had risen in his esteem. The brilliant man of the world hung upon the fresh and unfettered fancies, upon the gravest feelings of a mere girl, the pupil of the mountains, and of their sublime and soul-strengthening silence. Yes! he may have sold his soul, bartered his honor, and sullied his self-esteem by becoming the husband of another; but I go to my grave with the consolatory conviction that from that eventful evening he has loved me only!

"Again, and again he came, and ere long was his betrothed wife. I knew nothing of the after-machinations of Lady Madelaine. He confided to me simply that she had consented to our marriage, but at her own good time; and that, in the interval, we were only to meet in her presence. This declaration alarmed me, for I had everything to dread from the involuntary indiscretion of Lady Flora, who believed his visits to be not only sanctioned, but even suggested by her sister, and who had never entertained the slightest suspicion of our mutual attachment.

"Sir James reluctantly acceded to the justice of my fears; and his declared visits to Rooksley gradually declined, and at length were entirely suspended. I saw him still, however, at frequent intervals; and when he failed to present himself at our appointed rendezvous, he was replaced by his letters. He was to be my husband! I was content with this assurance; the when, never occupied my thoughts. My happiness was so immense that it afforded space neither for fear nor hope. I lived in the present. Satisfied of the truth of his affection, I had acknowledged mine with the usual frankness of my nature. Ignorant of the usages of the world on such occasions, and still more so of the perfidy by which that happy ignorance might be repaid, I laid my whole heart before him, and did not hesitate to let him know that henceforward my existence depended utterly upon himself. Had I acted otherwise, I should have been self-despised for my own vain and empty heartlessness.

"Here, on my death-bed, when my extended hand scarcely suffices to veil the night-lamp from my eyes, but like a transparent film only softens what in the days of health it would have darkened—yes, even here, and now, I can look back upon those hours, and feel that once indeed I lived!"

CHAPTER XLVI.

I LAID the manuscript upon the table: my tears had blinded me. Poor Adela! I forgave all her invectives against myself, bitter as they were—I even forgot for a time the fearful nature of my own position—I only felt that I pitied her, and would have called her for an instant from her grave to tell her that she was revenged—for that in my turn I did not love this man. After a time I resumed my painful task.

"Eveleen! had you really been capable of the attachment for which you proudly claimed belief—before you forfeited it forever—you would understand my feelings when the visits of Sir James suddenly ceased, and his letters became changed. You, however, would not, perhaps, have perceived that change; or had you chanced to do so, might probably have deemed it matter of self-gratulation, for they were, if not as lengthy as ever, tenfold more full of protestations and endearing epithets. But I had studied him closely, and was not to be so deceived.

"The ore of true passion was no longer there, and the base counterfeit of eloquent adulation was substituted in its place. All was constraint and effort. He wrote like a man above whose head was suspended the sword of a modern Damocles—who quailed before some anticipated danger. My pride revolted at the conviction: but alas! that wholesome pride was subdued beneath a more powerful feeling. I have told you—not now, nor here—but long, long ago, when you first taught me to reason on such subjects; I told you then that I could not love as you did, with one hand clasped in that of my husband, and the other extended to beckon to the world to come between us—but wholly and exclusively. Unlike yours, my practice does not gainsay my precepts; and this man was to be my husband—could I then see without agony even one vapor of doubt arise to separate us? No—no—the stake for which I played was not merely my happiness, it was my life, and I could not afford to lose it lightly.

"I answered his letters by one line; 'Come,' I said, 'if you would ever again see me in this world,' and then I drew close the curtains to shut out the sunshine, that, after smiling on my happiness, now, with the same hot glare, seemed to mock my anguish; and in the sudden twilight of my darkened chamber, I sat down to reflect upon the misery which I felt was about to come upon me.

"I once read of a man subjected by an awful tribunal to torture. He was alone, in utter darkness, bound hand and foot upon a couch furnished with warm and soft coverings, and on his unprotected head fell at measured intervals a drop of ice-cold water. It did not vary in its descent a single instant; the failure of one drop, even by a second, would have been a relief which he might have repaid by a sob of prayer but there was no intermission, none! He knew it, for he counted each by the pulsations of his heart—— I might have pitied even him during that fearful night. In my position you would have wept yourself to sleep like a tired child; but I had no tears for the fate that I foresaw. There was a morrow to that night, and then came three more weary days; and my stubborn heart kept its watch steadily, for I had calculated the time which must elapse ere he could obey my summons; but the last few hours were almost too much for my reason. I read and reread the fatal letter, until the lines danced before my eyes, and I looked through a cloud of flickering atoms, as black and dense as my own fears. There was nothing to console me in this renewed perusal; I could find no new interpretation for the honeyed words which had failed to blind me to the truth; and I had no inclination to encourage a deceit of which I must ultimately become the victim.

"At length he came; we met at the same spot, at the same hour, and he strove to greet me with the same smile, but, although it wreathed his lip, it left his eye cold and silent. He took my hand, and would have pressed his lips upon my cheek, but I turned it from him. The letter had sufficed; and I had respect enough for the man to whom I had vowed my life, to spare him an acted as well as a written hypocrisy.

"I saw that he was wounded to the heart by my coldness, and I rejoiced. He was not then all evil. He inquired the cause of my altered manners, and I placed his letter in his hand. A sudden flush mounted to his brow:—

"'Listen, Sir James,' I said, gravely; 'I cannot be deceived; something has occurred since we last met: something which has opened a gulf between us I am not to be cheated by words. The heart speaks, or is silent; the lips cannot replace it where it is absent. Be frank —what has happened?'

"'Happened!' echoed Dornton, with a look of anguish, which I have never since forgotten. I calmly repeated my question.

"'Adela, you torture me!' he exclaimed vehemently; 'do you, can you doubt my affection?'

"'I will not, I dare not,' was my reply; 'but it must be assured beyond all possibility of suspicion. Another week like the last would destroy me, body and mind. I must hear from the lips, or read in the writing of Lady Madelaine herself that I am to be your wife. I must know that my fate is fixed beyond the power of caprice or tyranny. With less than this I can no longer rest satisfied. Let her name her own time; I shall have the certainty of future happiness to abridge the interval. Let me even be denied all personal communication with you until that time arrives, and I will submit; but I cannot remain a prey to uncertainty and suspense. I cannot any longer subject myself to be the mere tool of another's pleasure.'

"Then it was, that Sir James, overcome by the steady resolution of my words and manner, avowed to me that he had reason to apprehend a change in the projects of Lady Madelaine. The admission only made me the more steadily adhere to my purpose.

"'Until her will is known, should such, indeed, be the case, we must not meet again,' I replied, with an appearance of calm which belied the real agitation that I felt: 'of your own truth I can entertain no doubt. I felt at once from whence the blow must come. See Lady Madelaine, remind her of her voluntary pledge; tell her that you exact its performance, and all will yet be well!'

"'You shall be satisfied,' he said at length, in an accent which betrayed more fear than hope. 'I will do as you require: but should I meet with a refusal, all may be lost through this precipitation.'

"'A refusal!' was my rejoinder, 'does she not call you her friend? Is not your own happiness involved in the question?'

"'Adela!' he exclaimed reproachfully, 'do you doubt it?'

"'Again I say no—but why this fear, for which you have hitherto chidden me? Has my mother displayed any new proofs of her aversion? Does she indeed hate me to an excess which will induce her to sacrifice your happiness in order to destroy mine?'

"'No—I am bound to declare the contrary; and yet—'

"'Enough,' I said hurriedly; 'we can be ultimately separated only by your own agency; for myself I am pledged to you forever—death alone can dissolve the vows that I have uttered. I am aware that Lady Madelaine can not only oppose, but also retard our union: be it so: in five years I shall be my own mistress, and may defy her authority. The time is long, I admit,' I added, as Dornton made an impatient gesture; 'but as you love me—'

"'Better than my life,' he interrupted eagerly; 'but if you loved as I do, you could not talk thus coolly of a delay which appears to me eternal.'

"'You misjudge me: hear me then: make me your wife, and carry me abroad—anywhere; the world is wide enough, and all countries will be to me alike if you are beside me. When I am of age we will return to England; and, in the possession of our proper rank, revenge ourselves upon the past.'

"A gloom like that of midnight spread over the face of Dornton. Fool that I was not to comprehend how terrible a secret lay below that darkness! Secure in his affection, I had yet to learn that the ruined gamester and the debt-covered man of fashion must sell himself for gold when it was tendered to his grasp. What had he to do with affection or with fidelity? He had tasted of the world's stream; and he was eager to bid the waters of Marah flow over the golden sands of Pactolus. I, too, tendered him wealth—but when? I knew nothing of all this when I urged him to a step he had not the means to take; and we parted, after he had pledged himself to an explanation with Lady Madelaine, of which he was himself to bring me the result.

"Four more weary days and nights of impatient anguish intervened, before the hour at which he could again arrive at Rooksley. I was unable to take even physical repose: the fate of my whole existence was about to be decided, and I was powerless to turn the balance. On the morning of the fifth day I was at our trysting-place at an early hour; nor did I long await the information which I went to seek. A stranger met me, and with a respectful salutation, tendered a letter upon whose superscription I instantly recognized the well-known characters of Dornton. I had no sooner taken it from his hand, than with a second silent bow, he turned and walked hastily away.

"I stood motionless for a moment with the letter in my hand.—Did something whisper to you, Lady Dornton, as you looked on this packet, that it would decide your destiny in this life? Did your blood curdle, your hand quiver, and your eye grow dim? It may be so: I had already undergone the same agony which I have bequeathed to you. Suddenly a new impulse urged me to fly the spot, and to learn ALL—and I plunged into the thickest of the wood, and throwing myself down upon the earth, I resolutely tore asunder the folds of the letter which had been so mysteriously transmitted to me: I read it from one end to the other without a pause. Read it in your turn. It is a production of the man to whom you have given your hand, and can scarcely fail to excite your interest—

"'I am about, my beloved Adela, to plunge a dagger into your heart—fearful necessity to a man by whom you are adored! I dare not however, incur the culpability of leaving you, for one moment in ignorance of the fatal truth beneath which my own prospects of domestic happiness are forever crushed. All is over. We must renounce every hope of being united in this world. Neither prayers nor tears will soften the unbending will of your mother; no is there even a chance that time might operate a change. I have thought much of your self abnegating and generous proposal; but alas! you do not guess, novice as you are in the world's ways, beneath how frightful a load of suspicion and contempt I should bury myself, were I selfish enough to profit by it. I should be accused of taking an unmanly advantage of your youth and inexperience; and the pure effect of a passionate attachment would be attributed to a sordid interest of which you alone would know me to be incapable. I could not live under this stigma, even with you to comfort and console me; and I could never again raise my head proudly among my fellow-men. These are fearful anticipations, Adela: alike for you and for myself: too fearful to be realized. Nor would you, pure and perfect as you are, escape the reverberation of the thunder. Your reputation would be sullied; your position ruined; and this shall never be for my sake. Beloved of my heart! your very virtues would thus become a scourge. Weep then for yourself, and weep for me; but bend in pity to us both before the inexorable destiny which parts us.'

"Eveleen—had a traveler passed near the woods of Rooksley at the moment of sunshine and silence in which my burning eyeballs fastened upon the signature of this heartless letter, he would have dreamed that happy and light hearts were wandering beneath their shadows; for I was myself startled by the peal of ringing laughter which escaped from between my parched and quivering lips. Yes, Lady Dornton, yes—the fiends laugh—they have a mad mirth of their own—a frantic merriment that must have voice, or it would choke the reveler. I knew it then! Despair made me resolute; I answered this withering letter; briefly but urgently; I insisted that he should himself come to Rooksley, and give me all the details of his interview with Lady Madelaine. He resisted resolutely; again he wrote: he urged that it would destroy his reason were he to see me again only to lose me a second time. Passion and anguish breathed in every line; I laid the letters side by side before me, and I could not reconcile their tone. It was evident that another revolution had taken place in the feelings, if not in the intentions of Dornton, and I was resolved to solve the mystery.

"Once more I summoned him, upon his honor as a true man, to obey my bidding; and after the delay of another week he reappeared. He told me that he came from Woodville, that you had barely escaped from death, and that Lady Madelaine and her husband had urged him to continue their guest during your convalescence—and still, poor cheated fool! I suspected nothing. I meant to tell you all that passed after his arrival, but I cannot—my strength is weaker than my purpose. Enough that day after day he lingered near me, evidently bowed down by the weight of some mighty sorrow which he would not reveal. As for myself, despair had made me frantic, and this fatal mystery overthrew my poor remains of composure. The excitement of the false position in which I stood, the evident wretchedness of the man I loved, and the tenacity with which he refused all explanation of a secret whose existence he did not attempt to gainsay, fevered my brain, and as we were about to part, I fell lifeless into his arms

"My hour of bitter triumph was come. Regardless of consequences, he bore me to the house, to the consternation of the bewildered Lady Flora, and the marvel of our slender household; and once there, refused to quit me for an instant. When I recovered power to articulate, his name rose instinctively to my lips, and it was his own voice which answered the appeal. A second syncope, succeeded by delirium, soon informed Lady Flora of our secret, and thenceforward she allowed no one to approach me save herself and the physician. At times she summoned Sir James, that he might strive to recall my scattered faculties; and there were moments in which he partially succeeded. My first care on a return of reason was to obtain from him a solemn pledge that he would not abandon me until I was convalescent. He started in alarm as I demanded this, and would have urged a thousand pleas against it; but I denounced him as my murderer, if he left me thus to die of the despair which was his own work, and at length he promised everything.

"Reckless of the future, careless of the past, weak in body, but calm in spirit, I was happy. Happy, amid my physical suffering, for he was constantly beside me; happy in the belief that even yet all was not lost; while Lady Flora looked on, satisfied by my assurance that I must become the wife of Dornton, or perish.

"Little did I guess, Eveleen, that the tender nurse who had so lately left your sick bed to take up his post at mine, had become my brother. But I cannot even now dwell upon that time, for once more I feel my brain burn, and my sinking frame quiver beneath the fierce pulsations of a heart too big for its weak and narrow prison-house. Your letter awoke me from my trance. Your letter, in which you announced your marriage and your isolation; and asked me—ME! to become your companion. I was alone with Lady Flora when I received it; and I read it to the end. I can tell you nothing more than that I was suddenly startled by the vehement grief of my poor aunt; and that when I strove to open my eyes, and to inquire into its cause, I felt as though I were crushed down upon my bed by a hand of iron. Slowly, and by imperceptible degrees, reason came back upon me, and, with it, memory; and then I struggled fiercely with my agony; and for a time I conquered. I demanded the letter, and it was put into my hands. Once more I read it resolutely to the end; and then I bade them summon Sir James. He was gone. I had lain twelve hours in my frightful swoon, and the coward had escaped the curse I prepared for him. They would have disobeyed me when I asked for writing materials; but I was too well aware that my factitious strength was nearly spent, to listen to their expostulations, and I was at length obeyed. I answered your letter; I uttered no reproach; I gave vent to no invective; I felt that I should not long survive the struggle, and I resolved to leave you for a while in ignorance, and to bequeath the truth as my best vengeance, when remorse would be too late.

"I have no more to tell—no comment to make—no word of bitterness to utter. I leave you to your own thoughts—weak, unstable, and irresolute, you had already forfeited all claim to happiness. Should you still cling to one hope, be wise enough to fasten it upon the grave.

"Farewell."

CHAPTER XLVII.

I SUFFERED the papers to fall from my hand. I had read even to the last line, hurriedly, eagerly, gaspingly; and now I knew all. I could not think—I could not weep—I had no pity either for my dead sister, or for myself—no hate for Dornton—no feeling of either the present or the past. All was dead within me. My eyes were open, but I did not distinguish an object; my apartment looked upon a great thoroughfare, but I did not hear a sound. I was, for the moment, annihilated.

Gradually, however, and painfully I awoke from this stupor. My brain whirled; my heart labored with thick sobs; those dry and withering sobs which rend their way, with each its separate pang. I clenched my hands until the blood started beneath my nails; I writhed like one convulsed; and still the frightful truth glared full upon me—I had been the unconscious murderer of my sister!

And for what? And whom? And then uprose within me the boiling hatred which my long lethargy had for a time suppressed. I had to revenge not only Adela, but myself also. How I envied the grave into which she had gone down! How I loathed myself that I was still condemned to live and suffer! All was dark and hopeless about me. What had I now to ask of fate!

Such was my state of mind when the door of my dressing-room suddenly opened, and my husband stood before me. As my eye fell on his advancing figure, I uttered a wild scream, and covered my face with my spread hands.

"What means this, Eveleen?" he asked in a troubled voice, as he stopped before me; "how am I to interpret this reception?"

I strove to speak, but I could not. My emotion rendered me unable to articulate.

"This is worse than childish, Lady Dornton," he continued more firmly; "I have already seen your mother, and I know all. Yet surely, the death of your sister—"

"Name her not!" I exclaimed, as I started vehemently to my feet, animated by a new feeling; "name her not, lest the words wither the lips which utter them. Name her not to me—to me! at once her victim and her executioner."

Dornton was evidently agitated, but he strove to suppress his emotion.

"Has your grief indeed deranged your faculties?" he asked, struggling to smile.

For all answer I pointed to the papers, which still lay where they had fallen. He stooped, and gathered them together; but as he did so, his hand trembled.

"Do you recognize the writing?" I asked bitterly, as I again sank into my seat; "it is the legacy, Sir James Dornton, which the dead Adela has bequeathed to me—and you."

While I was speaking he had run his eye rapidly over the opening lines. "I see it all," he said; "I might have expected this. She knew the weakness of your nature, and she has revenged her wrongs upon you."

"Dare you talk thus to me?" I cried, irritated even amid my anguish; "you, who have destroyed us both?"

"You use strong language, Lady Dornton," he said, striving to assume an accent of indignation, "and such as you are unable to justify. You now know what it had been better for your peace to have concealed from you forever. The evil is, however, beyond remedy: and I owe it to myself to place the matter in its proper light."

His self-possession startled me; but the damning evidence of his dishonor was before my eyes, and I retorted angrily, "The 'matter' will admit no light but one. I do not now speak of myself—I have time for my own wrongs—I address you as the deceiver of my sister."

"And upon what grounds do you accuse me of deception?"

"Did you not use every method to induce her to believe that you loved her?"

"I do not deny it; the fact was so.'

"You did love her! You admit it, and yet you abandoned her!"

"I was the slave of circumstances."

"Did you not persuade her that she was to become your wife?"

"I did, in the firm belief that such would be the case."

I pressed my hand upon my burning forehead. I was bewildered.

"I used, as you have stated, every effort to gain the affections of your sister," he continued, hurriedly: "I had reason to believe that she was to share my fortunes; her peculiarity of character attracted me, and the romance of a young, fresh heart lent itself willingly to the endeavors which I made to owe her hand to her own affections, no less than to the will of those who had power over her actions. Rest assured that the tragical termination of our attachment has proved as bitter to me as to herself, although, where I have only striven, she has sunk."

"And why," I interposed, "why, if you really loved her, did you not withstand all opposition? Why destroy us both only to thwart your inclination?"

"I had no alternative," was his reply.

I shook my head contemptuously.

"You doubt my assertion; and yet I could readily prove its truth; but the explanation would involve details which might not flatter your self-love; and I would rather you should credit my declaration without further proof."

"Fear nothing, sir," I said haughtily; "my self-love is beyond your reach. What can you admit which will touch it more nearly than the words that you have already uttered. Even the vanity, to which you make allusion, has not deprived me of the power to understand that I am indebted for your hand to the fortune with which destiny had cursed me."

"Be it as you will," was his unmoved reply. "It then only remains for me to justify myself." I bowed in silence.

"Reckless as you are," he resumed, after the pause of a moment, "you have nevertheless been long enough my wife, to understand that at the period of our marriage my pecuniary resources were exhausted. I was, therefore, under the necessity of forming an alliance which would enable me to retain my accustomed position in society. I looked round me, and from the moment in which I became intimately acquainted with your family, I cast my eyes upon yourself. You were very young, but I had gained the confidence and friendship of your mother, and I knew that she was all-powerful. I therefore resolved to retrench sufficiently to enable me to wait for a few years, and I, meanwhile, continued to pay my court assiduously to Lady Madelaine. I see your lip curl; but your contempt is misplaced. Do not men frequently toil during a lifetime, suffer privation and contumely, and even barter their good name for gold, of which they subsequently made a weak and unworthy use, when their necessities are not more imperative than my own! And with what have you to reproach me since our marriage?"

"Proceed, sir," I said, coldly; "for the tale promises to be a long one."

"The death of your father altered all my projects. It is true that if Lady Madelaine had distinguished me by her regard, she had been no less condescending to Lord Otterford; while neither the one nor the other could boast of one unguarded word or action by which to assume a claim upon her preference—you have yet much, Lady Dornton, to study in your mother; and much from which, as a woman of the world, you might derive no small advantage."

"You are completing my education, Sir James," I said bitterly.

He bowed with a sarcastic smile; turned his chair more fully upon me, and proceeded.

"The death of your father left your mother free: she was still in the full lustre of her beauty and of her fashion, and desirable in every point of view. Her fortune, although, indeed, less considerable than your own, was tangible, and within my reach from the moment in which she became my wife; and this circumstance was far from indifferent to me, as every year rendered my position more difficult.

"You have doubtlessly not forgotten my appearance at Rooksley during your mother's widowhood. I went there to offer her my hand, and she was flattered by my declaration. She admitted this fact frankly; but I soon perceived the reason of my failure, for of that she convinced me at once. She strove to keep her secret, but I was playing a desperate game, and I at once declared my conviction of her attachment to Lord Otterford. At that period Otterford had not declared himself, and the pride of Lady Madelaine took alarm.

"'I am neither young enough, nor wealthy enough for you, Sir James,' she said; 'Eveleen is the wife best suited alike to your habits and your tastes. Like you she promises to be a world-worshiper; and her beauty and fortune will enable you to realize all the dreams of your ambition. You know that my authority over her is unlimited—you are no stranger to her absurd and childish fancy for young Devereux: you are, in short, an old and tried friend of the family, and under your protection her fate would be assured. I have long desired an opportunity of suggesting this marriage to you, and I gladly embrace that which your declared preference for myself has afforded to me. Does my proposal meet your views?'

"I was at a loss how to reply. Quite aware that I was as much indebted to the prudent egotism of Lady Madelaine on this occasion, as to her regard, I made difficulties, all of which flattered her vanity, and increased her friendship; but at length I yielded. After a long and animated conversation my destiny was decided: but I was not altogether satisfied. It is true that, as though she could have penetrated into the design which I had formed several years previously, she voluntarily offered me your own hand; still I should have preferred a more certain and a more immediate boon, and I was mortified that she should sacrifice me to a mere animal like Otterford, whose only charm lay in a handsome face, and a certain tact in flattering the weaknesses and follies of her character. I knew that, once her husband, he must necessarily degenerate into a domestic automaton: he was formed for no other purpose, and my prophecy has been realized."

I was lost in astonishment at the audacity with which Dornton thus crowned himself with his vices, and exacted worship for them; but I struggled resolutely against my indignation, and commanded myself sufficiently to listen with at least an appearance of composure.

"She had no sooner herself become a wife," pursued Dornton, undauntedly, "than I reminded her of her promise, and she at once pledged herself to fulfill it, although she would appoint no given period. The motives which she alleged for this delay were specious: I was not, however, at a loss to define her real ones: she was too recently a bride to tolerate so unequal a rivalry; and, as I felt how useless all argument must prove against such a conviction, I submitted in silence. Otterford was less punctilious; from the period of their marriage he never ceased to represent to your mother the incongruity and danger of thus shutting you out from a world so well aware of your existence, and so ready to draw false deductions from your extraordinary seclusion; and she at length yielded reluctantly to his entreaties.

"You were summoned to town, and I now believed that my difficulties were over—it was not so; like Jacob, I had served seven years for Rachel; and was then coolly told to take Leah as my reward. You look amazed; but I am about to explain, and by that explanation to justify myself. You had scarcely appeared in London, when the Duke of Barminster was attracted by your beauty. It is possible that you may scarcely remember a tall, gaunt, large-limbed youth, with pink eyes and yellow hair, who had just escaped from his tutors, after having made a tour in France and Italy; whence he returned with pinker eyes and yellower hair than he set out. Be that as it may, he admired you, and was what in stage-parlance is designated 'enamored' of your fair face and high-bred self-possession; nor did Lady Madelaine, whose ambition was flattered by his preference, hesitate covertly to encourage it. Her position was, however, somewhat embarrassing; I was constantly beside her like an accusing spirit which all her spells were unable to lay; and I believe that I should have triumphed even over the yellow-haired duke, had not a hint of my pecuniary difficulties been dropped into the eager ear of your mother. Had this hint never been given, Eveleen, it might have been happy for us both;

but this one circumstance became the key-stone of all the evil which has since been slowly built up.

"Lady Madelaine at once availed herself of the information thus received. She had her own reasons for not exciting a feud between us; while, at the same time, she was equally resolved upon your alliance with the duke. As yet he had said nothing decisive upon the subject, but that was evidently the effect of shyness, and from the dread of a refusal; for it was a boy's love, fearing everything and risking nothing.

"Secure of my enforced acquiescence in her wishes, from my total inability to gainsay them, your mother, with an aplomb which would have done honor to a statesman, took me into her confidence. She admitted that I might have some right to consider myself aggrieved until she explained her purpose—she abhorred the young duke; who, had he been no duke, would not have been presentable in society: but she felt it her duty on such an occasion to sacrifice her own wishes to the interests of her daughter. She reminded me that you were altogether unaware of the promise which she had made to me—that you still resolutely clung to your girlish fancy for Devereux—that, in short, your sentiments toward myself were rather those of avoidance and dislike, than such as promised happiness in married life. In fine—as a matter of duty to you, and of prudence to me, she had evidently resolved that you should become Duchess of Barminster. 'And may I ask,' I inquired, with a cool sarcasm which forewarned her of my probable vengeance, should she endeavor to make me the victim of her sudden ambition; 'may I ask what character I am expected to enact in this strange comedy?' She looked at me steadily for a moment, and then replied—'Sir James, this little incident must not affect our old and honest friendship. Had I not been assured from what occurred at Rooksley that you felt no overweening attachment to Eveleen, I should at once have negatived the duke's pursuit; but under the circumstances, and knowing also the sincerity of your regard for me, I have acted accordingly. You are aware that I have another daughter; less beautiful than Eveleen, I admit, but also without a silly passion in her head.'

"I had already seen your sister, when I traveled with her from Scotland. I remembered only a silent girl, who appeared rather proud than shy; and with whom I did not throughout the journey exchange a dozen sentences. You may imagine my surprise, my indignation; but my embarrassments had enslaved my will, and, as Lady Madelaine was well aware, I could not contend.

"I accompanied her to Rooksley, and I confess that I was startled by the change which a few months had effected in the appearance of your sister; still, the constraint induced by your mother's presence did not enable me to judge correctly of Adela, whose intellectual expression promised both mind and feeling. Stung by your own haughtiness, and revolted by a coquetry which was almost marvelous for your age, Lady Madelaine had by no means advanced in error when she asserted that my heart had remained untouched. I was dazzled by your beauty, and infatuated by your success; but it required more than this to resuscitate the long dormant feelings of a man of the world; and thus you will not be astonished if I submitted with a tolerable grace to a decision against which, under my peculiar circumstances, I dared not appeal, and resolved to ascertain at once what I was likely to gain or lose at the game of matrimonial shuttlecock which Lady Madelaine had instituted in her family."

"And you discovered?——"

"I discovered, Lady Dornton, ere long, that in Adela I had found the very being who had it in her power to renew the youth of my heart. I lost no time in returning to Rooksley, and, pleading the permission of your mother, I succeeded in gaining the affections of your sister, before I avowed to her that my visits were unauthorized. You know the independence of Adela's character; and you will therefore be prepared to understand that this circumstance, although it increased her caution, by no means affected her resolution. We met again and again. The extraordinary resources of her mind, and the noble qualities of her nature, were laid bare before me. She cared nothing for my fashion, nothing for my popularity; she loved me for myself—she loved me as I never hope to be loved again."

He paused. His lips quivered, and his face assumed an ashy paleness; but he soon rallied, and in a less steady voice, resumed: "You will not be surprised that, under these circumstances, I soon blessed the fortunate chance which had thrown the boy-duke in your path I was not, however, long destined to enjoy my dream of coming happiness; for on returning to Woodville, after one of my hurried visits to your sister, feeling myself unable any longer to control my impatience, I urged Lady Madelaine to withdraw Adela from her retreat, and to prepare the minds of her circle for our approaching marriage.

"I had remarked that she was less at her ease than usual, and that something had occurred to ruffle her; but never suspecting that my own happiness could be involved in so trivial a circumstance, I had paid little attention to it. I was soon better informed. 'Trust to me,' she said; 'I feel that I have dealt ungenerously toward you, but it is not yet too late to repair my error. You shall soon be my son-in-law; circumstances have occurred which have changed my views for Eveleen, and I will redeem my word. She shall be your wife!' I will spare you a description of my feelings. What I instantly suspected, proved to be the fact; the change had not originated with your mother, but with the relatives of the duke, to whom the comparatively obscure origin of your father was an objection even more insuperable than the youth and inexperience of the noble blockhead himself.

"Do me the justice to believe that I did not passively submit to this insulting tyranny. I resented it warmly and loudly, but all my violence remained unavailing. I was in the toils, for Lady Madelaine, secured in her position by the pressing nature of my pecuniary necessities, had already turned aside the triumphant consolations of her dear five hundred friends on the secession of the duke, by smiling at the ab-gurdity of the report, and asserting your long engagement to myself. Thus we had both too much at stake to continue long at feud. We were necessary to each other—and, you know the rest."

I was crushed. I had struggled to be firm; to pay back with cool contempt the perfidy of the man to whom I had been sacrificed; but I had not sufficiently prepared myself for such an avowal as this. The consciousness of his utter indifference; the conviction that all his affectation of affection had been false from the first moment of our marriage; the reflection that I had been a mere tool to conceal the weakness of my mother, and to build up the ruined fortunes of a profligate, cut me to the heart; and every angry feeling faded before the deep humiliation which bowed me to the earth.

"And am I then, indeed, wholly and utterly, the victim of my fortune!" I exclaimed, wringing my hands in despair; "was it not enough to find myself deceived in my every hope, without being forced to feel that I have been a dupe from my very cradle."

"Be rational, Lady Dornton," said Sir James, rousing himself with effort from a painful reverie into which he had fallen as he ceased speaking. "Since you became my wife, of what have you to complain? Have you not profited as fully by the illusion as you could have done by the reality? Have you had one indulgence the less? Has your vanity been the more ruffled, or your self-love the less respected? Look back upon your brief period of married life—what has been wanting which would have grown out of even the idolatry of a husband! Can you complain of the manner in which I have played my part? It is rather I who should complain of the life of struggle and seeming to which the caprice of your mother has condemned me. Let us be honest with each other. You had assuredly no right to calculate upon an undivided affection on my part, when you gave yourself to me with an old love clinging about your heart, which you scarcely cared either to conceal or to combat. I, feeling myself exonerated by the fact, did not persecute you upon the subject, but left time to do its work, assisted by that great ally, the world—and we are, consequently, beyond recrimination upon that point. Why then do you arrogate to yourself the right to accuse me?"

I could not command myself sufficiently to reply: the cold-blooded matter-of-fact reasoning of Sir James at such a moment maddened me.

"I see your agitation," he resumed; "and knowing as I do your utter want of self-command, I am by no means surprised at its violence. Calm yourself, however, if possible, and listen to me for a few moments longer. What I have to say deserves all your attention. This day will probably effect our actual separation; but let us, at least, preserve appearances: it is needless for us to offer ourselves as a spectacle to all London. You have an attachment of which the object is more than disagreeable to me; nevertheless, amuse yourself as you have hitherto done; I understand you too well to dread your injuring your own position for any created being. Nevertheless, be careful; for, if you are Cæsar's wife, remember that I am Cæsar; and I have no inclination to become the laughing-stock of my set."

"How, sir!" I exclaimed, starting to my feet, "do you, guilty as you are of my sister's death—fallen as you are beneath the contempt of all honest men—do you dare to threaten!" And exasperated by his calmness, yet still unable to give utterance to my feelings, I rushed out of my dressing-room, anxious only to rid myself of his presence, which had each moment become more insupportable to me.

Fortunately, he retained all his self-possession; and, alarmed at the idea of the scene to which I was about to expose both myself and him, he sprang after me, and caught me as I was about to escape into the gallery.

"Where are you going?" he asked sternly.

"Anywhere, so that I be not subjected to your presence," I said, as I struggled to loose myself from his grasp; but he held me fast.

"Well, then, madam, return to your dressing-room; I am about to leave it. But I beg that you will not expose yourself to the gossip of your servants in your present undignified state of passion, for your own sake. Have you yet to learn that, in such cases, your own hired domestics are more to be dreaded than all other persons? As for myself, I am careless of their comments; nay, they would afford me an admirable opportunity of visiting this scene upon Colonel Devereux—an emergency which, I imagine, you would on your side rather avoid than provoke. Give yourself the trouble to reflect, and remember that it is not always upon the husband that the world is apt to visit results like these."

Again I was compelled to submit. I felt that I was indeed, through my idle folly, at the mercy of a man whom I alike loathed and despised. I had no refuge in my mother, who would necessarily abandon my cause in order to excuse her own conduct; and, thus left to myself, I was altogether powerless. Profiting by my evident indecision, Dornton led me back to the door of my dressing-room, which I had no sooner reached than I closed it violently behind me, as though I sought to evade the pursuit of an assassin.

As I sank panting upon a sofa, I felt as though my reason would have given way beneath the struggle. The horror of my position rose bare and hopeless before me. The ties which attached me to my husband, and the authority which they gave him over my very thoughts, distracted me as I reflected on them. I had determined on a rupture; but I had been prepared to dictate its terms, and not to find myself thus bound hand and foot at his mercy. The species of menace which he had uttered, and which was merely conditional, still rang through my brain; for I remembered that he might, at any moment, and under any pretext, avail himself of it to complete my wretchedness.

Nevertheless, by some strange inconsistency, it was not fear that I felt; blinded by my indignation, I should have considered it a meanness to tremble or to yield, or even to control my actions in any way, at the bidding of a man whom I had saved from ruin, and whom I felt myself authorized to despise. Never had I been in so dangerous a state of mind. Every feeling was in revolt. I ceased to envy even the quiet grave of my sister. I had vague visions of a vengeance as mighty as the wrongs of which I had been made the victim—wild, untangible, and aimless for the most part; but welcome, inasmuch as they tended to restore me to some degree of composure, and to people the void into which my first emotions had plunged me.

May those whose hair whitens, and whose necks bow beneath the hand of time, without having undergone such mental struggles as these, be merciful as they pronounce a judgment upon me!

CHAPTER XLVIII.

A DEEP sleep succeeded to this terrible agitation. I was wearied, body and spirit; and my waking was only productive of new projects of self-avenging. I found from Joséphine, whose expression of countenance betrayed that she was aware, at least in some degree, of the altercation which had taken place between my husband and myself, that immediately after leaving my chamber, Sir James had departed as usual for his club, although evidently ruffled; and that he had given orders to his valet not to await his return, as he should be absent all night. This decision was a great relief to me, and I immediately retired to bed, in order to have a pretext for dismissing my attendant.

What a night I passed! Visions of Adela, and of her wrongs, came blended with the miserable conviction of my own isolated and unhappy position. In the excited state of my feelings, I never dreamt of tracing the events of my life to any fault or error of my own. I regarded myself simply as a victim to the machinations of others; and as bound to visit upon my persecutors all the sufferings to which I had myself been subjected. I had the means of vengeance in my hands. It was true, that they might recoil upon my own head; but that reflection did not deter me. I was already ruined both in fact and in hope. A life of joyless wretchedness was before me. I could scarcely render my fate more bitter; while, on the other hand, I might enable myself to support it with less suffering. All that the world could offer of adulation, luxury, and indulgence was before me, and within my grasp. The void within my heart might be filled up. I must think no more of home enjoyments, and home ties; they were forever denied to me; but the alternative remained of creating new interests and new bonds without the pale of home.

My decision was irrevocably taken.

When I rose in the morning, my first care was to obliterate the withering effects of the last night's agitation, and to bestow unwonted care upon my appearance. I could not be seen in public so immediately after the death of my sister, but I could at least admit those of my friends who came to offer me their sympathy in my bereavement; and it is probable that Lady Madelaine had decided upon the same prudent and praiseworthy line of conduct, for I heard nothing of her throughout the day. One or two unimportant visits occupied the greater portion of the morning, when at length Colonel Devereux was announced in his turn; and, pleading fatigue, I desired that I might be denied to every one for the remainder of the day.

"I may then, indeed, hope that I still number you among my friends," I said, as I extended my hand, "since you come to me in the hour of grief."

"Did you do me the injustice to admit a doubt upon the subject?"

"I am afraid so. Many circumstances have occurred to shake my faith in your regard—but I will not dwell upon them now. A friend is too precious to me at this moment, for me to encourage such misgivings."

"Is it Lady Dornton who talks of needing friends?"

"It is, indeed, and heaven knows that few need them or would prize them more. You are, of course, aware that I have lost my sister?"

"I am; and I feel for you most deeply."

"You may do so. It has been a bitter blow to me in many ways. Do you also know the cause of her early and most unhappy death?"

"I fear, consumption," he replied anxiously, as he looked attentively at me; "Miss Tilden was naturally of a weak and nervous constitution; and probably sank under her self-constituted isolation from society."

"No, no; do not be disingenuous with me, Colonel Devereux," I interposed; "you have been too intimately connected with our family not to have learnt the truth; or, if you have indeed been blinded to the fact, be so no longer: my sister died of a broken heart."

"A broken heart!"

"Even so; and now do more justice both to me and to yourself. Your look and accent both betray you. You have nothing to hear from me save what you already know; unless, indeed, that I also am no longer ignorant of the great secret which has changed the whole current of my after-life."

"Lady Dornton, you alarm me."

"And yet you see that I am calm. I have a great work before me, Colonel Devereux. I am like a rudderless vessel, which, after having for a long period been borne among sunken rocks and hidden sands without becoming quite a wreck, is suddenly driven far into the open sea, without chart or compass—into a fearful, limitless, and unknown waste of waters,—to plough its way as it best can to some eagerly dreamt of but uncertain port. I can look back upon the perils which I have survived, but I know not how to direct my course through the vague. Nevertheless it must be done; I may perish in the attempt, but it shall be made."

"Your position is indeed a painful one."

"I know it, but I do not shrink. I am only about to exchange one species of suffering for another."

"You may be deceiving yourself as to the extent of the evil."

I smiled bitterly, as I put into his hands the papers which I had brought from Glenfillan. "Read these," I said, with the same unnatural calm; "read, and be convinced in how far I still retain the power to cheat myself."

Devereux shuddered as he ran his eye over the opening sentences.

'Is this, indeed, the writing of Miss Tilden?' he asked.

It is.—That is the legacy of a sister whom I would fain have loved—that is the dying bequest of Adela. Do you ask me now to doubt!"

"This is terrible!"

"Is it not? Is it not frightful to have incurred a hatred which lived even beyond the grave? And that too by an action to which I was compelled? Had it pleased fate to grant her wishes, I should have been spared the misery that has been visited upon me, and we might both have been happy. The tyranny of my mother, and the mean cowardice of Sir James Dornton had, however, decided otherwise; and it is still I who incur the penalty; it has been my destiny through life to be made at once the dupe and the victim of those about me, and I must be content to drain the bitter draught to the very dregs. Do as I will, I can secure neither affection nor friendship. I am alone in my own misery."

My firmness began to forsake me, and, despite all my efforts, I felt the scalding tears fall upon my cheeks. Devereux was leaning upon his arm, with his face concealed in his spread hand; and for a few minutes we both remained silent.

"It was most cruel," he said at length; "thus to destroy the illusions on which you had built up your happiness."

"My happiness!" I exclaimed reproachfully. "The only happiness that I have ever known has been based on hope—and that hope has never once been realized."

"But who could have been so imprudent as to give you this letter?" he asked, without appearing to have heard my last remark.

"A person who was unaware of its contents, and who believed that they were calculated rather to comfort than to agonize me. Listen to me, Devereux," I continued, observing that he had again sunk into silence; "you shall have all the details of this painful tragedy; and then tell me what hope remains for me in this life. I am very young—I have never wilfully caused pain or suffering to any being within the sphere of my influence. Where I have erred it has been through the prompting of others. Listen to me, for I have much to tell."

I then briefly recapitulated all the circumstances which had taken place from the moment of our summons to Glenfillan, to the outbreak of my husband on the preceding evening; only concealing the fact that his own name had been introduced into the reproaches of Sir James. As I told my tale, the words had frequently been smothered by my sobs, and I saw the tears of Devereux stream through his fingers. Amid all my misery I felt a thrill of joy as I detected this proof of sympathy. It was so long since any one had felt for me! He still remained in the same attitude with his head bowed down over the writing, but he had ceased to turn the leaves.

"Poor Adela!" I murmured, after awhile; "even she was not so wretched as I am, for she had, at least, some one to pity and to advise her."

"Your positions in life were different," he replied sadly; "many felt that they were free to pity the desolate and heart-stricken Miss Tilden, who could not presume to affect compassion for the gay, admired, and envied Lady Dornton."

"Does the world indeed envy such as I am?" I exclaimed impatiently. "Do you also consider me beyond the pale of sympathy and help?"

"I did so very lately; but now all is changed; and from my very heart I pity you."

As he ceased speaking he rose, and paced the room with hurried and agitated steps.

"You may, indeed," I said, wringing my hands; "I am beset on every side. There is no escape for me—none. Every illusion is dissipated; the truth is before me in all its hideous reality—I am unloved—abandoned by all who should have clung to me—by all that could have attached me to life—nor have I even the consolation of feeling that Dornton was the first to blight my happiness."

As these imprudent words escaped my lips, Devereux suddenly paused, and riveted his eyes upon me with an expression which went to my very heart. There was reproach in them, but it was a reproach so blent with happiness, that my own fell before them. I felt my indiscretion when it was too late.

"Lady Dornton—Eveleen," he murmured, as he approached me, and laid his hand upon my arm; "I beseech you to consider all the import of your words. Can it be me whom you would reproach? How, in what manner have I deserved this?"

"Leave me—leave me!" I gasped out; "I am distracted by my grief, and can no longer distinguish friends from foes."

"Not when I am beside you?" he asked deprecatingly; "and yet I too have struggled, I too have suffered; and do you believe, Eveleen, that you had no part in those struggles and in that suffering?"

I had sunk upon the sofa, and buried my face in my handkerchief, which he sought gently to remove.

"Only look at me," he continued tenderly; "only whisper to me that you do not think so harshly as you have led me to believe."

I was bewildered by agitation. The tones of his voice brought back upon me the early and happy period of our attachment. It was long since I had heard these tones; and now I trembled beneath them as though they had been fraught with bitterness.

"Leave me—leave me—" I again exclaimed; "I said I know not what—leave me, and forget it."

"Do not drive me away," he persisted in the same low gentle accents; "we have too long misunderstood each other, and I have also my tale of care to tell. Nay, do not withdraw your hand; are you not conversing with a friend—a brother—to whom you have just poured out the sorrows of your heart? Listen to me in your turn. What has passed within the last few moments has determined me to speak. It will be a trial to me to be frank, for I fear that I may chance to wound you by my sincerity, but you will at least learn to know me as I am; and you can then decide in how far I am worthy of your confidence.

"I imagine," he resumed with evident effort, after a pause which I had made no effort to break; "that you cannot have forgotten our last interview at Rooksley, when I failed to induce you to pledge yourself to me definitely. Your terror and indecision betrayed only too plainly how little I could rely upon your firmness; and I left you with despair in my heart, for I felt that all hope was lost."

"Yet you might have made one more effort," I murmured involuntarily. Devereux shook his head sadly.

"Wherefore should I have done so? It would have served only to torture both yourself and me. Nor would letters have availed me, even had I ventured to risk them; for where my presence and my entreaties had alike failed, a colder medium of intercourse could have effected no favorable result. I learnt your departure from Rooksley and the sensation which you produced in town. Ere long rumors reached me of the assiduities of Sir James Dornton, of whose pecuniary involvements I was aware, as well as of his tact in influencing the mind of Lady Madelaine by his flatteries. Next came the news of your marriage, which had taken place before either your mother or your husband deemed it expedient to make it public; and I shall not attempt to tell you the feeling with which I learnt it. I believed at that moment that I might defy the future to inflict another pang as poignant; but I did not know the future. The human heart has a frightful elasticity in suffering—it expands to receive it, whatever may be the shape in which it present itself: and new faculties appear to be created for endurance. I learned this truth when I heard that you were on a bed of sickness, and probably of death.

"I believed, and I had a right to believe, that the compulsion under which you had acted, was the sole cause of the danger to which your life was exposed; nor can you picture to yourself how dear you were to me while that belief existed. How often did I not pray that you might submit more calmly to a fatal necessity, and so preserve an existence which was to me more precious than it had ever been, although I could no longer hope to ensure its happiness. And here, at least, Eveleen, my prayers were both heard and answered. I have never regretted that I uttered them; but I have since learnt to feel that the falsehood of those whom we have loved, is worse, far worse than death."

"Devereux!"

"You were forewarned of my intended frankness," he pursued; "nor do I fear but you will pardon it. I was, then, in this wretched frame of mind when I received a letter from Otterford, who, with the consent of your mother, invited me to Rooksley. Fearing, and yet anxious to see you, and thus judge by my own observation of the actual state of your feelings, I decided upon obeying the summons, although I was more than once on the point of declining the trial, for which I felt each hour less competent. I went, however,—I found you more beautiful than ever; and for awhile I pleased myself with the belief that you had not met me without emotion; but before the close of the evening I despised myself for my fatuity. Never had I seen you in such brilliant, such overpowering spirits. Never had I seen you so boldly challenge the admiration which no one appeared anxious to withhold. Your coldness to Dornton was so extreme that it wore the appearance of a mere heartless coquetry, unworthy of the woman whom I had so long worshiped in my inmost heart; and I resolved not to spend a second night under the roof that sheltered you. The morning still found me firm in that determination; for I had not slept throughout the night, Eveleen, I had not even striven to sleep. The altar upon which I had enshrined my idol was overthrown, and I mourned over the scattered remnants of my last illusion If I returned on the morrow it was only because your husband, who had decided upon not leaving me for an instant, alarmed me by his jests, and piqued my self-love by some of those trivial but comprehensive witticisms before which the firmest quail at times.

"I was not long in making the discovery that the passion of Dornton was merely acted; that you felt its hollowness; and that wounded pride would soon restore your heart to me; but the same self-esteem which had prevented my utterizg one reproach upon your infidelity, also taught me to reject so questionable a benefit. A woman for whom I had felt a mere passing passion would not, perhaps, have found me proof against such a temptation, but with you I scorned so poor a triumph. The renewal of your passion for me must be the mere result of the neglect of Dornton, or of your love for change: and these were not motives which could satisfy an affection like that which I had vowed to you.

"I have now confessed to you the true reasons of my estrangement; I will neither seek to excuse, nor to justify them; for however extraordinary or unnatural they may appear, they have sprung entirely from the one ruling principle of my life."

Never had I felt so utterly humbled as I was during the time that Devereux had been speaking. How contemptible a picture had he, as it involuntarily, drawn of myself! How had he turned back my thoughts upon all the inconsistencies and errors of the past! And, above all, how had he abstained from the bitterness and reproach which I had only too well merited. Nevertheless, I endeavored to justify myself; and forgetting my agitation in my anxiety to redeem myself in his good opinion, I undertook my exculpation with all the warmth which usually accompanies a bad cause; and attempted to found it upon all that I had suffered to redeem my promise to himself.

"Lady Dornton," he said gravely, as if pained by the weakness of my arguments; "I never believed that you had consented to make me miserable, without an effort to prevent it; but the more energy you had displayed to remain true to your first affection, the more inexplicable was the prompt adhesion of your heart to your new engagements. The little study which I had made of your sex, the reproaches which I had heard lavished upon it, and my own experience, would, at that moment, have led me to believe that women were incapable of firmness or fidelity, had not the unhappy fate of Miss Tilden convinced me that they can exert both where they really love."

Despite my freshly-awakened affection for Devereux, I resented the contras which he had drawn; and somewhat haughtily expatiated upon the enforced duties which rendered all indulgence of my past attachment a crime, while I claimed for myself a virtue of which I knew little more than the name.

"You are not frank, Lady Dornton," said Devereux; "fine phrases may pass with the world, which contents itself with seeming, and rarely looks beneath the surface; but remember that I have loved you—have read your very heart—and understand all the intricacies of your character. Let us be sincere, at least to each other. Had duty prompted your actions, painful as might have been the experience, I should have respected the severity of your principles, and submitted without a murmur to the coldness which they induced: but I felt too much interest in their analysis to deceive myself. You loved Dornton for a time without caring to inquire too curiously the cause of your sudden passion. You ceased to love him, when he had piqued your pride by his neglect and egotism, with the same uncalculating facility; and once more your feelings welled back again toward your first affection by the mere strength of habit—"

"I will hear no more!" I exclaimed indignantly; "again I say, leave me, Colonel Devereux; I wasal ready sufficiently miserable; do not continue to add insult to my other wrongs.'

"Lady Dornton, you do me injustice—"

"Be it so; suffer me then to remain in my error. It was left for you to convince me that I had no longer a friend on earth. Be satisfied; you have performed your mission fully and unsparingly. And now, let us meet no more."

"Let us meet no more!" echoed Devereux in an accent of anguish; "Eveleen—in what a tone, with what a look do you pronounce the sentence."

"With a look and tone which best express my feeling, Colonel Devereux; with the decision that is induced by the indignities with which you have just overwhelmed me."

"And it is those very indignities which should have proved to you the extent, the exacting claims, the jealous scrutiny of my passion," he replied scornfully; "I have uttered harsh words, I know it; but there are still harsher thoughts within my breast—for my heart was full. It was impossible for me to give vent to my pent-up feelings without permitting their bitterness to overflow my lips; outraged affection is never gentle in its language—smooth phrases were made for hypocrites—truth cares not to round its periods—Eveleen! I have wounded you—you whom I would die to shield from even temporary suffering."

"Colonel Devereux, this inconsistency—"

"Is weak and contemptible—I know it; but am I to blame if my passion is stronger than my reason? Is it nothing, Eveleen, to inspire a love in which all other feelings and interests are either absorbed or stifled? Is it nothing to see a man who had vowed to forget—to detest—and to despise you—at your feet and at your mercy? Oh, Eveleen, if indeed you ever loved me, let me once more hear you make me the acknowledgment, and I shall almost cease to remember my past wretchedness."

"You forget that such words from my lips would now be sinful."

"And have I not sinned for you? Have I not cursed during the night-watches the authors of our disunion? Have I not encouraged a thousand impious hopes, a thousand evil wishes? And am I, even in this, to be the only victim?"

Devereux had flung himself at my feet, he grasped my hands: his very existence seemed to hang upon my reply. And he was the only man whom I had ever really loved. Upon his brow, and in his eyes, I read all the memory of the happy past, when hope was bright before me. I had believed him to be estranged; and there I saw him, more tender, more devoted, more enslaved than ever. I thought only of him. My mother, my husband, the whole world were forgotten.

"Herbert!" I murmured, as my tears fell upon the hands which grasped my own.

"Eveleen!" he whispered, as he bent his head yet lower, until his forehead rested upon them. "My own Eveleen, once lost, but found again!"

And then there was a deep unbroken silence; yet strange to say, as I sat there with my hands clasped in his, and his head bowed down upon my knees, I felt no sense of error; all was peace and calm; I was like a child which has wept the absence of a mother, and then sinks to rest upon her protecting bosom. I was, however, awakened to reflection by the first movement of my lover; as he at length raised his head, our eyes met, and I felt the scorching blush of shame spread over my brow and bosom.

"Rise!" I exclaimed hurriedly, in an accent of dismay; "rise, Devereux, if you really still respect me. This is no posture to assume before the wife of Sir James Dornton."

"It is precisely because I do respect you, Eveleen, that I do not obey," he replied resolutely; "not as the wife of Sir James Dornton, that invocation is idle—you are but his victim—but for your own sake. You have borne much from me to-day; be forbearing still. What can you fear from me? Have I not loved you from your very girlhood? Was I not the first to read in your young heart, and to awaken it to life? Were you not morally mine, before you were sacrificed to expediency and convenience? All that has since occurred has been the effect of chance; and we are no longer children to believe that the heart can be trammeled like the hand, and be bestowed at the bidding of another. Eveleen! only whisper once that I am still dear to you."

I could not; but I was equally unable to withstand the appealing eyes which were earnestly riveted upon me; and gently withdrawing my hands from the clasp in which they were still held, I parted the hair upon his brow, and bending down, I pressed my lips upon it for an instant. The effect of that unguarded action convinced me of the gravity of the fault which I had committed. Devereux sprang from the floor as if electrified. "I have not then lived in vain!" he exclaimed ardently; "Eveleen, you are still mine; and no power on earth shall again part us."

Terror and remorse restored me at once to composure and to prudence. "Devereux," I said beseechingly, "have pity upon me—upon yourself—you have tried me beyond my strength, and you had not to learn to-day the weakness of my nature. I have no friend, no adviser on earth, if you forsake me—if you put me beyond the pale of your own sympathy. Consider my position—remember my youth—do not teach me to hate myself, and to fear even you." My head sank upon my bosom; and when he seated himself beside me, and clasped me to his breast in silence, I only wept, for I had lost the power to resist.

"Is this generous?" I at length sobbed out.

"Forgive me, Eveleen;" he said sadly: "forgive me. I should, indeed, have remembered all this. Forget the madness of a moment, and restore me to your confidence—to your friendship—to your heart. I am alone to blame—and yet—Eveleen—Eveleen—why have we thus been fated to one common misery?"

The hand upon which his head had drooped trembled beneath its burthen; his quivering lips were white, and his whole frame shook with emotion.

"I too am culpable," I murmured gaspingly: "I should not have forgotten what was due to myself, and to the name I bear."

As I spoke a fresh cause for anxiety awoke within me. Upon the arrival of Devereux I had pleaded fatigue as a pretext for shutting out all other visitors, and I saw with dismay, on chancing to cast my eyes upon the time-piece, that several hours had elapsed since his entrance. A dread of the effects of this imprudence turned me sick at heart: I directed his attention to the fact, but he treated my fears as chimerical, and strove to persuade me that it would pass unremarked. I was, however, so conscious that this hope was vain, and my agitation became in consequence so violent, that he was soon convinced of the inutility of his efforts: and at length he reluctantly consented to depart, in pity to my terror.

CHAPTER XLIX.

Devereux had scarcely left the house when Joséphine entered my room unbidden. It was the first time that she had ventured upon such an intrusion, and even agitated as I was, I should have rebuked her for the liberty which she was then taking, had she not at once addressed me in a tone of half-confidence, to communicate the fact that Sir James had returned home two hours previously, and had been about to proceed to my dressing-room, when, on seeing her in the antechamber, he had inquired if I were alone, to which she had replied by informing him that I was in my morning-room with Colonel Devereux.

"And what prevented Sir James from seeking me there?" I asked, as calmly as I was able.

"I cannot inform miladi; Sir James looked surprised, perhaps a little angry; then he walked towards miladi's room; and then he turned back to his own, telling me to let him know when Colonel Devereux left."

"And have you done so?"

Joséphine shook her head significantly: "I take no orders but from miladi, who might be fatigued and wish to rest a little after her long visit."

Alarmed alike by what I heard, and by what I saw, I desired that Sir James might be immediately informed that I was at my toilet, and would join him at the second dinner-bell; and then abandoning myself to the hands of Joséphine, I fell into a painful train of thought. Ah, my courage had departed with Devereux, and I trembled as I sat; the very looks and motions of my attendant inspired me with terror; she evidently suspected a mystery; and what could she suspect that was not calculated to degrade me in my own eyes?

Had I been actually, as well as morally guilty, it is probable that the very extremity of my situation would have inspired me with factitious courage, or have rendered me sufficiently callous to brave its results; but as it was, I shrank before every breath. I dreaded to meet the looks of the footmen during dinner, for how knew I of what comments I had been made the subject? I shuddered as I thought of my mother—of my coming tête-à-tête with my husband—but beyond all other suffering was the dread that I had forfeited all claim to the respect of Devereux.

There, indeed, the iron had entered into my heart! In the enthusiasm and emotion of the moment, alive only to his passion, he had been all tenderness—all adoration—but when the effervescence of feeling had once subsided, how would he look back upon that morning's interview? When my beauty was no longer present to delude him—my tears to unman him—would he not forget all, save my weak and culpable neglect of my duties as a woman and a wife! Had I not been sufficiently forewarned by the scorn with which I had heard him speak of those who had forfeited their position in society? and, although in the eyes of the world I had lost nothing of my purity, I was but too well aware how conscious he himself must be that I had sinned in heart. It is true that he had been alike to blame; but I had not now to learn the impunity of his sex in all that relates to passion. While he could crush me to the earth with his disdain, he could stand proudly erect, and defy my utmost efforts to bow his head even for an instant. How bitterly I felt at this moment, when the reflection came too late, the utter madness of the woman who thus volunteers her own tortures. How my spirit yearned to recall the past—and alas! how vainly. I fancied that when I had once more met him, I should be more calm; yet the thought of that meeting came over me like a death-pang. What had to him, perhaps, been the mere passing adventure of an hour, might be to me a lifelong memory of bitterness. He knew my weakness, and henceforward I was at his mercy.

After a time I began to search at least a partial remedy for the fatal imprudence of which I had been guilty. My heart still yearned toward him with irrepressible affection, but I resolved to stifle its every throb, in order to reinstate myself in his opinion. I determined to be prudent, jealous of every word and action, to avoid every occasion of being alone with him, to gird myself about with caution and reserve; in short, to prove to him that the error of an instant would exert no baneful influence over the future.

Full of this resolve, I descended to dinner with more composure than I had hoped to exhibit. The second bell had rung, and there was barely time for me to receive and return the greeting of my husband before we seated ourselves at table.

Although the presence of the servants prevented all conversation, save those commonplace remarks and courtesies incident to the meal, I was at no loss to discover the preoccupation of Sir James. There was a mocking smile upon his lips which made me quiver; and his comments upon my loss of appetite added to the agitation which I struggled painfully to suppress. I had lost my vantage ground even with him.

At length the dinner ended; and contrary to his usual custom, Dornton left the table at the same time as myself. I was not prepared for this. The quiet hour upon which I had calculated to restore me to at least a semblance of composure, was thus denied to me, and I felt that I must at once bow my head beneath the coming avalanche.

"Are you aware, Lady Dornton," he abruptly asked, as the servants withdrew and closed the door behind them; "that I have been at home for several hours?"

"Joséphine informed me that such was the case," I replied in tones which I strove to render indifferent.

"And did she also tell you, may I inquire, that I was about to visit you on my return to the house?"

"I think that she did mention something of the kind, but said that you subsequently changed your mind."

"She doubtlessly added to her other information that I inquired whether you were alone?"

"She did, and I presumed that this novel observance was consequent upon our last conversation."

"By no means. I have sufficient knowledge of the world to be aware that the sudden apparition of a husband may be at times importunate."

"I am obliged to you for your consideration."

"I accept your thanks willingly, for upon this occasion I can have no doubt of their sincerity."

I made no reply.

"To-day, for instance," he pursued in the same accent of assumed deference; "I should have been extremely ill-advised to intrude upon a tête-à-tête. which, judging from its duration, must have been eminently interesting."

"You were perfectly free to act as you saw fit. The subject discussed by Colonel Devereux and myself was one to which you are no stranger."

"I understand, Lady Dornton; you were confiding to your early friend all the events which have occurred in the family. The arrangement does infinite credit to the respect which you evince toward those to whom you are bound by the ties of relationship and—duty."

"Your susceptibility is misplaced," I answered calmly; "Colonel Devereux was acquainted with the melancholy affair in all its details."

"Ha, indeed! his connection with the family is more intimate than I had hitherto believed. The subject must, in that case, have been skilfully anatomized during a discussion of upwards of three hours, but I readily enter into its several ramifications. The supposed wrongs of your sister naturally led, by an easy transition, to your own; and I had to be tried, condemned, and executed before you parted. Fortunately, Lady Dornton, I hold such a tribunal lightly; while I am rather inclined to fear that it may be attended with more serious results to yourself. Do you consider the proceeding of this morning calculated to insure you an increased degree of respect? Be assured that not even a French waiting-woman, mounting guard in your antechamber, can shut out curious eyes, or quiet slanderous tongues. There is not a lackey in the servants' hall who could not tell you to a second at what time Colonel Devereux was admitted, and at what time he left the house; and who will not consider himself at perfect liberty to draw his own inferences from such a visit."

"Inferences!" I exclaimed angrily; "and pray, Sir James, of what inferences will it admit?"

"The question is ingenuous! Do you imagine that I am myself the dupe of your having passed nearly four hours alone with Colonel Devereux in sighing over the moral suicide of a wrong-headed girl? And I believe that you have advanced no other pretext for this extraordinary privy council."

After my indignant exasperation of the previous evening, nothing could be more ill-judged than a tame concession at the present moment. The terms on which I had parted from my husband gave him, moreover, no right to expect consideration at my hands; but I was no longer conscience-clear; I was accused by my own heart, and my own reason; and, as a natural consequence, I gave way to a cowardice which prompted me to temporize. I therefore affected to be convinced by the reasoning of Dornton, and declared myself awakened to a conviction of my imprudence. I admitted my error without bitterness; but excused it upon the plea that Devereux was acquainted with the whole of my sister's unhappy story, and that I consequently felt I might, without indiscretion, talk of her to him without reserve.

"Perhaps," I said in conclusion, "I should have acted more prudently had I deferred this conversation for a time; but in the freshness of my grief, and confident in the innocence of my own motives, I have blindly subjected myself to miscon-truction."

"Blindly!" repeated Dornton, as he elevated his eyebrows ironically; "that is the version of the affair which you are pleased to offer to my acceptance; but you wrong yourself, nothing could be more clear-sighted. There are so few tears, be the sorrow what it may, which a lover's hand cannot wipe away."

"A lover, Sir James?"

"Yes, Lady Dornton; why should you startle at the truth? Do you, by this show of virtuous indignation, wish me to understand that Devereux listened to all your lamentations, without exacting any recompense for his patience? That would indeed be a new rôle for a young guardsman in the first harvest of his triumphs.

In short, I do not attempt to demand an explanation of your proceedings, but I beg you to be assured that I am, in no respect, your dupe."

The words of Dornton were like barbed arrows, which, without being mortal, nevertheless wounded me on every side; I could bear no more; I burst into an agony of tears.

"Are you not yet weary of overwhelming me with insult!" I asked bitterly, "have you nothing more to add which may prove equally offensive to my pride, and painful to my feelings!"

"I have this to add, Lady Dornton, that I request you to call to remembrance the wholesome advice which gave I you only yesterday; advice which you received in no very tranquil spirit, but which you have already shown to be by no means unnecessary. You have made so rapid a commencement in your career, that you would evidently go further than even I suspected, were you to remain unchecked; but, as I have no inclination to hear you quoted as one of those witless women who seem created only to afford a subject for the idle and the vicious, I forewarn you that I still retain the authority of a husband, and that I shall be by no means slow to use it."

As he ceased speaking he rang, and ordered his carriage; and then once more turning toward me, he said coldly:—

"I will now rid you of my presence, Lady Dornton. Two interviews of unmeasured duration in one day might prove too trying for your nerves. I was merely anxious that you should comprehend your true position; and we will waste no more words upon so ungracious a subject."

Then bowing sarcastically, he rose and left the room.

CHAPTER L.

I was no sooner alone, than my thoughts reverted to Devereux, and as I recalled my own words and actions of the morning, all my terror returned upon me. I was already suffering the bitter and humiliating penalty of my imprudence. The impertinence of Joséphine, which I dared not resent, and the taunts of my husband, which I could not refute, were the first fruits of my fault. As regarded Devereux himself, I felt the absolute necessity of immediately ascertaining my exact position. The few hours which had already elapsed since our meeting must have afforded time for reflection even to him; and I panted to be informed of its effect. The difficulty was how to accomplish this.

Even had I possessed a friend upon whose caution I could rely, it would have been impossible to admit a third person into such a confidence. Nothing, therefore, remained save another interview, or a written correspondence. The former alternative was too hazardous under present circumstances; and I consequently decided upon a letter. Having come to a determination on this point, I lost no time in putting it into execution; but, seating myself at once at my writing-table, prepared to pen the letter which was to decide my future conduct. The task was by no means either an easy or a pleasant one; for here again my conscience rose up in judgment against me, and held my ideas in check. The natural result ensued; my style and manner were alike constrained, and the very effort which I made to disguise the fact, gave an artificial and studied appearance to the communication. I had alike to excuse myself, and to conciliate Devereux—to admit my imprudence, and to make it appear a virtue in his eyes;—above all, it was necessary to convince him that my first error was to be my last; and to appeal to his honor and generosity to assist me in my resolve. I implored him henceforward to consider himself only as a friend—an esteemed and dear friend—who could never be more to me in this life; and I concluded by reminding him that I should estimate his respect and regard for me, in proportion to his obedience upon this point.

I was not altogether satisfied with myself as I closed the letter, but still it was sufficiently dignified to carry with it the aspect of sincerity which I was anxious it should bear. Devereux, I moreover reflected, must be aware of the agitated feelings under which it was written; and would therefore be more inclined to approve than to criticise my tardy endeavor to act prudently.

This done, I became more calm. His reply would necessary reveal to me the estimation in which he held alike my request and my reputation; and I endeavored to banish the subject from my mind until it arrived.

Another day had gone by without a word from my mother; but a hurried note from Lord Otterford had informed me that, his mournful duty performed, he had left Lady O'Halloran in safety under the roof of her son, and had himself returned to town. Adela, he said, had requested that an ample provision might be secured to Lady Flora for her life, an arrangement to which he felt convinced I should at once cheerfully accede; and the rather as from the fact of my sister having died in her minority, I had become sole heiress to my father's wealth, as well as the remainder of Lady Madelaine's jointure. He alluded also to the lease of Glenfillan, which was at my disposal; and where, he added, Lady Flora wished to reside, until I should see fit to give it another tenant.

All these details interested me but little. I replied briefly that I left everything in his hands and should be ready to subscribe to any arrangements which he might deem advisable. I had already suffered so bitterly from the possession of wealth, that its increase rather alarmed than gratified me. There was, moreover, something saddening in the conviction that all was, indeed now over with the unhappy Adela; she was no longer upon earth; they had laid her at the feet of her maternal grandfather, who little dreamed when he bartered his favorite child for gold how soon one of his victims would moulder within a foot of his own bier!

On the following day my mother made her appearance, clad in deep sables, but with little of the mourner in her look and manner. Her husband, on the contrary, was visibly depressed; the broken heart which he had just followed to the grave had probably reminded him of another, in which he had more share.

Her first inquiry was for Sir James, of whose movements I could give her no information. Her next related to the contents of the packet of which Lady O'Halloran had informed Lord Otterford. "If it contained a will," she said coldly; "you are of course aware that it is a mere mockery, as your sister died a minor, and had consequently no control over her property; while any request which she may have made is in no way binding, as her whole career has proved her perfect inability to judge rightly upon any subject."

"Her letter made no mention whatever of money matters," I answered; "had it done so, I should at least have had the gratification of fulfilling her last wishes."

Lady Madelaine shrugged her shoulders, but could not entirely conceal her uneasiness. "It is at least satisfactory," she resumed, "that she did not leave the earth as thoroughly estranged from all her family as she had lived, since she favored you with so voluminous a confidence in dying."

"In one respect," I answered, as I struggled to suppress the agitation which was gaining upon me; "it is, indeed, satisfactory, for I at length know my actual position, to which I was before worse than blind. I am forewarned for the future."

"That Adela had bequeathed to you some sentimental folly which had not tended to render you more docile or more rational, has already been binted to me by your husband," said Lady Madelaine unguardedly.

"If you allude to a communication made by Sir James Dornton, madam," I interposed resolutely; "it is needless for me to enter into any further explanation, except that I no longer recognize that individual as my husband."

Lady Madelaine bounded upon her seat.

"My dear Eveleen," said Lord Otterford, affectionately taking my hand, "do nothing rashly. You know not—you cannot guess the trials and dangers to which so young a person as yourself must be exposed, should you be so unguarded as to make the misjudged confidence of your sister the subject of a rupture with Dornton. Should your after-life be as pure as heaven, it would, nevertheless, be embittered by a thousand pangs."

"I am so conscious of it, my lord, that I have already tacitly consented to the proposition of Sir James that we should mutually avoid all public scandal; more than that he did not see fit to exact; and he was wise, or I should probably have conceded nothing."

"You have acted prudently, Lady Dornton," observed my mother, with an expression which I could not mistake.

"Yet still it would be advisable," persisted Lord Otterford, "if this unfortunate affair could be forgiven and forgotten. You are very young, Eveleen, and should you maintain your present resolution, a long life of disquiet and disgust is before you. You can never feel the happiness of home, the delight of a full and free companionship with the man to whom you have given yourself."

"Say, rather, my lord, to whom I have been given."

"Remember, too," he pursued, affecting not to have heard my interpolation, "that Sir James is a man of fashion, courted and caressed wherever he appears. Are you wise thus to risk still greater trials?"

"Your meaning is a kind one, I am convinced," I said, composedly; "but Sir James Dornton is in every respect his own master, and need apprehend no interference from me. Whatever may tend to promote his absence from a home for which he is indebted to my fortune, and for which he has made so manly and honorable a return, I shall always hail with delight. Your fears are, however, I suspect, groundless; my most dangerous rival will be the dice-box; and, moreover, I love to believe that no man can at once forget the victim whom his own perfidy has destroyed."

The words had scarcely passed my lips ere I upbraided myself for their utterance. Their effect was painful; and the stab must have been the keener from the consciousness of the sufferer that the hand which dealt it knew where the wound would be vital. Lord Otterford was silenced. I had rewarded him cruelly for his well-meant interference; but, embittered as I was by my recent trials, I regarded him only as the tool of his wife, and was anxious to rid myself at once of a new opponent. I was confirmed in this belief by the silence in which Lady Madelaine had listened to our dialogue. She was evidently aware that her own power over me was shaken, and wished to try the effect of her husband's more conciliating arguments.

"You are, then, resolved to assume the heroine, Lady Dornton," she said, as she remarked that Lord Otterford had, incomprehensibly to her, withdrawn from the combat; "in another week you will be the laughing-stock of all London."

I smiled sarcastically.

"And if this prospect do not deter you," she pursued, with rising anger, "understand at once that I will never consent to a course of such egregious folly."

"The same bequest which exonerated me from all supposed duty to my husband freed me equally from all enforced obedience to your ladyship. The hand of Miss Tilden was bartered at your pleasure—bandied from duke to commoner—resumed, and again bestowed as it suited your convenience; but the dignity of Lady Dornton is beyond your reach—exempt from your control. I acknowledge no right of interference between myself and the man to whom you married me."

Lady Madelaine rose. A red spot had mounted to her cheek, and seemed to burn there. Her eyes flashed with anger. "Beware, Lady Dornton!" she exclaimed, as she turned to leave the room: "you are not sufficiently immaculate to take so high a stand without risking a fall."

As Lord Otterford prepared to follow her, I extended my hand, but he shrank back. "Forgive me!" I murmured pleadingly.

He glanced toward the door through which my mother had just disappeared, and then seizing my hand, he wrung it earnestly as he whispered, "I do—I do forgive you, though it was cruel, Eveleen, very cruel. Heaven help you, my poor girl; your lot is a bitter one." And in another moment he, too, was gone.

I was buried in a maze of gloomy thought when Joséphine once more suddenly stood before me, and extended towards me a salver upon which lay a letter. My heart beat violently, and for an instant I felt unable to take it.

"I thought miladi would never be alone," said the soubrette, as I at length put forth my trembling hand. "More than an hour I have waited with this maudite lettre; and my lady is so abattue and triste in her mourning dress!"

"Joséphine," I asked, "from whom did you receive this letter?"

"Miladi must not be angry," said the Frenchwoman, with affected humility; "but I watched for the valet of Monsieur le Colonel, to bring it myself to miladi."

"And how knew you," I again inquired with difficulty, for my heart throbbed with such violence that it almost choked my words—"how could you know that Colonel Devereux was about to write?"

"Miladi forgets that she did not leave her letter upon the table à son ordinaire, but commanded me to see that it was delivered safe. I did as miladi bid me. I took it where it was sent, and then I waited for the answer, that it might come safely too."

I could find no fitting reply to so circumstantial a rejoinder, and therefore made a gesture that my too intelligent attendant should leave the room, which she did with the same affected caution as she had entered.

The letter was, indeed, from Devereux, and I trembled with impatience as I tore it open. It afforded the most perfect contrast to my own: brief, simple, sincere, and manly. He acquiesced alike in the prudence and the propriety of my decision, without excusing his own imprudence; he reminded me of our long friendship and mutual regard, which he declared, on his side, to be immutable; pitied us both for the sacrifices to which we were condemned, but of which he nevertheless admitted the necessity; and, finally, applauded and approved my courageous resolutions, pledging himself religiously to respect them.

This was truly what I had asked of him; but I am bound to confess that at that moment I felt that I had not expected so much. I was dissatisfied with his reply throughout. My pride was hurt that he should pity me as much as himself; my vanity was wounded that the extreme of prudence could tread so closely upon the extreme of passion; I was mortified, above all, that my heroism had not excited alike his wonder and his despair, and that I had no longer the triumph of combating his passion.

I was not worthy of the love of such a heart. He believed that he had wronged me, and he was now anxious to repair his fault, and to do justice to my virtues, while I was only lamenting over an obedience which should have made me appear more estimable in my own eyes, and asking myself whether, abandoned as I was by those who should have cherished me, so vast a sacrifice as I had thus volunteered could indeed be requisite.

Suddenly a new inspiration dawned upon me. The ready compliance of Devereux removed, at least for the present, all danger of interference from either my mother or Sir James. I would await only the close of my mourning to plunge freely into the world. I must inevitably meet him everywhere, but it would be in a crowd; he would understand and appreciate a thousand trifles which would pass unheeded by those around us; I should no longer feel desolate and unloved, for he would be near me—and that too without peril and without blame.

Meanwhile I rarely saw Sir James; and when we met it was with a cold and ceremonious politeness, which scarcely amounted to courtesy. I knew that he played high, and that his losses were occasionally serious; but for this I cared nothing; nor should I have bestowed the slightest attention on his altered habits, had he not, on the first occasion of my receiving company after my sister's death, absented himself from home, and thus given reason for those suspicions against which he had so strenuously urged me to guard myself. This circumstance induced me to watch him more narrowly; and I was not long in discovering that his character had totally changed. His gaiety was gone; his sparkling conversation had become abrupt, pointless, and constrained; he no longer even affected any deference for my tastes or wishes, and his whole manner was absent and preoccupied.

That some mystery was concealed beneath this change was evident; and, for the first time since I had been his wife, he succeeded in piquing my curiosity. I was not fated to endure it long.

The reappearance of a popular singer, after a long and dangerous indisposition, had attracted all the fashion of London to Drury Lane on a particular night; and, in accordance with the resolution that I had formed, I exerted myself to obtain a box, in which with considerable difficulty I succeeded. To my great delight, Lady Devereux visited me early in the day, in order that I might condole with her upon the increased gout of Sir Herbert, and her inability to witness the welcome prepared for Mrs. Billington, every box in the house having been taken for the last eight-and-forty hours. I instantly volunteered my own; and, affecting to have forgotten the indisposition of the baronet, I promised to reserve two seats for her use.

The delighted pleasure-hunter left me, perfectly relieved in mind; and I remarked with considerable satisfaction that she also, in the triumph of the moment, had overlooked the ailments of her lord, and must, consequently, confide herself to the protection of her son. Secure in his mother's presence, I was safe from all remark or animadversion, and I looked forward to the pageant of the evening with an anxiety which might have forewarned me that I was preparing for no common spectacle.

CHAPTER LI.

Lady Devereux was punctual, and I was received by herself and her son upon arriving at the theatre. Of course I was surprised and grieved to find that Sir Herbert was unable to venture upon this slight dissipation; but I nevertheless submitted to the substitution which had been made with very amiable philosophy. I was in brilliant spirits; my temporary retirement from the world had given pleasure a new zest, while it rendered me an object of interest to those who now for the first time hailed my reappearance. I felt that my box was an a traction to the whole house; nor was Lady Devereux blind to the fact, but put forth all her waning fascinations to effect her own share in the triumph; while her son, half-hidden in shadow behind my chair, was almost invisible to the audience.

I had returned the greeting gestures of my dear five hundred friends, and was quietly making a circuit of the house with my lorgnette, when the door of the private box which immediately faced my own was flung back, and a handsome woman, about ten years my senior, showily and not altogether correctly dressed, entered, and leaned for a moment into the broad light of the chandelier, while a pair of bold but magnificent black eyes wandered over the audience. She wore no powder; neither had she polluted her cheeks by the coat of rouge which was at that period considered almost indispensable to female beauty; but masses of raven curls fell upon the ample shoulders which would otherwise have been bare, and the glow of conscious triumph lent a bloom to her cheek and a fire to her glance. A mantle of black velvet edged with ermine had fallen from her neck as she entered, and was only upheld by the whitest and most finely-modeled arms that I ever remembered to have seen. There was, in short, an originality in her beauty which enforced admiration, even while its audacity blended the homage with a feeling for which it was difficult to account.

I was gazing, with this vague sensation, upon the proud woman before me, and was inquiring her identity of Colonel Devereux, when a movement took place in her box; and, as she stepped a pace back, a second female appeared for an instant, and then dropped quietly into a chair, with her back to the stage; and while she was in the act of doing this, a hand withdrew the mantle from the grasp of her companion, and, raising my glass once more to my eye, I discovered in the attentive cavalier Sir James Dornton.

"That," said Devereux, replying to the question which I had already put, "is the celebrated Mrs. Delamaine, who, after her divorce, went over to Italy, whence she only returned a month or two ago, having become as noted at Florence and Milan as she had previously been in London."

"And where is her husband?" I asked, still gazing attentively upon her box.

"Not where yours is, my dear Eveleen," laughed Lady Devereux; "for as I live, il fait les yeux doux to this fallen goddess."

"So I perceive, and compliment him alike upon his taste and his propriety; but where is her own?"

"In his grave," whispered Devereux; "he could not brook the disgrace which she incessantly brought upon him, and found his refuge in a pistol."

"The woman is, then, a fiend!" I exclaimed indignantly.

Devereux sighed audibly.

Thenceforth the stage and the audience lost all their interest for me. I felt that the enigma which had lately bewildered me was solved: Dornton was in the snare of the syren. For the abstract fact I cared nothing; but no married woman can coolly look upon so public a demonstration of neglect without mortification. That he had not anticipated my presence in the house was probable; but it was still more certain that he had taken no pains to avoid so disagreeable and disgraceful an encounter.

"Am I not justified?" I asked, in a low voice, as I turned towards Devereux.

He frowned, turned pale, and made no reply.

Suddenly the eyes of Mrs. Delamaine rested upon me; and, with a smile, she addressed some remark to the pale and spirit-broken-looking woman who sat beside her. There was a condescending expression of admiration in her gaze which brought the proud blood to my cheek; never had I felt so indignant. As my heart throbbed beneath her glance, she turned her head and addressed Dornton, who had hitherto remained in the back of the box, but who bent forward evidently at her bidding, and started as he encountered my glance. For a moment he appeared irresolute, but only for a moment; and then I saw the obedient confidant rise from her seat and resign it to Sir James, who had, apparently, resolved to brave the difficulty in which he found himself. Not one of his movements escaped me. I could explain them all. From the expression of Mrs. Delamaine, I felt assured that he had announced me as his wife—his wife! And then there were more questions and more rejoinders. There was a mocking smile upon the lip of Dornton, and a glow of gratified vanity upon the cheek of his companion, who occasionally glanced curiously toward me, as if to reconcile what she heard with what she saw. My position was a trying one: totally indifferent as I was to Sir James, and careless of the depreciating comparisons which he might see fit to make between an outraged wife and a new mistress, still I had heard enough to feel that he had placed himself in the power of a very dangerous woman. They were evidently upon terms of the closest intimacy, and I began to ask myself how long that intimacy had existed. Devereux was, or affected to be, as ignorant upon the subject as myself; and I was still endeavoring to calculate its duration by circumstances, when my attention was attracted by voices in the next box to my own, which had remained empty until a few minutes previously, and from which a fashionably-dressed man was now sweeping the boxes with his lorgnette.

"I see the handsome Delamaine is in full force," he observed, as he seated himself upon a chair which was only divided from my own by the thin partition, and the folds of the curtain, which he had carelessly pressed back with his elbow.

"Yes, and I see also that she has brought down her bird," answered a second voice, equally careless of being overheard; "I thought that Dornton was likely to be the next on the list, when I met them at Ranelagh; but although he has almost lived in her house for the last three weeks, I did not quite expect to find the affair advertised so soon in public."

Devereux was about to speak, but I motioned him to silence; and, like myself, he became all ear.

"It was a mystery known to half London which was not worth any farther affectation," retorted the first speaker; "moreover, no one now asks of the Delamaine, how is it? but simply, who is it?"

A faint sickness crept over me. It was, then, for such a fallen woman as this that insult had been heaped upon me. I know not to what lengths my indignation would have carried me, had I not at that very moment felt the hand of Devereux stealing gently to my waist. My head drooped, and a painful feeling of humiliation rendered me once more passive.

"Dornton is a blockhead," resumed the second stranger: "he no sooner cajoles an old flirt into giving him her daughter and some ninety thousand pounds, than he begins to play the Lothario. They say that the girl never loved him, and that, handsome as she was, he returned the compliment; still, there was some consideration due to the woman who paid his debts and patched up his lost credit; but it is always the case with fellows on the wane: they can never amuse themselves quietly, but must always have a crowd to look on."

The attention of the strangers was now attracted to some other group, and I heard no more of the subject in which I was interested; but I had heard enough; and, coldly withdrawing myself from the clasp of Devereux, I requested him to ascertain if my carriage were in waiting, as I was anxious to return home. Lady Devereux, who had also seen, and been seen, as much as she considered necessary, declared her intention of following my example, to the evident discomfiture of her son, who accordingly quitted the box in quest of our servants.

"Do you know, Eveleen," said my companion, as he left us together, "that the conduct of Sir James to-night is quite too bad. If Sir Herbert had ever affiché himself in such a way when we were young people, I should have been furious; and there you sit as calmly as though he had never entered the house."

"You probably loved Sir Herbert, my good friend, and I am totally indifferent to Sir James," I said, forcing a smile, "and there you at once discover the secret of my composure."

"But consider the imprudence into which such a liaison may betray him. Women of that stamp are expensive toys."

"Not more so than the gaming table."

"Oh, you are, then, aware of Dornton's failure in that respect. I am sure I warned your mother a hundred times of the risk she ran in making you the wife of such a man."

"He was her alternative for Mr. Curties."

"Mr. Curties!" echoed Lady Devereux; "she had no opportunity of choosing between them. Had you been the Medicean Venus in petticoats, you would have made no impression upon that block of living marble."

"Yet I was led to believe—"

"My dear Lady Dornton," said my companion, in the same tone in which she would have lamented the naughtiness of a spoiled child, "all your life you have been so easily led to believe anything."

Any reply was rendered impossible by the reappearance of our cavalier, who announced that the carriages were drawn up. With a prudence, partly suggested by the presence of Sir James, and no doubt increased by my own coldness, Devereux carefully enveloped his mother in her wraps, leaving me to adjust my own shawl; after which he tendered an arm to each, and we left the house. As I resolutely declined his escort, he put me into my carriage, and then handing his mother into hers, he made a low and somewhat constrained bow, and returned to the theatre.

I arrived at home perfectly satisfied with myself, but still marveling what would be the effect of my repelling manner upon Devereux. The sight of the bold beauty of Mrs. Delamaine, and the light tone in which she had been spoken of, had struck to my heart like a solemn warning; and had the impression lasted, it is probable that I should have been a wiser and a better woman; as it was, this impression was weakened by the feeling of self-justification induced by the public off-falling of my husband.

I was still in my dressing-room on the following morning, when, to my astonishment, Dornton made his appearance. He had assumed an expression of unusual amiability, through which I could, nevertheless, detect a tinge of embarrassment that he struggled vainly to conceal.

"You took me by surprise last evening, Lady Dornton," he said, as he threw himself into a chair; "I did not know that you had determined altogether to emerge from your seclusion; and, when I discovered you—acting upon the principle which I announced some time ago—I forebore all intrusion. What did you think of the beautiful woman whom I had the honor to escort?"

"That you were quite worthy of the honor which had devolved upon you."

Sir James bit his lip, and was visibly disconcerted.

"She is, indeed, a charming person," he said after a moment, "and would make a delightful addition to your circle."

"To my circle, Sir James! If you are in facetious mood, I entreat that you will select more seemly subject for your wit."

"I am perfectly serious; I see no jest in the suggestion I have made."

"It is, then, intended as an insult?"

"Really, Lady Dornton, you are inexplicable. Can it be, that, in your character of a pretty woman, you are jealous of her attractions? Such a suspicion would be degrading to you, and utterly contemptible."

"Your affected ignorance does not impose upon me for an instant, sir," I said, haughtily; "you must be perfectly aware of the cause which prevents any recognition of the person to whom you allude from me; or, should you indeed, be unconscious of the character of your new friend, permit me to enlighten you."

"I have no taste for women's gossipry, and defy you to prove anything against Mrs. Delamaine."

"The defiance is amusing," I retorted contemptuously; "a divorced wife, the widow of a suicide, and the mistress of—"

"Proceed, Lady Dornton."

"Of a gambler."

The blood flashed in a crimson tide over the forehead of Sir James. I was evidently better informed than he anticipated.

"You are, as usual, the dupe of some one who profits by your weakness," he said, striving to rally; "Mrs. Delamaine is amiable, timable, and accomplished. She would grace any circle which could secure her."

"You allude, doubtless, to the circles of the lobbies and the gaming-houses."

This was the spark which ignited the fire that was raging in the bosom of Dornton. He, hitherto the most immovable, the most self-possessed of men, became the most violent under the influence of the new and overwhelming passion of which he was the victim. His utterance was passionate and bitter. Not a trait of my past life escaped him which could be tortured into invective. I was not slow in paying back the injury. I reproached him with his meanness, his falsehood, his ignoble submission to the will of an imperious woman; the ruinous effects of his vices; the waste which he had made in a fortune which he could not call his own. He staggered under my vehemence, and uttered, in a tone of bitterness, the name of Devereux. I defied him to prove his accusation. He forbade me to see him again; I defied him in the same tone; and, overcome at length by the storm which he had himself provoked, he sprang from his seat and left the room.

I felt that once more I had conquered; but it was a painful triumph, for I had achieved it at the expense of that dignity which I had hitherto maintained. My whole spirit was up in arms: I felt degraded, but not disheartened. A resolute defiance blinded me to my own defects, and kept those of Sir James constantly before me; and in this frame of mind I descended to the drawing-room.

My first visitor was Devereux. He came, as he alleged, at the desire of his mother, who was anxious to ascertain that I had reached home in safety; and then he apologized for an intrusion which, he asserted, from my manner on the preceding evening, he felt to be almost inexcusable.

"Had you not forgotten our compact?" I asked reproachfully, as a deep blush mounted to my brow.

"I throw myself on your mercy. I was not aware that your exaction was so extreme."

"We will talk no more of it," I said, hurriedly. "I hastened home as an escape from a new and serious annoyance; but it was not so easily to be evaded. Sir James has declared himself the friend and champion, if not something more than this, of Mrs. Delamaine—of the Cleopatra of last night. I have already experienced the bitter fruits of this new indignity. He has been with me this morning to suggest that I should receive her as a friend. What is your opinion of this proposal?"

"That it was disgraceful on the part of Lady Dornton's husband. And what did you reply?"

"All that was befitting, without attempting to disguise the contempt which I felt alike for him and for his protégée."

"Your refusal was correct and necessary; your contempt would have been better suppressed. It is dangerous to provoke the hatred of the vicious. I do not believe that Dornton himself is radically wicked; but he is very weak, which frequently produces the same results."

I had expected that Devereux would have shared my exasperation, and exhausted himself in invective against my tormentors; and I was, consequently, quite unprepared for this rebuke. So much composure, contrasted with my own violence, appeared to me to be misplaced, and in every point of view a proof of his indifference. I was not without a consciousness that no married woman can, with safety to her own peace and honor, make a confident of any young male friend, let the extent of their intimacy be what it may; and I was, accordingly, the more moved by this apparent want of interest in my anxieties, that I had wilfully rushed into a peril which had produced such inadequate results.

I reproached Devereux for his want of sympathy.

"You do not act fairly with me, Lady Dornton," he said, in a subdued tone; "last night you crushed me with your displeasure for a simple change of position, and to-day you accuse me of coldness because I restrain my feelings, and compel myself to assume a composure which would but too readily give way before very different emotions."

"Perhaps I am wrong," I replied, as I turned toward him with a smile which expressed the conviction of my own error more fully than my words; "I will even try to believe so; but you must at least admit, on your side, that you are strangely inconsistent in your friendship. You bring the stoical philosophy of Cato to the hearth-rug of the drawing-room, and exhibit it at all times and seasons. Nothing destroys your equanimity—at least, nothing that one would voluntarily provoke—and you give advice where you are only asked for sympathy."

"You know how deeply, how earnestly I feel for you."

"I would not willingly doubt it; but still, in your present mood, I have a suspicion that you would subscribe, without opposition, to the command which I have received to close my doors against you."

"Decidedly, if by so doing I could secure your happiness. But who has suggested such a proceeding?"

"That, I should imagine, is a riddle by no means difficult to read; but I indignantly repulsed a mandate which I should have felt degraded by admitting."

"The arrangement would have been as absurd as it was ill-judged," replied Devereux, still in the same quiet accent; "as, in order to prevent our meeting, you must have discontinued to visit your own mother and to appear in the world. Nevertheless, as I would not willingly compromise you even for an instant, I shall, thus warned, confine my appearance in your own house to those distant and necessary courtesies which are incumbent on me as a family connection."

"I was prepared for this decision," I exclaimed bitterly; "nothing costs you any effort, and you do not give yourself the trouble to reflect upon the probable consequences of a sudden neglect, which cannot fail to be remarked by those about me. But it will, perhaps, be better so: totally abandoned to the violence and ill-will of Dornton, he will have less trouble in ultimately ridding himself of his victim; for I feel that, alone and unsupported, I shall not ong have strength to contend against the trials to which I am exposed."

"Lady Dornton, do you accuse me of want of reflection? Were my feeling toward you other than it is, I should not venture to remind you of the danger of wilfully exciting the animosity of those by whom you may be seriously injured. Let the thunder-cloud which you have invoked pass by."

"You use strong expressions on a very inconsequent occasion," I retorted, peevishly, "and appear to look upon everything through a gloomy medium. I was, perhaps, myself startled by the outbreak of Dornton at the moment; but the reflection of an instant, for which I am indebted to your want of sympathy in my trials, has sufficed to reassure me. Sir James is weak—you have yourself admitted this fact; he dreads a public rupture, and he is ruled by my mother. His lofty words can produce no fruit. He is too exquisite an egotist to drive to extremity the woman to whom he owes his ease."

"But suppose, fair casuist, that Lady Madelaine should not support you in your opposition, how could you assist yourself without her aid?"

"Oh, pray do not let us amuse ourselves by supposing improbabilities. Act as you see fitting. I can make no claim upon either your sympathy or your assistance; and you shall yet learn that I am possessed of sufficient firmness to resent the insult which I have received from the man whose name I bear."

I was disposed to quarrel even with Devereux, because he had exhibited more respect for me than I was prepared to exact. It had been my misfortune through life to preärrange all the actions of others in connection with myself, and the consequent result was perpetual disappointment. I was even yet too ignorant of human nature—thanks to my self-confidence, which admitted no lessons save those which struck right to the heart, and left their scars behind them—too unsuspicious of its subtlety, to suspect that the coldness of which I had condescended to complain was the result of a delicate tact on the part of my companion, who, believing himself sure of his victory, preferred the smooth diplomacy of a Talleyrand to the less temporizing prowess of an Alexander. Devereux was a man of feeling and refinement, who sought rather to win me from myself than to surprise me into a weakness; and he, unfortunately, knew enough of my natural temper and disposition to consider time and caution as his best allies.

It need scarcely be stated that, when he left the house, I felt thoroughly dissatisfied both with him and myself. I had conceded too much, and he too little. I had wounded my own pride, and he had trampled upon it as it lay prostrate before him. I had now only one resource. My home had become a desert, my mother a stranger, my husband an enemy, Devereux a censor, and I stood alone. There was, however, stretching along between the dark and yawning gulfs which had swallowed up my past and my future hopes, one narrow pathway strewn with flowers and radiant with sunshine. The world was still before me! I could revenge myself on destiny.

CHAPTER LII.

My toilet on the evening of that day was more recherchée than ever; my rouge more glowing, and my eyes more bright. I went alone to the Opera-house; and my box was filled in succession by all the gay and idle men of fashion who had the entrée. Never had I been so gracious to the one sex, or so sarcastic on the subject of the other; and before the conclusion of the ballet, I found that to the reputation of a beauty, I had added that of a wit. My success was complete. I had divided the attention of the house with Grassini and Tramezzani. I was intoxicated alike by the praises of the men, and the affected disdain of the women; and in this mood of mind, I drove from the Haymarket to the ombre and basso party of a young and lively foreign ambassadress; where, without having suffered myself to waste one moment on reflection, I discovered as I reached home that I had emulated Sir James himself at the gaming-table; made myself a subject of general remark; and created more than one enemy. But as this did not, in my present mood of mind, affect me for a moment, I entered the house humming an aria of Grassini, to which I ought to have given my attention while she was singing it; and on reaching my dressing-room perceived for the first time the absence of Joséphine, for whom I rang somewhat impatiently. My summons was answered by an attendant who had been accustomed to assist her in her duties, and who presented herself upon the threshold somewhat timidly.

"What means this?" I asked imperiously; "where is Joséphine?"

"Mademoiselle Joséphine was dismissed by Sir James, my lady, soon after your ladyship left the house; and I was ordered to await your ladyship's return, and to perform her duties."

"In that case," I said coldly; "you may at once retire to rest, as I am not accustomed to accept the services of strangers about my person."

The woman withdrew; and, taking one of the lights from my toilet-table, I walked at once to the dressing-room of Sir James; resolved to demand an explanation of the extraordinary step which he had taken. So gratuitous an interference with my personal establishment was an impertinence on his part which to me appeared the heaping of "Pelion on Ossa"—the culminating point of injury. I could not disguise from myself that it was intended as a trial of strength; and this conviction determined me to resent the insult.

The surprise of Dornton, on entering his apartment at daybreak, may be imagined, to see me, still covered with jewels and draped in satin, occupying a fauteuil beside the hearth; especially when he remembered our present estrangement. I however left him no time to comment upon the singularity of the circumstance.

"I am here, Sir James," I said haughtily, "to inquire by what right you have dismissed my waiting-woman?"

"You are easily answered, Lady Dornton; by the right of a husband who will not suffer under his roof the agent of his wife's intrigues—the confidant of his wife's disgrace."

"Explain yourself, sir."

"Joséphine was your letter-carrier. Do you require any further detail?"

"Sir James Dornton, I will no longer submit to this tyranny,—to this dictation. I am at length determined to assert myself."

"We have, in that case, formed a mutual resolution; for, conscious that my supineness and indulgence have already produced an ill effect both upon your feeling and your conduct, I will henceforward compel you to respect both yourself and me; and to yield implicit obedience to my will, be it what it may."

The harshness and assumption of this reply produced a very different effect upon me from what he had evidently anticipated. I answered in as high a key, and our dissension became even more violent than that of the previous evening. We had no longer any terms to keep with each other. To the name of Devereux I responded by that of Mrs. Delamaine; to his taunts of my general levity, I opposed his own extraordinary influence with my mother; and was even so far misled by my passion as to hint that, in all probability, it was a mystery which would not safely admit of solution.

"You are a disgrace to your sex," thundered out Sir James, as he retreated a few paces; "leave the room, madam; and deliver me from the presence of a woman for whom nothing is sacred."

"I go, because I am anxious to retire to rest," I said with a contemptuous smile; "and I leave you to your dreams of the past; for in your projects for the future you have sadly deceived yourself."

"Time will show," was his reply, as he abruptly turned his back on me, and rang for his valet.

I was now in open rebellion; and, strange to say, I felt happier than I had done for months. I no longer hesitated to display my preference for Devereux wherever we met in society; while at the same time I indulged in a general system of coquetry, which at length compelled my mother to interfere. It will easily be understood, however, in what spirit I received her reprimand. I talked of the past; and inquired if I had ever committed myself with Colonel Devereux, as she had, during my father's lifetime, compromised her own dignity with the man to whom she had subsequently married her daughter, and afterward with her present husband.

"Believe me, madam," I concluded sarcastically: "the reproof falls pointless from your lips; for our fate has been more similar in life, as well as our actions, than you appear willing to comprehend. Your noble father married you to a commoner in order to secure his wealth: my noble mother married me to a roué, in order to secure his—friendship: my husband rendered himself conspicuous by breaking the heart of my own sister—while yours—"

"Speak, Lady Dornton," almost shrieked my mother, wounded in her tenderest point—her vanity; "speak! what is it that you dare to insinuate?"

"I insinuate nothing," I replied, triumphant at the effect which I had produced, and forgetful of all, save the gratification of the moment; and, most and worst, of the kindly feeling which Lord Otterford had invariably exhibited toward me; "I insinuate nothing; but merely advise you to inquire of your husband, the exact nature of the consumption which laid poor Emily Vernon in a foreign grave."

"Eveleen, you are a fiend!" gasped out Lady Madelaine, with clasped hands, and quivering lips.

"I am what you have made me. One of your victims has already paid the penalty of her parentage; but the other is before you, prepared to contend rather than to suffer."

"Only tell me that you have spoken at random, and that there was no covert meaning your words!"

"I have no more to say upon the subject."

"But, Lady Dornton, I insist—"

"Uselessly, madam; and as it is now time that I should dress for court, you must pardon me for leaving you, should you desire to prolong your visit," and courtesying ceremoniously I left the room.

Strangely, pitiably, had my feelings become perverted. The knowledge that I had revenged my wrongs upon my mother gave me an energy, which made me dazzling. I felt no weariness during the period of my toilet, tedious as it was, for my thoughts were fully occupied; and when I fell into the rank to proceed to St. James's, I had never been more satisfied with myself, for I had found in my dressing-room a magnificent bouquet of exotics, about which my new attendant affected to know nothing, while she was aware that her silence told me all.

As the carriages moved slowly onward, I pressed the gorgeous flowers to my lips more than once; and when I at length arrived at the Palace, I found myself surrounded by adulation and flattery; my spirits rose still higher, and I scarcely heeded the shrugs and sneers which I occasionally detected in the courtly crowd. I had accepted the arm of Colonel Devereux upon the staircase, and my first care was to thank him for his elegant and well-timed present. He merely smiled his reply, and pressed my arm more closely against his side. But in the throne-room my triumphs ceased. The queen looked coldly upon me; and the princesses affected to be discoursing, and not to be conscious of my approach. From the princes I received my usual greeting, but I felt that my popularity at the palace was at an end.

"Tu es échouée, ma chère!" said my friend the ambassadress, when we again met in the crowd. She might have spared me the assurance, for I knew it.

I murmured my indignation to Devereux, but he only chid me for my weakness, in regarding as an affront the caprice of a straight-laced old lady, while he reminded me of the admiration which I had elicited from the Prince of Wales; and I was obliged to accept this as compensation, and affect to laugh at my own sensitive folly. The blow had been struck, however; but instead of inducing me to redeem the past, it only fortified me in the belief that I must make myself independent of the world, as I had already done of all home ties; that I must, in short, rely upon my own strength, and demonstrate to the utmost how entirely I had been misjudged. Colonel Devereux did not put me into my carriage until he had arranged to join me at the Opera: and I arrived at home at an unusually late hour, the drawing-room having been a full one.

When I drove to the door, I was surprised to see the carriage of Dornton, with four post-horses, move a few paces forward to allow of my approach; but as I cared little for his personal arrangements, I made no inquiry as to the cause of its appearance there, and at once proceeded to my room. No doubt, he was, like myself, wearied of the constant conflicts which now characterized our domestic têtes-à-têtes, and was about to vary the scene by a visit to some distant friend, perhaps to escort Mrs. Delamaine to the coast. Be it as it might, I only congratulated myself on his approaching absence; and heartily wished him a long and prosperous journey.

Nothing could be either more specious or more probable than these conjectures; and assuredly, nothing was ever more opposite to the truth.

At the door of my anteroom I found the valet of Sir James, who requested me to pass in the first place into the library, where his master was awaiting my return. I was annoyed at this, for I was in no humor to encounter him at that moment; and as I slowly advanced in the direction indicated, I sought for an instant some sufficient pretext for refusing the interview.

"Tell Sir James," I said, just as I reached the door, "that I am overcome with fatigue, and will receive him to-morrow morning in my dressing-room."

As I ceased speaking, I turned upon my heel, and was just congratulating myself upon my escape, when the door opened, and Sir James appeared upon the threshold.

"You have returned late," he said, as he held it open for me to pass: "the horses have been put-to more than an hour."

"And what can there be in common," I asked, as I advanced rapidly into the room, in order that his servant might not be a party in the discussion; "between your post-horses and my return?"

"Do you not guess, madam? You are now sufficiently compromised to leave town, I should imagine, without regret; but, be it as it may, you must leave it, and that instantly. Common propriety exacts it, your mother insists upon it, and I will have it done."

"Do you mean to assert that my mother is cognisant of this tyranny, and that she ventures to authorize it? I will not be so imposed upon. My sister is as yet scarcely cold in her grave, and she cannot so soon have forgotten that deathbed."

"You do both your mother and myself less than justice, Lady Dornton; while your exaggerations are absurd and ill-placed. Your life is in perfect safety—would that your reputation were equally secure. But, madam, you are incapable of self-government; and must not be abandoned to your own imprudent, not to say vicious, tendencies. Far from seeking to revenge upon you the insults to which we have both been subjected by your intemperate inferences, we are anxious to secure to you an opportunity of redeeming the past. I shall accompany you to the country, where you will have leisure to reflect, to become rational, and to acquire certain qualities and virtues in which you are at present most unhappily deficient."

"I will appeal to Lord Otterford," I exclaimed with vehemence; "he will never sanction such unheard-of violence."

"Lord Otterford!" echoed Dornton in a tone of pained reproach; "have you indeed the pretension to seek a champion in the man whom you have so deeply injured? In your victim of this morning?"

The blood curdled at my heart. Bitterly did I at that moment repent my treachery, but it was too late. I felt that I had indeed no longer a right to claim his support or kindness.

"Make no resistance," pursued Sir James coldly; "for it will be useless. Even the world will no longer uphold you, for that world has seen you slighted where all seek to please; and I will have no more public jests at my expense."

My mental reaction was frightful. I could scarcely comprehend my own identity. Ten hours before I had been occupied only by dreams of triumph and of pleasure; idolized by the world, by the man I loved, by the gay flutterers about me; rich in the world's gifts of wealth, and youth, and fashion, I could have defied fate to overthrow the trophies of my vanity; but in an instant all these gorgeous visions had disappeared, and I saw before me only a compelled and comfortless exile: cheerless isolation, and endless humiliations. I shrank from the hateful prospect: but all my firmness was gone. I uttered one long piercing scream, and fainted.

Dornton rang for my attendants, even assisted in removing my jewels and head-dress, and then, when I had partially recovered from the swoon, offered me his arm to reach my own room. My first impulse was to refuse his support, but as I found myself too weak to dispense with assistance, I was compelled to accept the courtesy. No word was exchanged between us until we reached the door, when he said as calmly as though we had been about to spend the evening in the adjoining street:

"In an hour precisely, Lady Dornton, I will again be here to conduct you to the carriage. Your woman has, I believe, made all the necessary arrangements; and you have only to rest yourself, and endeavor to regain your strength."

I made no reply, for I was stricken to the very earth. I found, as he had stated, my drawers and wardrobes empty; and was informed by my attendant that their contents were already on the way to Rooksley. A close traveling dress with a bonnet and mantle were spread upon the bed; in short, "my home was made unto me desolate."

My first care was to tear off the finery in which I was tricked out, and which seemed to mock my wretchedness. The composure of despair took possession of me, and I put on, one after the other, all the elaborate wraps that had been provided for me by the zealous care of my woman; I remember that I even drew on my gloves, although I was parched with fever, and gasped for air; and then I cast myself into a chair, and remained silent and passive. I neither wept nor thought. My brain burned and throbbed; and I was sick and faint for want of sustenance; but no wish for food grew upon me. I had a mere vague perception of my existence, and nothing more.

At the appointed time Dornton reappeared, and I instinctively rose as he approached me. Once more my hand rested upon his arm, but this partial support no longer sufficed, and I staggered, and should have fallen, had he not thrown his other arm about my waist, and borne me up.

My dejection became complete when I saw Dornton and the new attendant whom he had placed about me, follow me into the carriage, and that no friendly face had appeared to shed one ray of comfort over my departure. I had from the first disliked this woman, whom I considered as the agent of his tyranny, and at such a moment the loathing naturally increased. Why had he forced her upon me, in the very carriage? Beyond all doubt in order to avoid finding himself again alone in my society. We soon left the metropolis behind us, and as we not long afterward stopped to change horses, I imagine that the light of the lanterns which flashed into the carriage, had afforded a melancholy view of my pale and wretched face, for I saw Dornton suddenly start, and he inquired anxiously of the attendant if I had taken any refreshment since my return from court. She had no sooner replied in the negative than he drew from a traveling case a bottle of Malaga and some biscuits, of which coldly but resolutely he compelled me to partake; and this done he drew himself closely into his corner, and either slept, or affected to do so, until the morning.

What a strange combination of inconsistencies does human nature present! I remained widely awake throughout the whole of that long night; but I neither mourned over the past, nor speculated upon the future; I was buried in marvel as to the real feelings of the weary woman who sat before me.

In prosperity we little heed those who minister to our comforts in a subordinate capacity. All that we care to know of individuals who are so widely separated from ourselves in interest, in habit, in feeling, and in sympathy, is their adroitness in performing their allotted duties; and we feed our own vanity with the belief that all their faculties are limited to the proper performance of those duties. In misfortune we begin to understand our error, and to comprehend our mutual dependence; where we find a sympathizing auditor, we please ourselves by believing that we have found a friend; and although I had not yet brought myself to confide in Joséphine, still I was conscious that she was in my secret; and this very consciousness had already rendered her necessary to me. Nevertheless, while absorbed in pleasure, and meeting Devereux daily, I had been less susceptible of her loss; but now I felt as if I were at the mercy of a hired spy; and, inconsistent as it may appear at such a crisis, this fact weighed more heavily upon me than all the rest.

We arrived at last, to my surprise, at Rooksley; and I became more calm. I even persuaded myself that Sir James had only endeavored to alarm me, by showing the extent of his power as a husband; and, rocked by this pleasant delusion, I retired to bed, and fell into a deep and refreshing sleep.

CHAPTER LIII.

Evening had flung its drapery over my chamber ere I awoke and even then it was by the cautious opening of a door which led to my servants' apartments. I raised myself upon my elbow, and to my extreme astonishment, I saw Susan, my new attendant, stealthily approaching the bed.

"What is the meaning of this intrusion?" I asked angrily, jealous lest the system which I had apprehended should already have commenced.

"I have awoke your ladyship," she said, humbly; "but I beg you to believe, my lady, that I would not have taken such a liberty, if I had not felt that time might be everything in such a case; and I was afraid that I should not find another opportunity so safe. Sir James is writing in the library, and every one is busy making the house fit for your ladyship; so I thought, my lady, that if I could speak to you at once, you would have more leisure to consider what you wished to do, when you knew all."

There was an accent of sincerity in the woman, but this, nevertheless, did not suffice to convince me, although it served to excite my curiosity. I felt at once astonished and anxious; but I could not make up my mind to ask a single question, for I had no confidence in my mysterious visitor. She saw my mistrust, and was evidently wounded.

"What I am about to tell you, madam," she said steadily, but with constraint; "I heard in London, from the very person to whom Sir James himself told it after seeing your ladyship's mother, about two hours before you returned from court. Perhaps I ought not to repeat it; perhaps even you, my lady, may blame me; but I cannot see you so unhappy, whatever you may have done, without feeling that it is my duty to do what I can to help you."

She paused for a reply, but I continued resolutely silent.

"You are not to remain long here, my lady," she resumed, after having vainly awaited an answer; "only till the furniture of some of the family rooms in Portland Place has had time to reach Glenfillan Castle, where Sir James is to take you, and where he is afterward to leave you in the care of a sister of Lady Madelaine Otterford. I have also, my lady—" and here she burst into tears; "I have also been instructed to watch you, and to give an account of all your doings to Sir James; none of us are to be allowed to leave the grounds; we are all to be prisoners together; and I know beforehand that your ladyship dislikes me, and has no confidence in the duty which I wish to show you."

As I could discover no competent reason why this woman, who had but recently entered my service, and to whom my bearing had been the very reverse of conciliatory throughout, should bury herself alive in order to assist my husband in his extraordinary proceedings, or betray her trust in order to gain my favor, I resolved to be prudent, and not to fall into a snare, which I considered clumsy enough when I remembered that so able an artist in dissimulation as Sir James had been its originator. The instinct of self-preservation for once taught me prudence, and my suspicions continued in full force.

"Your ladyship still doubts me," said Susan, after a second pause which remained equally unbroken by any response on my part; "and may, perhaps, neglect a useful warning because it reaches you through my means. There is only one way of removing your suspicions of my honest meaning, my lady; and with your ladyship's permission, I will own to you my reasons for serving you in this difficulty with more zeal than I might, perhaps, otherwise have done."

"Speak, Susan," I said, "tell me the truth frankly; I shall be at no loss to discover in how far I may trust to the sincerity of your words."

"I have a lover, madam; a worthy young man; but we are too poor to marry; and I have no hope save in the generosity of your ladyship, that I shall ever be able to save enough honestly to bring us together. I accepted the offer of Sir James without reflecting that his gold had been paid for deceit and treachery; but when I came to think of this, I knew that money so dishonestly gained would never prosper, and might be the ruin of us both. That is the real truth, my lady; and your ladyship sees that I do not pretend to feel an attachment to your person which cannot be expected to have grown up in the few weeks that I have been about you."

"I believe you, Susan, I believe you; for you have, indeed, made a great moral effort to be honest," I exclaimed, as I extended my hand to the now weeping woman. Yes, I, the haughty daughter of Lady Madekaine Otterford, actually, for the first time in my life, extended my hand to a menial.

Oh! adversity is a shrewd task-mistress: a mighty moral leveler—how it teaches us to appreciate kindness and to discover friends where we had previously only discerned inferiors! It is, indeed, as the great poet of the world has said, the jewel struck out of the ugliness and venom of the heart. Fine friends fall away—the dust of the butterfly's wings is swept off by the cold touch of this same adversity—and it is then, and only then, that we turn to simple, pure, and honest human hearts for comfort. Happy they, who even thus tardily find what they seek.

"What is to be done, Susan?"

"Alas! madam, I can but obey your wishes. Whatever you order shall be done. Only, I entreat your ladyship not to mention that I have betrayed the secret; or to let any one know that I am in your interests."

I could no longer entertain a doubt of the honesty of my new confidant; and the comparative composure with which I had contemplated a temporary retirement at Rooksley, gave way at once before the frightful anticipation of Glenfillan Castle, and the companionship of Lady Flora. I knew that the spot was bleak, barren, and desolate; and that the house itself was no better than an ornamented prison; while I remembered with no less repugnance that my mother's sister was tyrannical and overbearing by nature, and that she had a score of real and imaginary grievances to revenge upon myself. The situation was an incongruous one for both parties; for I should be at once her host and her prisoner, while she would be at the same time my guest, my jailer, and the head spy of Sir James. The contemplation of my coming fate maddened me: I passed from sobs and tears to recrimination and invective—I cursed the hour and the means which had made me the wife of Dornton, and thus blighted my whole life; and then I fell back upon my pillow in a paroxysm of mute despair.

I was aroused from this dark lethargy by the low voice of Susan, beseeching me to exert myself, and to consider what steps it would be necessary to take in order to avert the evil which was impending over me. Once more awakened to a full sense of my situation, I embraced the anxious girl, besought her to be true to me, and made the most magnificent promises in the event of her good faith. She listened in respectful silence, and then again besought me to remember how rapidly the time was passing, and how soon I might be compelled to resume my hateful journey.

Still I was powerless. I could not come to any rational decision.

"Consider too, my lady," she pursued, pointing out in the strength of her plain good sense the duty which I owed to my own reputation, "how necessary it is that your ladyship should not lose a post in writing to some of your friends, to explain your sudden departure from town. So many wicked reports may go abroad, and no one can contradict them without your authority."

"But to whom can I write?" I asked gloomily: "who now cares to interfere in my fate?"

"Will not your ladyship at least undeceive my Lord Otterford? He has always appeared so partial to my lady."

"That is over for ever," I answered, with a pang so bitter that he was almost revenged; "I have nothing to hope from that quarter."

"Some of your ladyship's relations——"

"I have none. I am now alone in the world."

"But my lady has so many friends."

I laughed in the irony of my heart.

"Poor Susan!" I said; "you little understand the friendship of the world—the give and take system, which always insists upon receiving its equivalent—or you would not talk to me of my friends. No, my good girl, those who prosper in life: who raise themselves by wealthy marriages, or fortunate chances, have alone the right to boast of their friends; and they are the very first, even while doing so, to forget all the fond and holy memories of the past; and to spurn from their homes and hearts the loved ones of less prosperous times who have been less lucky than themselves, although they may previously have vowed to them an undying affection. Last week I was hemmed in with devoted friends; to-day you stand alone to pay me back duty for avoidance."

"Yet surely, my lady, among so many—"

"You are right, Susan," I exclaimed suddenly; "I am not utterly desolate. Bring me my desk and a taper."

I was promptly obeyed, and, seizing a pen, I wrote a long and hurried letter to Devereux. Imprudent as the step actually was, I was nevertheless less blamable in this instance than in many others, for I literally knew not in what direction to turn for help. I detailed to him my forcible removal from town, the threats held out by Dornton, and the intelligence which I had obtained of his subsequent designs; and I implored him to take steps to rescue me from both the public and private injustice with which I was threatened.

When I had sealed and directed my letter, I placed it in the hand of Susan, who had already undertaken to secure its safe transmission to the post; but when her eye fell upon the superscription, I saw her redden and appear irresolute.

"Has your courage failed you so soon?" I demanded abruptly.

"Your ladyship mistakes me. It is only that I am fearful lest, in forwarding this letter, I may do mischief instead of good. Oh, my lady, I would humbly beg of you to write to any one rather than to Colonel Devereux."

"You forget yourself," I said haughtily; "I am the best judge of the eligibility of my correspondents."

"But should Sir James ever discover——"

"I do not acknowledge the authority of Sir James Dornton. The advantage which he has now obtained over me has been the mere triumph of brute force."

"But I was so particularly warned, my lady, against——"

"I do not doubt it. Your employer was unable to appreciate the noble qualities of Colonel Devereux, and therefore feared him; but I, who know him better, do him more justice."

"I will yet be bold enough to venture one word, my lady," persisted the anxious woman; "let me entreat your ladyship not to encourage the colonel to come to Rooksley; for, I am sure, that in my master's present humor, there would be bloodshed."

A cold thrill passed through my veins, and made the blood quiver in its passage to my heart; but I forced a smile, as I declared that I had expressed no such wish to Colonel Devereux; when Susan, reassured, concealed the letter in her bosom, again declaring that I need apprehend no inconvenience in its transmission.

Somewhat comforted by the certainty that Devereux, at least, would soon be informed of my misfortunes; and full of conjectures as to the course which he would pursue, I refused to leave my room that evening. Sir James submitted heroically to my resolution, nor did he strive to alter it; and thus I was left free to profit by my own reflections.

It was evident that if I were inclined to be chary of my society, he, on his side, desired it quite as little; for each morning, long before I awoke, he was away with his gun and his dogs, and only returned at a late hour to dinner.

Few words were exchanged between us during the repast, and we parted when I rose from table. Not a question had I asked; not a reproach had I uttered; and at times I fancied that I discovered a restlessness in the manner of Dornton, as though, touched by my submission, he upbraided himself for the treachery which he was still meditating against me; but I never ascertained the correctness of my conjectures, for his self-possession soon returned, and with it all his accustomed coldness.

In as short a period as it was possible for me to receive an acknowledgment of my letter to Devereux, and before my anxiety had yet attained to its height, Susan one day put into my hands a small piece of folded paper, evidently torn from some pocket tablets, and upon which were written three words "I am here," without date or signature, but the characters were too familiar to me to need interpretation. It was the reply of Devereux.

"From whom got you this?" I asked eagerly.

"From the colonel himself, my lady."

"Where is he?"

"At the Wood Lodge, my lady."

"When did he arrive?"

"Last night, my lady."

My bonnet and shawl were on in a moment. It was the first time that I had left the house since my arrival at Rooksley; and memories of the past came thronging before me as I advanced along the well-remembered path, under a clear spring sun, and with a sharp air playing upon my face. What had I not seen and suffered since I last met Devereux beside the same spot. Had I been true to myself and to him that day, what trials might have been spared to us both!

When I reached the lodge, I hesitated for a moment to raise the latch, for I had encountered no one on my way; and while I yet paused the door softly opened, and Devereux stood before me.

"Fear nothing, Lady Dornton," he said as he took my hand, and led me across the threshold, carefully closing the door behind us. "The lodge is still uninhabited during the day, and the gamekeeper, who occupies it at night, has ceded his right to me for a season. And now tell me what your melancholy position exacts of the most devoted of your friends."

"Alas, Devereux," I sighed, as I sank upon a low bench beside the rude oaken table, "I know not. Will you not think for me, and counsel me?"

"I am so interested a party—" he murmured, as he folded my hand between his own.

"I have been outraged and insulted," I said with bitterness; "the very sight of Sir James is odious to me; had he conveyed me here, and then returned to town without any further intrusion on my privacy, I should perhaps have remained passive, at all events for a time; but such is not his pleasure; he is still an inmate of Rooksley, and will remain here, until he departs for Glenfillan, once more in the character of my jailer. Then, indeed, I find that he is to leave me to the enjoyment of my prison, and the guardianship of my mother's sister. My only hope now is, that my despair may soon lay me beside Adela."

"This journey must not take place," said Devereux, as he carried my fingers to his lips. "We can hope nothing from Lady Madelaine; nothing from my uncle. They are both exasperated against you; and equally violent against each other. Your mother has left town, and retired to her Putney villa, whence she emerges, however, almost nightly, to join the gay societies of the season; while Otterford remains perdu in the square, refusing to receive even his most intimate friends. Something terrible has occurred between them."

"I can understand the cause of their coldness," I said sadly; "and now, when it is too late, I regret that it has been in a great degree, if not entirely, my own work. Devereux, when we first loved each other, your uncle bitterly offended me, and I then, girl as I was, vowed that I would one day be revenged. Subsequently however, I forgave, even if I did not quite for get the injury; nor should I have again sought its requital, had not the insolent assumption of my mother instigated me to destroy her happiness, as she had previously destroyed mine. In my passion I did not pause to remember that I made a second victim, and one who deserved more consideration at my hands. I am, therefore, the culprit."

"It has chanced at an unlucky moment," answered Devereux, in an accent considerably less desponding than his words; "for nothing can now be expected from either party save an increase of hostility. Your situation is indeed desperate, Eveleen; and we must be satisfied not to look beyond ourselves for your deliverance. How much longer do you calculate on remaining at Rooksley?"

"I am as ignorant upon the subject as yourself I believe," I added, with a scornful smile, "that my movements are now dependent upon those of some furniture, which even Sir James Dornton has considered it necessary to dispatch to Scotland, in order to make my prison habitable."

"But you will not, of course, submit to this abuse of authority?"

"What can I do? He is my husband; and I am too weak to resist."

"And yet, Eveleen, you affect to love me, and to hate this man; while his word is still your law, and my affection is met only by coldness and reproof. Is this consistent? Is this reasonable? Above all, is this generous? Nay, listen to me," he added, as I strove faintly to disengage my hand; "the moment is at length come in which it behoves me to be frank. Your name is blighted and your fair fame sullied; you are abandoned by your mother; insulted by your husband; and denied by your acquaintance. You alone know your own heart, unless indeed you will admit me into a participation of that knowledge. You alone know that you are guiltless of those errors of which you are accused, and of which many of your accusers are themselves far from free—and what avails that knowledge, when you cannot obtain credence of the fact? The woman who is merely suspected is always lost; and it is only she who has moral courage to brave the world, and to do justice to herself, who escapes scathless."

"Spare me—spare me," I faltered amid my sobs.

"Eveleen, dear Eveleen, hear me out," whispered my companion, as he seated himself beside me, and encircled my sinking figure with his arm; "I must show you precisely the nature of your position, in order that you may summon resolution to resist your fate. You have now seen what you have to expect from that world of which you were so lately the brightest ornament, and the most worshiped idol. Now turn your eyes upon your home. What aspect, what prospect does it present! An unloving and unrelenting husband consigns you to a living grave, and to the guardianship of a woman to whom you are repugnant; there to moulder away your youth, your beauty, and your hopes, while he riots in your wealth—and all this, not, believe me, to resent a momentary fit of levity, or an instant of imprudent caprice, but because you were unguarded enough to betray to him that you knew too much of himself—of his past career—of his mercenary motives—and of his late delinquency. Is this not so, sweet Eveleen?"

The solution thus offered of my present sorrows was too soothing to be rejected. My tears flowed less bitterly; I was less dissatisfied with myself. It was clear that Sir James acted from a principle of self-preservation totally distinct from my personal conduct. I was already justified in my own eyes.

"It is certain that you cannot remain here, alone and unprotected," pursued Devereux, evidently encouraged by the effect of his last argument; "for even should Dornton affect to yield his consent to such a measure, you would be at every moment subject to the consequences of his breach of faith; while it is still more impossible that you should be carried to Scotland, almost beyond the reach of efficient help."

"Alas! alas! what then is left to me?" I exclaimed, wringing my hands in agony and indecision.

"The whole world," murmured Devereux, in my ear; "the whole world, fairest and most beloved of women! The sunny skies, and smiling groves of Italy—the glorious mountain-paths of Switzerland—the classic shores of Greece—and everywhere, one loyal and loving heart, on which to pillow all your past trials and present happiness."

I was stunned. I might have expected this, I fear that I had expected it; but vaguely, and as a far-off vision seen dimly in perspective. I was too feeble to contend with the emotion of such a moment; and suffering my head to fall upon the shoulder of Devereux, I closed my eyes and fainted.

CHAPTER LIV.

When I recovered consciousness I found myself still in the arms of Devereux, and I felt his warm lips upon my brow. I dare not look back to the intoxication of that moment. All my sufferings and all my fears were forgotten as I lay passively upon his bosom, and listened to his low-breathed words of tenderness; but ere long I felt the necessity of arousing myself from this dangerous lethargy, and sweeping my disheveled hair from my forehead, I endeavored to withdraw myself from his clasp.

"Not yet, Eveleen," he murmured tenderly; "not yet. You are still indisposed and weak, my own love; may I not say my own, as I once did some few short years ago, when you promised to love me only? And you will redeem that pledge even yet—you will not be foresworn—you have so far sinned against me only by compulsion, and your heart has been no party to the treachery of your acts. We shall be happy, Eveleen; most happy. We will blot England from the map of our world of love; and we shall still have space enough in which to breathe out our vows of never-changing tenderness and fidelity. I will be to you a friend, a brother, a lover, everything—"

"Save a husband—" I interposed, with an involuntary shudder.

Devereux started, but he almost instantly recovered his composure. "And even that will come, fair trembler," he said, as for the first time he dared to press his lips to mine and to le so unchidden; for his words had awakened all the warmth and confidence of my nature. "Do you imagine that Dornton will suffer so plausible an opportunity to escape of enriching himself at your expense, and of freeing you from the odious ties which now subject you to his control!"

"Oh, speak not of it," I exclaimed piteously: "think only of the humiliation — of the disgrace."

"Eveleen, remember the commencement of our conversation; and do not distress yourself unnecessarily."

"True," I muttered through my clenched teeth; "I am already humbled—already disgraced."

"If you see fit to accept such a destiny," said Devereux soothingly; "but if you determine otherwise, your fate is in your own hands. Few will now be induced to believe you innocent, even should you consent to pay the penalty of error; and believe me, sweet one, it is at worst an error to which nine-tenths of the world are in their hearts, for reasons of their own, disposed to be more lenient than they deem it expedient to acknowledge. You have consequently only your own heart to consult; for the malice of others has spared you the sole really tangible objections which you might have opposed to my entreaties. And will you entirely overlook the happiness which you would thus confer upon one who has loved you through treachery and neglect, through good report and evil report, as I have done; I of whom you are alike the first love and the last!"

There was a bitter warring at my heart, but I dared not yield. I have already frankly stated more than once, that I had no fixed principle of religion, and consequently no solid foundation of conduct; but, nevertheless, I shrank from the world's sneer; and despite all the well-turned sophistries of Devereux, I could not bring myself to believe that I was indeed so utterly fallen in its opinion, as though I had in truth merited its scorn.

Be the result of my imprudence what it might, I felt that it was incumbent upon me at once to terminate the present interview; and I was surprised and I fear somewhat piqued, at the ready acquiescence of Devereux.

"It behoves us to be prudent, dearest," he said, as he also rose; "and the rather as I shall constantly be near you, to guard you from the harshness of Sir James. From sunrise to sunset you will find me here, until it is your pleasure that I should depart—the happiest of men, or the most miserable. Glance into the next apartment, and you will see that my establishment is complete."

I followed him to a small door which opened in the opposite wall, and, to my astonishment, discovered in the room to which he alluded, a stout horse ready saddled and bridled, and whose rein was made fast to a ring beside a second door which opened into the high road.

"You see I have been wary," he remarked with a smile; "and have secured a means of instant escape should I run any risk of detetion by Dornton or his spies. I need not expatiate, I trust, upon the still more happy use to which this fortunate outlet may be put. I leave it to your own old memories and present attachments. And now, farewell, dear Eveleen. I shall only weary in my solitude for your return, for the interval will be shortened by the visions of the last hour, and the hopes of still brighter and more blessed ones to come."

And so we parted, after Devereux had looked cautiously from the narrow casement to ascertain that we were unobserved, but as I slowly traversed the shrubbery on my return, I involuntarily asked myself whether I had not already more than half-justified that world by which I had been so recklessly condemned; and I dared not trust my own heart with the reply.

On arriving at home I ascertained from Susan that Sir James had not yet returned from shooting, and that none of the servants had left the house during my absence, save the lad who carried the letters to the post town. So far, therefore, all had gone well, at least as regarded the publicity of my imprudent proceeding: but my timid attendant was still pale with terror, and eagerly besought me not to repeat so dangerous an exploit. I was, however, in no mood to listen to her remonstrances; the crisis of my fate was at hand, and I felt the necessity of utter solitude. I dismissed her, therefore, with an apparent composure, which evidently had only the effect of increasing her uneasiness: and she left the room, after a promise to apprise me instantly of any intelligence which she might obtain of the movements of Sir James.

It would be idle to attempt an analysis of my feelings when I once more found myself alone. My head and heart were alike in a whirl. I could come to no resolution either for good or evil. At one moment I remembered my blighted reputation, so lightly whispered away in the very circles where I had lately reigned supreme; and I consequently considered myself exonerated from all social obligations, and free to secure my own happiness as I saw fit; in the next I felt almost proud of the martyrdom to which I had been subjected, and resolved not to forego my innate sense of the injustice of which I had been made the victim. But my recent interview with Devereux rose up before me and tore away the laurels which I had placed so proudly on my brow. I was no longer innocent in heart, and I could not conceal the fact from myself, disguise it as I might. Nor did that evil end here; the tones of tenderness which had fallen upon my spirit like a dew after a long day of drought—the flattering sophistries which had invested vice with a romance at once novel and attractive—the self-appreciation—I dared not call it self-respect — which the devotion of Devereux had reawakened within me—had all done their dangerous work; and left me powerless to contend against their influence.

I saw nothing but wretchedness on every side. That of duty, while it promised a comparatively approving conscience, demanded as the price of that boon a period of living death, of mortification, and abandonment; while that of error threatened me with a life-long remorse, but veiled its sufferings with the roses of passion, and the delusion of egotistical gratification. The alternative was a desperate one; and I felt more inclined to mourn over my buried youth and blighted prospects, than over the self-blame which I might incur by an unworthy act. The world had ever been my idol; and it seemed to me more desirable to accept its suffrages upon its own terms, now that I could no longer command them upon mine, than to forego them altogether. The first phase of my difficulty left me utterly without support; in the second I should be upheld and guarded by the proved affection of the man I loved: and I accordingly found a thousand sophistries in its favor, which influenced even if they did not convince me.

Had I consulted my own real interest, I should at that moment have hurried to the presence of Lady O'Halloran; have confided to her all the details of my position, have confessed to her, even upon my knees, my moral guilt, and have besought her to protect me against myself; but at the instant when my thoughts turned to her firm and healthful friendship, at that same moment my memory also placed before me the pure and holy image of her son's wife; and, although alone and unseen, I bowed my head upon my bosom with a burning blush! No, no—I could not bend my haughty spirit to such a degradation—I could not myself offer to her the weapon which was to drain my life-blood. Better the long disgrace, far away from all who had watched over my youth and foretold for me a brighter and a more fitting fate, than such an hour of wringing penance as that interview must bring with it.

I was too much enervated by vanity and frivolity, to be capable of such a triumph over my own pride; and thus I voluntarily thrust from me the last fragment of the floating raft which might have saved my honor from shipwreck. In my agony of heart, as I did this, I flung myself wildly upon my knees, and tried to pray. Vain and idle mockery! What right had I to hope for help and strength when I, at the same moment, voluntarily rejected the one chance still offered to my own exertions? And what knew I of praying as hearts must pray which, amid the fervor of their silence, would be heard? What knew I of the spontaneous and relying faith of the bruised spirit, which turns to heaven, as the night-mariner to the beacon light which is his only hope of safety? Nothing—less than nothing—and thus, in this bitter hour, when my vices wrestled with all of pure and precious that yet remained in my fallen nature, I could not frame one petition in which I was not conscious of my own hypocrisy.

I started up self-condemned; the words which had sprung to my lips appeared to echo in my ears like sounds of mockery; my supplications were not pure enough to ascend to Heaven, but were beaten back in rebuke upon me; and I felt that they were rejected. The fire upon the altar of my heart was an unholy fire, and could not ascend; the sacrifice of my burnt-offering had no sweet savor, and the tears which fell upon it turned its juices to bitterness.

I passed a fearful night; it appeared interminable; and yet I dreaded the dawn, for I knew that with the sunrise Devereux would once more be near me, and my moral struggle be renewed. As I at length saw the cold, blank light, stealing along the sky, a new vision, one which had never before risen clearly on my mind, presented itself with terrible distinctness: it was that of a cessation of the love for which I might have bartered my best hopes on earth.

It was a frightful fancy! and coming as it did at that peculiarly depressing moment when the earth has not yet succeeded in freeing her bosom from the winding-sheet of night, I was keenly susceptible of its influence. All around me looked dreary, desolate, and cheerless, as my own fate must be at such a crisis—and I remembered that although the first sun-burst would renovate and revivify the objects upon which I looked, there could be no after spirit-dawn for me. In the impulse of the moment I drew my night-lamp from the vase which veiled its light; and seizing a pen, I poured forth the anguish of my heart to Devereux.

"We must meet no more. You should not wish it—and I dare not. We are both wretched: let us accept our fate. We need not therefore be guilty also. I have tried to think, but my brain burns and my eyeballs throb, and I have no power over my intellect—I have tried to pray, but I am ignorant how those pray who are heard. I could bear the world's rebuke for your sake—I have borne it—I could sin to secure your love—I have even meditated to do so. But how? Would my sin indeed secure your lasting and unchanging love? A few brief months of passion you would, no doubt, offer me in requital—probably you would also suppose that nothing could ever weaken or alienate it. Yes you would believe this, for your nature is loyal and honorable, and you are incapable of injuring me for the poor triumph of exhibiting my error to the world. But, Devereux, would this same loyalty and honor enable you to retain your passion for me after I had sinned? Oh! no no; the day would come, tardily perhaps,—but come at last it would, when you would estimate the extent of my fall, and abandon me to its fearful consequences. You must one day see, if not more beautiful, at least more worthy objects than myself, who may pay back your affections with an unblushing brow—and when that day came, what must be my fate?

"I know all that you would urge in reply to this; and therefore—Devereux, for the first time in my life, perhaps, I declare my purpose without one reservation of vanity—one stain of false faith—therefore, I must not meet you again, until I have schooled myself into a better and a more fitting frame of mind. I will submit myself as meekly as my imperious nature will allow, to the destiny which awaits me. May the bitter punishment of my past follies make me a wiser and a better woman.

"I would pray for you if I could—I will forget you if I can—go, and be happy——"

Thus far had I written without one pause; without one instant of hesitation; but here I laid down my pen, and burying my face upon my folded arms, I again abandoned myself to a train of struggling and miserable thoughts. Gradually, as I remained in this position, my ideas became more vague, my reflections more disjointed; weariness alike of body and of spirit did its tardy work, and I slept.

My dreams were such as might have visited the pillow of an opium-eater: I saw skulls with bridal wreaths upon their heads; and skelehands stretching toward me a bony finger encircled by a marriage-ring. I wandered in a vast forest of leafless trees, where the distorted branches seemed to writhe in mockery as I passed along. I stood near a bier; my sister lay there in her shroud, and when I stopped beside her, she stretched out her bony arm, and as it moved along, it traced upon the wall of the charnel-house the name of Dornton, in characters of blood. I saw the grave of Emily; her long fair hair had burst through the humid soil, and was scattered over the turf, and playing in the night-wind; and suddenly Mrs. Delamaine was there also, trampling in the pride of her haughty beauty upon those long fair tresses, while her eyes darted flashes which withered the grass and leaves upon which they fell. More, much more, and all horrible, filled up the measure of that fearful sleep; but at last, all passed away, and I fell into a state of deep and unbroken forgetfulness. I was aroused by a light touch upon my shoulder, and raising my heavy eyes, I saw Susan standing beside me, and wiping away her tears.

"Why did you awaken me?" I asked sadly; "I was happy; I was unconscious that I lived."

"My poor dear lady! And you have never been to bed. Now, too, when you require all your strength."

"I have still strength enough to suffer, my good girl."

"But I bring your ladyship unwelcome tidings."

"When do we leave Rooksley?" I asked hoarsely.

"The day after to-morrow, my lady: Anderson has received his orders to go this morning to the post-town to bespeak the horses; and I have been warned to pack your ladyship's wardrobe."

I passed my fingers through my tangled hair, and looked helplessly about me. Thick sobs rose in my throat, and threatened me with suffocation; at length, with some difficulty, I swallowed a draught of water at the entreaty of my alarmed attendant, and gradually became more calm. Suddenly my eye fell upon the letter which still lay before me, and once more catching up the pen I wrote.

"The bolt has fallen. The day after to-morrow I depart for my exile; and now, Devereux, now that our hours are numbered, I feel that I must see you once more. Not to-day—for to-day I should betray both you and myself—but to-morrow—to-morrow—Devereux, and for the last time."

Having added these hurried lines, I sealed the letter, and entrusted it to Susan, with express injunctions to convey it secretly to the Wood Lodge before sunset; I had for a moment the intention of writing to my mother, to expostulate with her on the violence to which I was subjected, and her own utter abandonment, but I soon rejected the idea. I had brought grief and dissension to her hearth, and I knew her too well to anticipate that she would ever forgive so deep an injury. Thus then, save as regarded Devereux, I was already totally separated from the world; I was about to follow my sister to the retreat which she had only exchanged for a grave. How knew I but such might be my own case? At that moment I hoped that we might ere long lie side by side; and mingle our dust in death, as in life we had never blent our hearts.

CHAPTER LV.

At an early hour in the morning, trembling with agitation, I threw on a shawl and bonnet, and turned my steps toward the Wood Lodge. I had been careful to ascertain that Sir James had left the house some time previously, as he was in the constant habit of doing, with his gun and his dogs; and as I proceeded along my solitary path, I read myself a serious lesson of prudence and self-government, which I believed that I should not fail to require. A bright spring sun shimmered on the leaves of the trees, and formed checkered mosaics of light and shadow upon the earth. The sky-lark was making the blue heavens ring with its matin song, as it quivered above my head; all about me was calm and beautiful; all within me was dark and troubled. I felt as though I were rushing upon my fate, even while I murmured that I would be true to myself, and conquer the weakness to which it would be sin to yield. As I left the house further behind me, I quickened my pace; and, at length, with a beating heart and a pale cheek, I stood before the little building, but no ready hand raised the latch to give me entrance; no anxious eye had watched for my approach, that my greeting might be hastened. All was still.

After a painful pause, unbroken by any sign or sound of human neighborhood, I summoned courage to throw back the door, but the cottage-rooms were empty.

"He has been detained," I murmured to myself, as I took my place upon the narrow bench, and prepared to await him: "he has been detained, but he will be here ere long." And I felt a strange pleasure as I sat in the narrow and unfurnished chamber where Devereux had, for my sake, passed so many solitary hours; and sighed that the whitewashed walls could not betray to me the secret of his thoughts during his weary watch. Memories of what had already passed in that hovel rose up before me; memories which, at such a moment, I should have stifled, and which only served to increase my passion, and to deepen my regrets; gradually I felt my better resolutions giving way, and my anxiety for the arrival of Devereux becoming greater and more difficult to suppress. If he came not on this occasion, I should see him no more; and I had so much to say, so much to ask. But I heard the clock of the little village school-house, which my mother had built in the first year of her marriage with my poor father, strike nine; and still I sat there alone. The sound had conjured up, however, more healthy recollections; and I recalled the image of that father too little loved, and too early lost, until I asked myself, what—should his shade be hovering near me at that moment, disturbed in its repose by the imprudence of his child—what must be its agony and its despair! I could not bear the harrowing reflection, and starting from my seat, I rushed from the lodge and hurriedly returned home, pursued by the piteous howling of a dog, which smote at my heart with its dismal and ill-timed discord.

An was then over; I should see him no more, probably for long years, possibly for life. My fate was sealed; and he—even he—had also deserted me. I paced my chamber in despair; I wrung my hands in agony; I vowed myself to an early death, and loathed the very light that glared upon my wretchedness. Another hour pealed from the low belfry: I counted every stroke tenaciously, as though my destiny hung upon its clear and ringing voice; and then I listened anxiously for other sounds, for I was oppressed by the deep stillness which succeeded. It was soon broken once more. From afar-off, yet, as it seemed, slowly approaching nearer to the house, I heard again the long howling wails of the dog which had disturbed me as I left the cottage. The melancholy cadence of those howls made me shudder. I was then to be surrounded to the last with gloom and misery! A cold damp started to my brow, and I sank into a seat, for my limbs trembled. Suddenly the wail ceased, and I heard a strange movement in the house; cries of alarm and horror, confused voices, and steps hastily approaching my chamber. I grasped the arms of the chair in which I sat, and half raised myself, as if to meet with less delay the new trial which was awaiting me, be it what it might.

A heavy hand beat rudely upon my door. I answered hoarsely to the summons; and immediately the valet of my husband stood before me, with a blanched brow, and trembling lips. For an instant he was speechless, but at length he gasped out: "All is over, my lady; there is no longer a hope—they have brought him home, but he is dead. My poor, poor, murdered master!"

"Dead!" I repeated, like one who dreams. "Who is dead! Who has been murdered!"

"My master—my poor master!" again exclaimed the man.

I heard no more. A heavy blow appeared to have descended on my head, and I fell senseless to the earth.

Susan was standing beside my bed when I again opened my eyes; for a time I could not sufficiently recover my scattered senses to comprehend what had occurred; but gradually a confused memory grew upon me, although still so vaguely, that I clung to the hope that I had been visited by a sleeping vision which had bewildered my imagination.

"I have had a frightful dream," I whispered shudderingly.

"My lady has not slept," sobbed out the weeping woman.

"Not slept!" I exclaimed, lifting my heavy head from the pillow; "can it indeed be really so? Sir James——"

"Is no more, madam."

"Dead!" I almost shrieked; "and where is Colonel Devereux!"

"I can understand my lady's suspicion, but—"

"The word murder seems to ring in my ears, as though some demon had uttered it. Tell me how my husband met his death; and tell me the truth," I added; "frightful as it may be, I must know the truth: this is no moment for false refinements, or mysteries which have in them more of anguish than of mercy—tell me who murdered him."

"Indeed, my lady—"

"Peace, girl!" I said wildly: "I know it a He was not there when I went to seek him. waited there alone—alone, till the spirit of my father drove me forth; and I was pursued even to my chamber by the voice of the wailing brute who was howling out his requiem over the dead. Susan," and I clutched her arm with my convulsed fingers; "I am innocent—you know that I am innocent!"

"My poor dear lady, you will break my heart."

"You warned me that there would be blood shed, Susan; but I did not heed you. Mad with terror and despair, I thought only of myself,—and yet I had been warned—I had been warned—"

"I do beseech you to listen to me, my lady; indeed, and indeed—"

"Where did they meet? Did the murderer escape? Did your master curse me before he died!"

"Unless your ladyship will calm yourself, and let me speak," said Susan firmly; "it is in vain for me to hope to comfort you. There is a great deal to be done, and it must be done by you, my lady—"

"Alas! alas! what will become of us?" I exclaimed, writhing like one in the agonies of death.

"Rely upon it that your ladyship does Colonel Devereux injustice," persisted Susan; "from all that I can learn, the death of Sir James was caused by an accident for which no one is responsible."

"An accident? can it really be? Who told you that it was an accident? Who saw it? How did it occur?"

"I do not yet know the exact particulars, my lady. Hearing a great noise in the park, and the howling of a dog that I knew at once by his voice must be one of my master's pointers, I ran to a short distance from the house, fearing I did not well know what, when I saw, my lady ——I saw the bleeding body of Sir James, which two peasants were carrying in their arms. I had my own fears, I will not deny it; and in my terror I began to question these men; but, full of anxiety about Sir James, they answered me shortly: 'He did it himself—he did it himself —he was killed by his own gun.' I came back with them to the house, and walked close beside my master's head, in the hope that I might see some sign of life, but I watched in vain; the blood had stopped—and—and—in short, my lady, I was assisting to remove Sir James to his own room, when his valet came running to tell me that your ladyship had fainted; and I know no more."

I listened with panting eagerness; but the hope which had for an instant pierced through my agony, once more abandoned me as Susan proceeded with her narrative. I know too well the position in which I stood both to my husband and Colonel Devereux, and the feelings which they mutually entertained toward each other, to venture to lean upon so slight a reed as the one now tendered to me; and this knowledge, combined with the imperfect information of my attendant, rather served to deepen than to decrease the awful suspicion which was gnawing at my heart. Moreover, Devereux had not appeared at the lodge, although I had apprised him that I would be there to see him for the last time. Could I now doubt what it was that led him to neglect that meeting? At what a moment, too, had the catastrophe occurred? Just as I was about to be subjected to the last indignity with which the authority of a husband enabled Sir James to visit me. Was not all then fearfully and fatally clear?

In this emergency I felt all the ardor of my love for Devereux; for I forgot the dead man who lay stark in his stiffening blood within a few chambers of my own; I forgot the horror, and perhaps it might be also, the peril, of my own situation, to shudder at the danger which impended over him. He, the guilty one! against whom a cry had gone up to heaven. Would he escape out of the country? And, if so, whither would he turn his wandering steps? Friendless, homeless, and an exile, with the stain of blood upon his heart, and the brand of Cain upon his brow—he, who had been a spoiled child of the same world, which had also abandoned me. And he had become its outcast for my sake—he had paid this bitter price for my love—and that love must now be denied to him for ever. The serpents of the Laocoon were not more crushing or more deadly, than the insidious and snake-like sophistries which rose tumultuously within me, and writhed and grappled at my heart; but I shuddered as I spurned them back, and resolutely bent my thoughts upon my own probable destiny.

Susan had left me at my desire to obtain more full and feasible information of the tragedy which had been enacted almost under my very eyes; and I was still lost in a sea of wild conjecture, when she returned, with an expression of countenance that almost reassured me.

"I have not misled your ladyship," she said, so soon as she had closed the door behind her; "every one tells the same story. The peasants who brought my master home were working in a field about half a mile from here, and saw him leave the open park, and beat the small wood near the road-side; after which he jumped out upon the pathway, and walked slowly along, with his gun upon his shoulder, and his head bent down, as if he was full of thought. A groom had been sent some days ago to London by Sir James, and just as he nearly reached the lodge (which your ladyship knows stands at a turn of the little wood), he rode up, and gave Sir James a letter. The underwood and weeds are thick there; and my master, having rested the but-end of his gun on the ground, leant upon the barrel while he read his letter; and he was still doing this when another horseman approached him, riding very rapidly. At the sound of his horse's feet, Sir James looked up, and as though he knew him, made him a sign to stop; folded his letter and hastily lifted his gun, without remarking that it was entangled among the long weeds and brambles; the jerk which he gave to draw it out, brought the trigger in contact with some weed or twig; it went off; and you know the rest, my lady—my poor master was killed on the spot."

"Is this true, Susan?"

"They all swear to it, groom, and peasants, and all, my lady."

"And the horseman?"

"Fortunately, your ladyship, it was Jacob, the new stableman, that Sir James sent to London, and he had never seen the colonel. All that he could say, therefore, was that the strange gentleman was muffled up about the chin, wore a large cloak, and rode a gray horse."

"Are you sure that he said a gray horse?"

"Positive, my lady; and besides, the farming men remembered seeing both the horse and the man pass by toward Rooksley for the last two mornings; only they said that to-day he was later than usual."

"And what did he when he saw Sir James fall?"

"He jumped off his horse, my lady, and lifted up my poor master, and felt his heart; and then he shook his head, and desired the men to carry Sir James carefully up to the house, telling them who he was; and then, when he saw them about to obey him, he mounted again, and galloped off toward London."

This intelligence calmed me at once. He was not then a murderer—he was guiltless of my husband's blood—the very consciousness of this fact removed its heaviest weight from my heart. But why had he not ridden on to Rooksley, now that there was no impediment to his appearance, and prepared me for the horrible tragedy of the morning?

I subsequently learnt the cause. The letter which Susan had delivered, and which informed him of my immediate departure for Scotland, coupled with the assurance of my intention to see him on the morrow for the last time, had convinced him that he had not a moment to lose if he would secure a different result. He had, therefore, ridden to the post-town to provide a carriage, which was to take its station a hundred paces from the Wood Lodge at midnight; never doubting that the woman who could risk such an interview at such a moment, would offer but a faint resistance to his passionate entreaties. Yes, that very night, on which the pale and disfigured corpse of my husband lay buried in its everlasting sleep, he had calculated that I should become at once a fugitive and an outcast from my home and from my country! Even now, I shudder as I remember the precipice upon whose brink I stood; and the awfulness of the means which saved me.

Other arrangements, connected with our anticipated flight, had detained him until so late an hour that he was compelled to remain at the post-town all night; and he was on the way to our appointed interview, when he came upon Sir James; whom, from the fact that his face was concealed by the letter upon which he was intent, he had not recognized until he passed close beside him.

Struck by the fatal inferences which might be drawn, should it be discovered that he was an eye-witness to the horrible death of the man he hated, he had no sooner ascertained that all was indeed over, than he galloped back to ——, declared that he found it necessary to hasten his journey, and throwing himself into the carriage which he had already secured, he hurried to town with all the speed which four stout horses could insure.

Earnest to prevent the possibility of my being implicated in the melancholy affair, as he was conscious that I must be if he remained absent from London, he lost not a moment on his arrival in throwing off his traveling dress, and calling upon my mother; after which he made a circuit of the clubs, and then returned to his father's house; where, pleading fatigue, he shut himself into his own apartments, in order that he might be alone, when the fatal news, which he was aware must follow him in a few hours, should be promulgated.

This proceeding was too well-judged and too generous to be either guessed at or appreciated by me at such a moment; and my indignation and wretchedness at his neglect and apparent indifference to my misery, helped me to overcome the horror of my position, where sympathy and kindness, however active and insidious, would probably have failed.

Amid all this conflict of distempered feeling, I suddenly remembered the necessity of dispatching a messenger in all haste to Lady Madelaine, to inform her of the tragic event which had just occurred; and I had actually seated myself at my writing-table before I became conscious of the extreme difficulty of the task. In what spirit could I address her? If I assumed a tone of grief, she would be well aware of the hypocrisy to which I had condescended; and if I wrote coldly, she would at once accuse me of even more unholy vices. Moreover, I knew not what had become of Devereux. Should he be still in the neighborhood, and that the fact became known, every sentence that I wrote might, perhaps, be tortured into an accusation which I did not possess the means of rebutting. What was to be done?

Once more Susan came zealously to my aid. "Indeed, my lady," she said, beseechingly; "you are not yet able to undertake such a melancholy letter. Only give me your orders, and I will do my best to inform my Lady Madelaine of the sad event."

I gladly acquiesced in this proposal; and desiring her to say what she considered necessary, and to excuse me on the plea of my agitated condition, I abandoned the project of being myself the herald of my widowhood, to my prudent and sympathizing attendant. Nothing could have been better judged than the plain, true, and simple manner in which she told her tale; one only portion of her letter displeased me, but to that, I could not, without extreme imprudence, make an exception. It concluded with an entreaty on my part that my mother would come to me, and support me in my trial by her presence and advice.

Conscious as I was that I required both counsel and assistance, I loathed the idea of owing either to my mother; that mother who had never been to me other than an object of jealousy and fear; and I shuddered as I thought of a meeting which was, however, inevitable, for I knew that, sooner or later, I must claim her protection. My youth, and the death of my husband; a death sufficiently equivocal in appearance to excite the comments of those who had watched the recklessness of my conduct during the last few months of my residence in town, would alike oblige me to submit in a certain degree to her authority. I could therefore only sigh over the necessity, and submit.

This letter was at once confided to the groom who had witnessed the catastrophe of the morning, with strict injunctions to travel with all speed to town: and to answer the questions which might be put to him without either reserve or exaggeration; and I made this selection, because I believed that the account given by a person who was on the spot, would suffer less from the cross-questionings of suspicion or ill-will, than that of one who merely repeated what he had heard from others.

This arrangement was scarcely completed when to my surprise I heard the wheels of a carriage pass over the gravel under my window at a rapid pace; and in five minutes afterward I was clasped in the arms of Lady O'Halloran.

No, never, never, shall I forget the almost painful happiness of that moment. I had still a friend! There was no room for doubt, for I felt the warm tears falling upon my neck.

"Eveleen," she at length said in an accent of real feeling; "how, in such an awful trial as this, could you forget that I was near you? Were you not sure of my sympathy and assistance under any circumstances?"

I could only strain her closer to my heart.

"I would not idly inflict another pang upon you, my poor child," she pursued while she returned the pressure; "but I have a stern duty to perform," and as she spoke, she drew me toward a sofa, and seated herself beside me. "One question you must answer, and with truth, as you hope for consolation in this world. Eveleen; strange, terrible rumors have reached me; but I will trust to your word—are you innocent?"

"I am—I am"—I exclaimed eagerly, as I cast myself on my knees before her, with clasped hands and streaming eyes: "innocent most innocent in act; but guilty, I fear, in heart."

"After this admission I cannot doubt you; guilty or not, my age left me free to offer consolation to your father's child; but hoping that you had been misjudged, I have brought you also another comforter, for you have need of all our tenderness." And replacing me gently upon the sofa, she rang and desired that her daughter-in-law, who still remained in the carriage, might be requested to join her in my dressing-room.

"And now, calm yourself, Eveleen," she said, "and find consolation in learning the happiness which your assurance has given me. You know not how my heart has bled for you, since those horrid doubts were awakened in my mind. Imprudent though you may have been, let your past errors be subject indeed of deep regret, but not of despair. You are still very young; but you have already had opportunity to appreciate the hollowness and falsehood of that world which you loved too well for your own peace; let your past experience be to you as the fire to the gold in the crucible, and you may yet have occasion to be grateful for the trials which awakened you to higher and better hopes."

She had hardly ceased speaking when the door again opened, and the pure and heavenly eyes of the younger Lady O'Halloran met my own.

"The world has done her injustice, Margaret," said my kind comforter; "take her to your heart, for the bruised reed must be bound up."

Long and earnest was the embrace which we exchanged; but even amid all my emotion I felt humbled by the striking contrast which we presented. Calm and serene in her almost saint-like beauty, no cloud had gathered upon the radiant brow of that young girl; no trace of passion had marred the purity of her beauty; while I was crushed and withered by the spirit-war which had so long been scorching up my youth.

I was not, however, suffered to dwell long upon so bitter a contemplation, for the watchful old lady, as if conscious that a new source of suffering had been opened within me, suddenly exclaimed: "You must allow me, my dear Lady Dornton, to assume at once the authority of an old and sincere friend. You cannot remain under this roof at present; nor are you competent to control the mournful arrangements which must necessarily be made, before either your mother or Lord Otterford can arrive from town; go then at once to the Hall with Margaret; my son is from home, and no one can intrude upon your privacy; I will remain here for a short time, during which your woman can obey any orders which you may wish to give, and then follow you. Meanwhile, Margaret will herself bear you company, and, I trust, afford you comfort."

I could only bless her for the suggestion; and ere long I left the house of death calmer, and more full of hope than I had expected again to be in this world.

A faint sickness crept over me as I passed the chamber of my husband; but I nevertheless approached the door, and would have entered to look upon him for the last time, as though this tardy duty could compensate for my past errors. My intention was, however, instantly negatived by Lady O'Halloran, who was already aware of the frightful spectacle which would have awaited me; nor did I attempt to dispute her will.

And thus I once more quitted the home of my childhood, amid silence, and gloom, and terror; leaving behind no one to regret me, or to sympathize in my early sorrows. All was darkness here; but still before me rose one distant ray of light. The torch had been ignited by the fair young creature who bore me company, and who had already whispered, amid her tears, words of divine consolation which I now heard for the first time, and which seemed to bring peace upon their breath.

CHAPTER LVI.

I was transported to a new world. I was like the tempest-tossed and shipwrecked mariner, who is suddenly cast ashore upon one of those pleasure-teeming islands, where all is fresh, and green, and young, as though it had just sprung into existence; one of those dreamy and delicious latitudes of which distant voyagers bring back tales which are so glowing as to seem almost fabulous. No ill-judged and officious sympathy was forced upon me at moments when I was unable to bear the words of consolation; no retrospect was intruded upon me which could jar one chord of my weary spirits; but in those hours the beautiful young wife, her eyes teeming with a quiet joy which to me was as novel as it was soothing, would come and seat herself beside me, with her infant in her arms, and gradually win me back to composure.

It was a holy picture; and it awoke my heart to thoughts and feelings hitherto unknown to me. Even such as she was might I have been, had I known how to regulate my passions, and to control my vanity. How fatal had been my mistake!

Day succeeded day in the same unbroken and spirit-healing calm. I knew that Lord Otterford had arrived at Rooksley, and that an official investigation had taken place which had ratified the fact of Sir James's involuntary self-destruction. In announcing to me the refusal of my mother to comply with my request that she should come to me in my grief, the kind-hearted Lady O'Halloran was careful to mitigate the pang which she imagined that her information must necessarily inflict, by also acquainting me with the satisfaction expressed by Lord Otterford at my removal from the house to her generous guardianship, and the request he had ventured that she would continue to afford me her protection until some definite arrangement could be made.

"When all is over," she concluded, "he will visit you here, before he again departs for town, and I would counsel you, my dear Eveleen, to entreat his influence with your mother to receive you under her own roof, at least until the expiration of your mourning. I am aware that you will have much to suffer, much to endure without resentment, should she accede to this arrangement; but remember, my dear child, that if you are called on greatly to forbear, so you have also greatly erred, and must pay the penalty of those errors, in patience and expiation."

"I feel—I know it all, my dear Lady O'Halloran; and I will strive, indeed I will, to become less unworthy of the affection which you have lavished upon me; but, oh! you cannot guess what it will cost me to lose your fostering care, and to be cast once more, solitary and unloved, upon the world. I have told you all my wretched story; you are aware that there is still a far-off hope to which I cling; and how earnestly I desire, before that hope is realized, to have rendered myself more deserving of the happiness which it will insure. You know, too, that I cannot look back upon my married life, short as it has been, with one feeling of comfort or consolation; and that its fearful termination is a source of terror rather than regret. Judge, then, of what I have still to undergo, when I shall no longer have either precept or example to guide me—nothing but bitterness, and taunt, and scorn!"

"Have I not taught you where to look for support?"

"You have, indeed; and in that support alone can I trust during the many weary months which await me."

And she had done so; gently, but in surprise at my insensibility, she had led me on to entertain a less exalted idea of mere human and human perfectibility; she had taught me to look into my own heart, and to discover its hollowness; she had, in short, wakened a new nature within me, unstable and weak as yet, it is true, but which might perchance prove to be the germ of better things; and this, too, in the space of one short week, without dogmatism, without dictation, without rebuke; but simply, earnestly, and fondly; as a mother might have recalled her wandering child to the yearning heart which panted to receive her back.

No wonder, then, that I deprecated any change in my position; that I shrank at the idea of the visit which awaited me; the meeting which, in every point of view, presented a bitter trial. My own mother had spurned my prayer for help; and it was he whom I had still more deeply injured, who was about to stand before me; perhaps to rebuke me with my treachery; perhaps to reproach me with my past errors; perhaps, too—and this was the most horrible thought of all—perhaps, too, to hurl at me suspicions too frightful to be reduced to words!

Nor will any who have followed me through this confession of a wasted life, be surprised to learn that even with the images of this anticipated trial, now at the very threshold, mingled the dread of leaving the roof of Lady O'Halloran, from a nearer and dearer consideration than even those which I had educed to herself. I felt that this sojourn in a home where all breathed of purity and peace, must tend to exalt me in the eyes of Devereux. He would see that I was not in truth the outcast he had believed; that the good and the virtuous had not abandoned me utterly—and this consideration was my best consoler.

I dared not repine that I had heard nothing of him since that fateful morning. Ten days had barely elapsed, and the body of Sir James was not yet committed to the grave. How then could he have ventured to intrude upon my solitude, without a breach of that respect which I was now more than ever anxious to exact from him? It was true, that, as well aware as myself of the actual state of my feeling toward my husband, he knew that my grief demanded no such concession on his part; but still the exigences of society must be observed; and in my case, more stringently than ever, compromised as I was by the past.

For the first time I began—ay, even now, when I had not as yet disguised myself in the mourning garments which were prepared for me—to dwell upon that future from which I had hitherto shrunk. What did I not promise myself? For the first time I had begun also to attach a value to the wealth which would enable Devereux to abandon his profession, and to give himself up entirely to the life of happiness and peace which he had so often painted to me in glowing colors, too brilliant, alas! for the pencil of reality.

From these sweet dreams I was startled on the following morning by the aspect of the funereal dress which was spread out in my dressing-room. I had been prepared to expect it on the day upon which the obsequies of Sir James were to be performed: but when I was actually in presence of this dismal mockery of woe, and looked into my own heart, it seemed to afford the most bitter epigram, alike upon the present and the past; and my blood curdled as I submitted to its adjustment. My long and luxuriant hair was strained back, and concealed beneath the close borders of a muslin cap, which formed a dense and jealous frame-work to my pale features; the long, hanging sleeves, the clinging crape, and the inconvenient texture of my mourning dress, were all novel, and all repelling; but I made no comment upon either; and shortly afterward, plunged once more into a train of thought which diverted me from the present.

I was recalled, however, to the fact of the change which had been effected in my whole appearance, by the involuntary start of both my hostesses when I descended to the breakfast-room.

"How beautiful!" murmured the young mother, while she strained her baby to her heart, as though she sought to avert from its innocent head so bitter a fate as that on which she looked.

"How melancholy!" sighed the more chastened old lady, as she pressed her lips to my forehead. "Eveleen, my dear Eveleen, let me hope, let me trust that you are now clad in the weeds of your past follies; and that when you throw off these mourning garments, you will also cast away with them all the evil influences of your former life. You will then, indeed have reason to bless the day when you were stricken; and to rejoice in the chastisement by which you are now visited."

Little more passed during the meal. I was asking myself, if I should, indeed, fulfil the hop which had just been uttered for me; and m companions were too considerate to intrud upon a silence and a preoccupation, whic they felt to be only too consistent with my po sition. Indifferent, and worse than indifferen as I had been to Sir James as a wife, I coul not, nevertheless, contemplate his untimely fa without a pang, the more bitter because I wa conscious that I had probably been its involu tary cause. Had not Devereux appeared befo him at that eventful moment, he would, witho doubt, have been more guarded in his mov ments; and was not Devereux even then i his way to the meeting which I had myself a pointed?

These were bitter convictions; and as t unconscious tears streamed over my w cheeks, I ceased to believe myself so guilt as I had hitherto striven to appear; but th once more uprose the memory of the cruel ch which was practiced upon me—the falseh and tyranny of which I had been made the v tim—and I passed from the contemplation my wrongs, to the prospect of brighter days come. These were again banished in t turn, by gloomy visions of the house of de the shrouded corse, and the funereal train, wh had replaced the dazzling crowds collec there during my earlier years. Adela had q ted that roof only to die; Sir James had sou its shelter only to follow her to the grave. hideous phantasmagoria flitted before me! tred, and falsehood, and treachery, and blo and I stood alone amid all these, powerless o avert their consequences, even as I had t incapable of anticipating their advent.

Never had I felt less sure of myself. Under the guardianship of Lady O'Halloran, and strengthened by her affectionate and judicious counsels, I found it easy to form the most praiseworthy resolutions; but I had learnt enough of human nature to be painfully conscious that resolutions, however exemplary, are by no means infallible; and that neither my tendencies, nor my education, had given me a right to expect that I should ever acquire that perfect self-government, or be enabled to exert that utter self-abnegation, which were necessary to render me morally the equal of those whom I aspired to emulate.

Meanwhile, the spirit-struggle had, at least, taught me to look upon my own advantages with a less partial eye, and to feel how truly dependent I in truth was upon the generosity of others. What now availed my wealth, my pride, or my beauty? That world which I had resolved to subdue to my will, or to despise, had, like a trodden serpent, turned upon me, and stung me in the heel. I had not even a home, no shelter to which calumny could not pursue me: and my one vision of future happiness was still, certain as it seemed, faint, and afar off; and to be realized only after an interval on which I dared not dwell.

Such were the meditations of my first morning of visible widowhood; and when, on the conclusion of the repast of which I had been merely a spectator, I again retired to the solitude of my own apartment, the same reflections followed me.

The windows were flung open, and I leant eagerly out to catch the cool wind upon my throbbing brow, as it swept over the leafy stretch of forest-timber before me Its influence was wholesome. As I gazed out, I clasped my hands in prayer; when, as if in answer to the appeal, I heard booming upon the wind, slow, measured, and rendered even more solemn by distance, the deep pealing of a death-bell. It needed no interpreter; it was the toll of the village church bell of Rooksley, inviting to the shelter of its vaults the dead for whom I wore those clinging weeds.

Instinctively I fell upon my knees, and still I heard the solemn cadence rolling over hill and valley, and proclaiming to never-dying nature the departure of another of her children.

At length it ceased, and I knew that the mourning train had entered the sacred house. All would soon be over; and I shuddered as I remembered with how little waste of time and ceremony that body was in death committed to the earth, which in life had been tended with so much care and gentleness. This must be one day my fate also. The ghastly shroud, the choking coffin, the writhing worm—oh, it was, indeed, most horrible, for I had not yet learnt to look beyond these antecedents of another and a more glorious life.

It will easily be foreseen that emotions of this description had humbled my pride, and chastened my spirit, sufficiently to enable me to regard even the tardy and brief visit of Lord Otterford with gratitude, if not with hope.

He was to visit me shortly after his return from the funeral, and to set off the same night for town. There was, indeed, little to detain him within the gloomy and abandoned walls of Rooksley; and in the near neighborhood of what had once been the happy home of Emily Vernon.

CHAPTER LVII.

I was yet upon my knees, with my face leaning on my folded arms, when the door of my dressing-room was so softly opened that I was not aware of being seen; until I heard the low voice of my hostess whisper gently:

"Here is the mourner. Judge if she has need of your pity and protection."

I raised my weary head, and with an emotion more acute than I had ever before experienced, I saw Lord Otterford with a pale cheek, but a stern eye, standing before me. Lady O'Halloran had already retired, and was closing the door behind her. As I slowly rose from my knees, I detected that the expression of Lord Otterford's countenance softened, as if involuntarily. The deep and evidently sincere dejection in which he found me had touched him, despite his sense of wrong; and as he threw himself into a seat, he covered his face with his spread hand.

I could neither speak, nor approach him.

"Lady Dornton—" he at length commenced. "Oh, call me Eveleen!"—I exclaimed imploringly; "if you would not crush me to the very earth. Tell me that you forgive me, or I shall sink under my shame and my remorse."

"Of what avail would now be my forgiveness?" he asked with sad seriousness; "you have yourself forever destroyed my power to serve you. You best know how I had earned so deep and cruel a hatred; but the evil is now as total as it is irrevocable. Your mother and myself have met but once since the fatal day on which you betrayed my bitter secret—a secret which I had expiated in remorse and tears—and then it was only that we might consult upon the duties necessary to be performed alike toward the living and the dead. The latter I have accomplished, with the privacy and absence of ostentation suited to the melancholy circumstances; the former, which I am now to fulfill, is, however, the most painful. Had I found you reckless, and unimpressed by the late catastrophe, as I own that I feared I should do, one portion of my task might have been remitted, while the other would have affected me far less, for I could then have told my tidings without emotion. As it is, Eveleen,—as it is, I feel compelled both to pardon and to pity you."

I rushed forward, and cast myself at his feet.

"Yes—you do well," he pursued; "that is the most fitting posture you can assume while listening to what I have to tell. The pride of self-dependence and self-appreciation have nothing in common with such an hour as this, when the scent of the death-soil is still clinging to my own garments, and the solemn words of the burial-service sounding in my ears; and when the weeds in which you are yourself clad are new and strange to you. I will spare you any unnecessary details for both our sakes; but with certain circumstances it is alike expedient and proper that you should be made acquainted. I need scarcely inform you that Sir James has left no testamentary document of any description, either here or in own. No foreshadowing of his approaching and fearful end had warned him to accomplish this duty; and I was, consequently, from your own silence upon the subject, left free to comply with the injunctions of your mother as to the mode of his interment. And here, Eveleen, I should have bounded my relation with regard to your unfortunate husband, had I found you in a less becoming frame of mind; but, under existing circumstances, I feel compelled to confide to you one fact, which, after you have recovered the first shock of the intelligence, may tend to lessen the compunction which you must naturally experience when you look back upon your conduct as a wife."

I pressed my lips upon his hand, and listened eagerly.

"You may have heard that Sir James had rested the fatal fowling-piece upon the ground in order to read a letter, which he had just received from town by his own messenger; and that he was still engaged in its perusal when the sudden appearance of an individual—Eveleen, I detect your shudder, but I will not, I dare not ask you if you can determine the identity of that individual; for despite all the facts which would seem to negative my suspicion, I am but too painfully convinced of a frightful truth—that letter is now in my possession." He paused. He evidently dreaded the effect of his next words; while I gazed at him with dry and dilated eyes, and parched and parted lips.

"That letter," he resumed, after an instant, "was in reply to one which he had himself written; and it came from—Mrs. Delamaine."

I made no gesture of indignation; I felt none. I only bowed my head once more upon his knees overwhelmed by a feeling which was half horror and half relief. Lord Otterford bent over me in wonder, as he whispered, "Do you understand me, Eveleen?"

I made a gesture of assent.

"Do you desire to see that letter?"

"Never!"

"And you are right, poor child! Suffice it then that, although its contents by no means justify your past errors, they nevertheless afford painful evidence that the indignities to which you have been lately subjected, arose less from a desire on the part of your husband to punish your levity and to reform your conduct, than to disembarrass himself of your presence; and this fact, mortifying as it must appear to you, I have considered it my duty not to withhold in justice to both parties. I must also state, although I am aware that upon this point you are careless, that the affairs of Sir James are not considerably involved, despite his apparently profuse expenditure; but as nearly all his engagements appear to have been debts contracted at the gaming-table, which may be legally evaded, it is necessary that I should understand if you intend to recognize them."

"To the last penny, my lord."

"I anticipated no less from your sense of right. And now, Eveleen," he added sadly; "we have at length only to speak of yourself. What are your own views and wishes?"

"You are aware, my lord," I said with a shrinking heart, but struggling to obey the advice of Lady O'Halloran, "that I have already entreated the countenance and protection of my mother."

"I was, indeed, so informed. But surely, Eveleen, you must have understood too well the nature of your mother to anticipate her concurrence in such an arrangement, and I consequently regarded the proposal as merely the effect of sudden isolation; or, perhaps, of a desire to exculpate yourself from any future reproach of reckless emancipation from her authority and guidance. You could not have forgotten that you had so recently inflicted upon her an injury which her haughty nature never can forgive. I have myself found it difficult, most difficult to do so, for it will embitter all my future life—judge, therefore, of the effect which it was calculated to produce on her."

"Oh, had you known, could you guess the insulting taunts, the bitter insults which wrung from me that unrighteous retaliation," I exclaimed with clasped hands, "you would be merciful."

"Yet you should have remembered," he said hoarsely, and evidently struggling against some powerful emotion, "that your mother was not the only victim of your treachery—that your words carried with them a venom which distilled a double poison."

Self-convicted and repentant, I dared not seek to justify myself.

"The effect of this fatal error has extended still further," pursued Lord Otterford, who was at no loss to interpret the humiliation of my silence; "for it has tended to close your mother's heart against you, I fear forever. My entreaties—for, wounded as I was, Eveleen, I could still feel for you—produced no change in her determination; she has refused not only to receive, but even to see you. Her utmost condescension was the expression of her desire that you should, at least during the year of your widowhood, fulfill the intention of Sir James, and reside at Glenfillan, under the protection of her sister."

I gasped for breath. The vision of Adela's death-bed rose before me, with all its appalling accessories; and it was with difficulty that I could support myself.

"Everything has been already prepared at the castle for your reception," he continued; "you will be, in every respect, your own mistress, and secure from all the comments of a censorious world, which must have time to forget the past."

"And do you also advise this, my lord?" I asked faintly.

"I can suggest no other measure of equal prudence. I am aware that the trial will be heavy; but you will have it in your power, Eveleen, to render it profitable."

"My mother shall be obeyed," I said in a whisper.

Lord Otterford laid his hand upon my head with parental tenderness; and then, clasping one of mine within it, he said firmly:

"One thing more, my poor child, and then our conference is ended. You have wounded me deeply; and I claim, in extenuation of the injury, your solemn promise that, during your retirement at Glenfillan, you will hold no correspondence, either personally or by letter, with Colonel Devereux, without my express permission. Give me this pledge for your own sake, and I will not only endeavor to forget the past, but I will watch over you as a fond father watches over a cherished child."

For such a condition as this I had been wholly unprepared. I was then to be utterly alone; unsolaced by the aspect of one friendly face; unsupported by the sound of one familiar voice; left in ignorance of the feelings and the sympathy of him whose affection had now become the only hope of my existence! Yet the accent of Lord Otterford was so full of conviction, so earnest, and so persuasive, that I could not resist its influence. I promised what he exacted.

"Be true to your pledge, Eveleen," he said as he bent down, and kissed my forehead; "and, should you wish it, I will frequently be your guest. I must at once return to town: your own affairs exact it; and it will be with a heart relieved from a weight of anxiety on your account, that I shall report your obedience to your mother. I would entreat you, meanwhile, to regulate with Lady O'Halloran (to whom you owe a heavy debt of gratitude), the period of your own departure; that done, acquaint me with your determination, and I will hasten to protect you to your new home. And now, farewell; give me your hand once more; let not the promise of this hour, in which I feel a faith which it would indeed pain me to find misplaced, prove fallacious; and I trust that brighter prospects may open upon us all."

Need I say with what emotion I responded to this unhoped-for kindness? I forgot for the moment all save my happiness in being thus restored to the good opinion of my mother's husband. I scarcely cared to remember that that mother herself had not vouchsafed to me one word of sympathy or pity; I forgot the exile to which I had pledged myself; my enforced separation from Devereux: the yet unclosed tomb of my husband; I felt only that I might yet regain the esteem of the world, and become an object of affection to those from whom my former faults had, as I once believed, separated me forever.

CHAPTER LVIII.

My leave-taking with Lady O'Halloran and her daughter was a most trying one; when, at the close of a month, I summoned Lord Otterford to perform his promise. I had lately lived in such an atmosphere of affection and peace that I had almost ceased to regret the world and its gaieties; but my old yearning grew upon me when I contemplated the change to which I was about to be subjected. I repressed the feeling, however; and strengthened by the approbation of my estimable hostess, I uttered no repining; and the rather as she pledged herself that she would spend some months with me at Glenfillan, accompanied by the gentle Margaret and her infant daughter.

The gratification of Lord Otterford was lively and sincere when he was apprised of this arrangement. He at once felt, as a man of the world, the importance of such a concession to my present reputation, and future respectability. He wrung the hand of the old lady with a fervor, and offered his thanks with an energy, which convinced me of his own interest in my fate, and helped to sustain my sinking courage; and thus, amid tears, and blessings, and regrets, I left the house which to me had been indeed "a refuge in the time of trouble."

We traveled slowly, for my considerate companion appeared as little anxious as myself to hasten my arrival at my desolate home; nor did he spare a care or an exertion to lessen the fatigue and tedium of the journey. With a delicacy which I deeply felt, he cautiously avoided all reference to such portions of the past as must tend to humble me in my own eyes; while he explained the new duties which had devolved upon me, and the necessity of my applying my mind and my energies to the proper application of the wealth which was now at my exclusive disposition.

"Hitherto, Evelcen," he said, "that wealth has merely been the source of misery and folly; redeem it from this reproach, and you will then learn its real value."

I readily pledged myself to the task, though I had only a vague idea of the means by which so desirable an end was to be accomplished: and having given Lord Otterford full powers to act for me upon every point according to his own discretion, I at length reached the gloomy termination of my journey. As we drove into the vast and desolate court, I flung myself upon the breast of my companion; and for the first time since our departure from England, gave free loose to my long pent-up emotions; but I soon rallied when he represented to me the inevitable effects of so ill-timed a weakness; and before my meeting with Lady Flora, I had succeeded in suppressing all external demonstrations of the misery that lay heavy at my heart.

I shall not weary the reader by a detail of the loneliness and monotony of my existence at Glenfillan, after the departure of my affectionate and anxious traveling companion. Suffice it that at the close of a month or two of utter despondency, I began to accuse myself of cowardice and egotism in thus wasting life in weak and useless indolence. The thought of Devereux returned upon me, too, brighter and dearer than ever. I must not fail now, for his sake! I looked around me, and each succeeding day discovered new much I was indebted to the consideration of Lord Otterford. My personal servants had been bribed by an increase of salary to bury themselves, at least for a few months, in the country, in order to afford me their services; the appliances of convenience and even luxury which had been dedicated to my especial use in town, had preceded me to Scotland: and Lady Flora, the tyrannical jailer who had lent herself unhesitatingly to the projects of Sir James, forewarned in time, was all humility and obsequiousness. The one great ambition of her life was realized; she was again an indweller of her father's castle; and as she had been made aware that her continuance under that coveted roof depended solely on my pleasure, she bent herself, with admirable ductility, to the new exigences of her position.

My faithful Susan was a treasure to me amid this natural and moral wilderness. I had requested Lord Otterford, while arranging my pecuniary affairs, to insure such a provision for life to the faithful girl as might enable her to realize the fond visions of her heart; but she refused to abandon me during my sojourn a-

Glenfillan: and to her I turned for comfort and encouragement in every moment of despondency. She it was who drew my attention to the school founded by my sister, and to the poor whom she had fed; and I eagerly embraced the prospect of occupation and interest afforded by an emulation of her exertions.

I soon became popular in the neighborhood, for I was rich in means, and subdued in spirit; and where the evil was beyond the reach of gold, I was blessed for my words of sympathy and comfort. My home-hours were the most difficult to support with resignation; for when I found myself alone in the keen mountain air, or seated in the humble dwellings of my pensioners, my thoughts were not wholly absorbed by self, and for a time I forgot to dwell upon my trials, and learned to trust in a future which was to compensate for all. It was during my periods of enforced companionship with Lady Flora that I felt the whole weight and tedium of my position. No longer able, from weakened sight, to weave the knights and shepherdesses in which she formerly delighted, she had taken refuge in the knitting-needles bequeathed to her by her maternal aunt; and wholly absorbed in her monotonous and interminable occupation, passed hours beside me without the utterance of a syllable.

Such was the broad outline of my existence, until the arrival of my promised guests; only relieved at long intervals by the brief visits of Lord Otterford, who encouraged me in my faint efforts in well-doing, and chid me gently for the neglect which I had evidently shown toward my own health. I was in truth sadly changed. The interest which I took in all that passed around me was forced and wearisome; and even while I conscientiously adhered to the promise which I had myself given, I bitterly felt the utter silence and estrangement of Devereux. For a time I consoled myself with the belief that the same pledge had been extorted from him; but gradually this idea ceased to satisfy me. It was easy to wring such a promise from me, for I had no power to withhold it under my peculiar circumstances; but who could compel him to so extreme a measure? Was he not the master of his own actions, and accountable to no one for his movements? And yet he came not; although long months had elapsed since our separation, and that my year of widowhood was drawing to a close.

A strange, vague fear grew upon me. I strove resolutely to shake it off, but I could only partially succeed; and throughout the long, long, weary winter, during the dreary hours of my inhabitation with Lady Flora, this undefined terror, to which I did not dare to give a name, grew and strengthened upon me. Not once had Lord Otterford alluded to the existence of his nephew, during his short and hurried visits; nor had I ventured to utter one inquiry. Of my mother he said little, and that little was discouraging. Satisfied that I had obeyed her will, she had ceased even to mention me; and when the subject was forced upon her, the coldness and indifference of her replies forbade all hope of any concession on her part.

At length came the spring; and with the spring, the beloved guests whom I had so long awaited. Lady O'Halloran, with her usual far-sighted consideration, had deferred her visit until near the close of my year of mourning. She wished to judge of the effect which this long seclusion had produced upon my character, and she had also another reason, which she did not state, but which I was subsequently enabled to appreciate.

Our meeting was even more sad than we anticipated. Shocked and alarmed at the change which was visible in my whole appearance; at my attenuated form, the red spot in my cheek, and the bright light in my eye, the warm-hearted old lady could not conceal her uneasiness; and our first greetings were scarcely over when she drew me apart, and pillowing my pale brow on her shoulder, began to question me as to the cause of my evidently altered health.

"Be frank with me, Eveleen," she said; "you have some new and pungent sorrow gnawing at your heart, which is independent of the past. What is it, my poor child?"

The flood-gates of my grief opened at once. I had hitherto borne my burden in silence; not even to Susan had I confided the apprehension which was sapping my existence; but now I poured forth on the bosom of this inestimable friend all the anguish and humiliation of my spirit.

Lady O'Halloran listened dejectedly, and in silence. "I might have foreseen," she said bitterly, "that you still loved this man; but, Eveleen, you must no longer yield to a weakness which has become unworthy. I have deferred my arrival here until this late period, in order to await with you the close of your period of exile, and to reclaim you as a guest. You have yet much to endure, but you will not disappoint my hopes; you will struggle to be just to yourself; and to avenge your blighted name. I will not abandon you to yourself until you have convinced me that you are worthy of the trust."

I looked up at her in silence; but with beseeching in my eyes.

"Yes—perhaps it will be better so—" she murmured as if unconsciously; "sooner or later the blow must fall, and why not now, when her own fears have partially prepared her for the truth? You must forget this man, poor sufferer," she continued, as she folded me in her arms; "there is a gulf between you which can never be overpassed. This is your last trial, and you must receive it in patience and humility."

"He will not obey their bidding," I gasped out; "be the difficulties what they may, his affection will overcome them."

"Eveleen, remember how long he has abandoned you to sorrow and to doubt."

"He was forbidden, like myself, to seek a meeting—he hoped for brighter days—he trusted in patience, as I have done, to the future."

"Deceive yourself no longer, my poor child. In the cruel pride of his heart he has forsaken you—to preserve what he sees fit to call his honor, he has left you to the desolation of your own spirit. The passion of which he boasted could not resist the influence of envenomed tongues; he had not the moral courage requisite to enforce either your justification, or his own—and, in short, Eveleen, you must think of him no more."

I made no effort to interrupt these crushing words. I listened eagerly, breathlessly, as though my life hung upon their import; and yet I did not clearly comprehend their force; and Lady O'Halloran had long ceased to speak, while I still listened as though I had more to learn, and that all I had already heard were subject of comparative insignificance.

"Speak, Eveleen," at length exclaimed my companion, terrified at the silence by which her communication had been succeeded; "tell me that you will forget this weak and worthless man."

"We forget all in the grave," I said, as I rose calmly from beside her. "All! even the one hope of a whole existence. And now let me leave you for a time; I must be alone—to think."

"I will accompany you to your room, Eveleen; do not restrain your tears, they will relieve you."

"I have no tears to shed," I whispered hoarsely, as I tottered from the apartment upon her supporting arm; "I have no time for tears; I must be alone—to think."

I was conveyed to my chamber, and laid in my bed. A brain-fever supervened. The same physician who witnessed the agonies of Adela now watched over mine; the same dreary stillness reigned throughout the house. Lord O'Halloran hastened to remove his wife and child to their more happy home; but his mother lingered beside what she believed to be my death-couch, in order to fulfill her last pledge to her old friend.

I was not, however, destined to sink under my trial. Life was yet too strong within me; and after many weeks of danger and delirium, my faculties recovered their balance. To what a dreary waking was I condemned! Even the wild and fitful visions of my fever had been less bitter and exhausting than the crushing memories which hovered, like foul spectres of the past, about my restless pillow during my convalescence. How often did I close my languid and stiffened eyelids, and pray to die—to die as Adela had done, and to be at rest. But even as that impious wish rose within me, the low-voiced breath of prayer murmured beside my bed; and the ministering angel who knew the struggle that was going on within me, recalled me to calmer and more holy thoughts.

Slowly and painfully I was restored to health, but I was no longer what I had been. The chastening hand which had been laid heavily upon me in mercy, had sobered down the effervescence of my nature, and made me a new being. Humble, obedient, and submissive, I offered no opposition to the will of those about me; and when my strength was sufficiently restored to admit of the arrangement, I passively suffered myself to be removed from Glenfillan, and conducted by easy stages to the home of my unwearying friend, under her protection and that of Lord Otterford.

I remained for months beneath her hospitable roof; and, could I have blotted out the memory of the past, nothing would have been wanting to my happiness; but the arrow had been driven home; and I had not strength to wrench it out. I knew that my fair fame was blighted—that my mother had abandoned me—and that the dream of my life was over. Devereux had become a husband. His bride was young, and beautiful, and wealthy as I had been; but upon her the breath of calumny had never rested—his honor was secure from taint! This was indeed a bitter pang, but it was the last. Thenceforward I acquired courage to look steadfastly at my position, and my resolve was taken.

"I will purchase Rooksley from Lady Madelaine," I said, in reply to an inquiry from my hostess. "She will cede it to me without difficulty, for she has no associations with the place which she can desire to retain. There I shall not be quite desolate; for your society and that of the good rector will reconcile me to myself, and teach me to forget the height from which I have fallen. I have no longer anything in common with the happy and the prosperous; but I may still solace the suffering and the needy. You alone will not misjudge me; and I shall require all your support to enable me to endure the long years of life which are spread out before me."

"Speak not so despondingly, my dear Eveleen," replied my listener; "time will do much; you are still in the first bloom of womanhood; and may yet have long years of happiness before you, both as a wife and a mother."

"Never!" I said emphatically. "No man shall take scorn and reproach to his bosom through my means; nor, after my past experience, do I anticipate that, even had I formed a different resolution, an individual could be found so generous to me, and so unjust to himself. No, my kind friend, I have forever done with vague and dreamy visions. Society has rejected me, and I bow beneath its fiat, however I may question its equity. There is much to do at Rooksley; much misery to alleviate; much ignorance to instruct. May I, in my character of a monitress, learn to practice the lessons which I shall endeavor to enforce."

Convinced of my sincerity, Lady O'Halloran encouraged me by her approbation; and soon my return to Rooksley was arranged and accomplished; nor was it long ere the voice of gladness and revel was once more heard within its walls; for shortly after my establishment, Susan was united to the husband of her choice; and the event was productive of no regret to myself, as I retained her bridegroom in my service.

I had judged correctly in believing that my mother would offer no obstacle to my purchase of the property. Aware that it must revert to me at her death, and satisfied that so long as I remained in that retirement, I should not cross her own path, she exerted her energies to expedite the transfer; and in a shorter time than I had dared to hope, I found myself mistress of the coveted domain.

And now, what more have I to add? Who cannot appreciate the tedium, the regrets, and the despair of such a waste of life? Ten, twenty weary years passed over me; and those who looked upon me would have declared me happy—but I was not so. Feverishly impatient to create new interests and new ties, I entered upon the duties and privileges of my new position with an uncalculating and reckless profusion both of energy and outlay, which called forth the expostulations of Lady O'Halloran, and excited the astonishment of Dr. James. The paupers in the almshouses built by my mother had increased pensions; and the children in her school were newly clothed the old church was cleaned and beautified; cottages were leveled and rebuilt · the idle were employed; the sick tended, and the aged placed beyond the reach of want. Many, in the gratitude of their hearts, spoke of me as a saint, but they could not look beneath the surface. There were times when I was impatient and irritable under my misfortunes; and asked myself why I was thus called upon to suffer, when the errors of so many others were tolerated, without either expiation or reproach. In those hours the tears which I shed beside the bed of pain, or with which I listened to the tale of sorrow, did not flow unreservedly for the sufferer whom I was there to soothe; they were wept also for myself; nor did the words of heavenly consolation which I had learned to utter always reach my heart. That rebellious heart was yet an alien to its own peace.

I struggled, however, in my better moments, to attain to a more wholesome and a more fitting frame of mind; but I had much, indeed, to learn, and still more to unlearn. No one could with impunity pass through the ordeal to which I had been subjected by my ill-regulated passions; and thus, even when I endeavored to press forward, I frequently fainted by the way.

In the midst of these conflicting feelings, I was summoned to the sick-bed of my more than mother; and with my heart torn by fear and misgiving I hastened to her side. How unlike was her period of suffering to that through which I had so lately passed! There was no remorse here to strew the pillow with thorns—no disgrace to cast a gloom over the atmosphere—no abandonment to make the sinking spirit shriek out in its desolation. All was calm, peaceful and full of hope; and the blessing which she breathed, with her dying hand pressed heavily upon my head, rose as a sweet incense to heaven, and hallowed what it offered.

Still I lived on; and I did good; for it is a merciful as well as a marvelous dispensation that the faults of the erring are sometimes made to minister to the happiness of those who suffer; and so it was with me. I imparted the joy which I could no longer feel; I carried with me the consolation of which I myself despaired; and it was not until time had touched me with a gentle but a certain hand, that I began to consider the past in its true colors.

More than once my faded beauty or my known wealth would have enabled me to risk a new venture on the stormy waves of that world by which my very existence had been forgotten; but I no longer aspired to its suffrages; nor did I care to peril my present peace for the uncertain tenure of any earthly affection.

The commencement of my narrative will suffice to prove, that I have long been reconciled to my lot. Childless, widowed, and an orphan I am not, nevertheless, left desolate in my old age. On the death of my mother, which was occasioned by a cold taken on quitting a heated room in a costume ill-suited to any violent transition of atmosphere, and which was too sudden to enable me to offer her my last duty as a child, Lord Otterford hastened at my request to pass his period of mourning at Rooksley. He was rapidly becoming an old man; he had ceased to value society; and had few wants save those which are necessary to a well-furnished table; and thus, as we had no vow of abstinence at my hermitage, it will be readily understood that I prevailed upon him, without much difficulty, to become my permanent companion. His games at chess with Dr. James are interminable; and I might, perhaps, sometimes find them tedious, were my solitude not enlivened by the frequent presence of Mary O'Halloran, who was in infancy the solace of my sorrow, and who is in her beautiful and blooming girlhood the charm of my old age. My worthy neighbors at the Hall insist that she bears a striking resemblance to what I must once have been; and my father-in-law, whose eyes are dimmed by time, and whose perceptions are somewhat blunted by his habits of self-indulgence, eagerly ratifies their verdict.

May she have a better fate! She is my adopted heiress, and the hope of my waning life.

THE END.

THE JEALOUS WIFE.

CHAPTER I.

A FAMILY GROUP.

"Of course, Miss Trevanion—of course it must be as you see fit to decide;" said a stately old gentleman, with snow-white hair, heavy black eyebrows, and a countenance which, although decidedly handsome, betokened alike haughtiness and obstinacy; "I am naturally as well aware as yourself, that you have long passed the age when I possessed a legal right to control you; and I can easily comprehend that you presume upon your position, as an only child, to brave my wishes. Beware, however, before it is too late; for none—mark me well—none have ever done so with impunity since the commencement of my career. If you doubt this fact, you have only to inquire of your mother."

"Oh! pray, Mr. Trevanion;" expostulated a nervous voice, issuing from amid a mass of costly shawls, and from the depths of a lounging chair; "let no appeal be made to me. It is bad enough to have my quiet disturbed by this altercation between you and Ida, without being required to interfere in it."

"Altercation, madam! What do you understand by the word altercation? You surely can not comprehend its significance. There can be no altercation between a father and his child. The bare idea of such a thing is preposterous!"

"Well, perhaps it is. Substitute any other term you please. It is quite indifferent to me." And the complicated mass of drapery quivered for an instant, and then became once more motionless.

"Idiot! woman!" muttered the head of the family, as he paced slowly across the floor; then once more pausing before his daughter, who stood partially supported by a table on which her hand rested, he continued more audibly:—"You see, Miss Trevanion, that you must not calculate upon the powerful protection of your mother. She disclaims all interference, and she is right; it could have done no good, and it might have done much evil." There was an ugly sneer about the corners of his mouth as he spoke, and it was unperceived by the young lady, who had, from the commencement of the discussion, kept her eyes riveted upon a book of engravings which lay open near her.

"I trust that I require no protection, when I venture to urge the happiness of my future life on my own father;" was the calm rejoinder of the lofty beauty, who seemed as resolute of will as her parent; and, as she spoke, her steady gaze, for the first time, rested upon his flushed and angry countenance.

Very beautiful, in truth, was the face thus lifted to his, although the freshness of girlhood had evidently passed away to give place to the rich loveliness of that next phase of female attraction, when every charm is ripened into full perfection; and the mind impresses a new power, unknown to mere thoughtless, unreflecting youth. Miss Trevanion had attained her twenty-sixth year; her intellect was fully developed; and a shade of her father's firmness gave additional expression to the large dark eyes and lofty brow, from which the raven hair was swept back in rich and massy folds. While Mrs. Trevanion crouched and cowered before the displeasure of her lord, his daughter stood erect. As she had said, the happiness of her whole life (according to her own view of the case) was at stake; and she was evidently prepared to maintain her legitimate position to the utmost.

"You know, Ida, that I can not brook opposition"—was the next evasive remark of the old gentleman.

"Nor do I ever seek to offer any, as you are well aware, sir, when the point to be contested is of slight importance; but on this occasion—"

"Well, Miss Trevanion, on this occasion? Where are your rational reasons for such ill-timed rebellion? You are ambitious, indeed, if a peer of the realm will not satisfy your vanity."

The beauty shrugged her shoulders.

"I should not ask so much."

"Ha! I understand;" thundered Mr. Trevanion, hurriedly resuming his walk; "you are in love—You! A rare jest, truly, but a dangerous one. Have I not warned you from your girlhood to avoid all follies of that nature until they had received my sanction?"

"You have."

"And how have you obeyed my commands?"

"As a woman ever does, until her heart teaches her that she is a free agent. I scorn all subterfuge. Had you addressed me in another tone, I might have regretted that it was not in my power to fulfill your wishes. As it is—"

"Pray, proceed, Miss Trevanion—pray, proceed."

"You have spared me that regret, sir."

"Ha! Indeed! Well, then, listen to me. You are our only child—my only child—but that fact shall avail you little, if you thus resolutely thwart my views. My uncle has a son. I hate them both, as you well know, and I have cause to do so; but, sooner than that my wealth should go to enrich the pauper whom you have chosen to accept as a suitor, that boy, detested as he is, shall be my heir."

A deep flush mantled on the cheek of his listener for a moment, but it faded as suddenly as it had risen, and she stood calm and unmoved as before.

"Yes;" pursued Mr. Trevanion passionately: "you do not require to be told to-day how bitterly I have, through life, resented the arrogance of my more fortunate relatives. How, the son of a younger son, I was insulted by the grudging offers of assistance which were to be doled out to me, in order to secure, at least, the means of existence to a poor relation—a birth on board an Indiaman, or the honor of carrying the colors in a regiment of foot—with full powers to make my own way when I was thus generously started in life. Law, Physic, or Divinity, were too costly to be thought of; they required previous training; and education involved expense. You know, also, how I disdained such pitiful assistance, and threw myself into commerce, in order to attain independence by my own unassisted efforts."

"And you acted nobly!" was the murmured rejoinder.

"Thank you; it is at least consolatory that I have earned the approval of my own child; of the daughter, who, as I once hoped and believed, would have been enriched by my degradation—for that, as I have never forgotten, was the term applied by my aristocratic kinsman to my resolve to suffice to myself—but as you, Miss Trevanion, have willed it otherwise, I here solemnly declare, that should you obstinately adhere to your present insane project, I will leave all that I possess to Sir Jasper's son, and heir."

"In that case, sir;" said the lady steadily; "I must follow your example, and endeavor to suffice to myself."

"Be it so. Then you resolutely refuse to accept the hand of Lord Downmere?"

"I do."

"You had better take time to reflect."

"The question requires no reflection. I can not sacrifice myself to the mere empty vanity of rank."

"You prefer beggary?"

"Decidedly—with a husband, whom I could respect."

"You have more taste for the cotton gown of a pauper than the coronet of a countess?"

"Beyond all doubt—if I can wear it with more honor to myself."

"Ha!" groaned the irritated father; "this comes of an ill-assorted union—The mother's blood! The mother's blood!"

"Now really, Mr. Trevanion;" exclaimed the nervous voice of the closely-enveloped figure in the lounging chair; "you have no right to blame me for Ida's obstinacy; I am sure that I am as angry with her as you can be, for her folly in refusing the poor dear Earl; and, therefore, it is not generous in you to remind me that my father was only a merchant; for you well know that without his gold —"

"Silence, madam!" shouted the exasperated man; "are you, too, about to lecture me? Is it not enough that Miss Trevanion presumes to oppose her will to mine, without your forcing upon me the unpalatable fact that I found it expedient to further my fortunes by marrying your father's daughter?"

"I am sure, Mr. Trevanion—"

"You are sure of nothing, madam; how can you be so, when even I am thwarted and baffled at every turn? Be satisfied. I have bestowed on you one of the oldest, if not precisely one of the noblest, names in England: but still I can not expect that you should feel as I do, the disgrace which this disobedient girl desires to bring upon a proud and ancient family."

"You might allow me to speak," whimpered the weak and trembling woman.

"You might speak till doomsday, were you likely to do so to any purpose;" was the conciliating reply; "but I am now talking seriously to your daughter, and your idle interference is mistimed."

"Permit me to replace your cushion, mamma;" said Miss Trevanion, as she observed that, in her agitation, her mother had sunk helplessly back in an uncomfortable position; but her attention was declined. The querulous woman waved her away with a repulsive gesture, as she impatiently murmured: "It is all your own fault. Why do you not marry Lord Downmere, and put an end to this disagreeable dispute? I am sure I only wish that I had been so lucky as to—. Well, well, it is no use to talk of that now; but pray let there be an end of all this."

Miss Trevanion turned away; there was a strange expression of blended contempt and pity on her proud lip; but she made no reply.

The persons whom we have thus unceremoniously introduced to the reader, were, although so closely connected, as ill-suited to each other as it was well possible for three human beings to be. Mr. Trevanion, the only son of a younger brother—who had in early life and before he had adopted any settled profession, been so imprudent as to elope with the penniless daughter of an Irish peer, and to drag on a dependent and aimless existence under the roof of his more fortunate brother, the fourteenth baronet—was early left an orphan, his mother having died in giving him birth; while her husband only lived to see him reach his twelfth year. Accustomed, from his earliest infancy, to know himself rather tolerated than loved, by his austere uncle, the unfortunate boy, young as he was, felt all the importance of his loss. In his cares and sorrows, that weak but affectionate father had been his refuge—in his pastimes, his tutor and his playmate—and as he followed him to the family vault, where he was laid to rest with the pomp and pageantry deemed necessary by Sir Jasper to the dignity of the name he bore, the desolate orphan was at once aware that all the love of which he had hitherto been the object throughout the whole of his brief existence, was buried in the grave of his last parent.

It was a frightful moment, and a painful conviction for the boy; it robbed his mind of its freshness, and his heart of his youth. Once he glanced up into the face of his dreaded uncle, but his eye suddenly fell, as in the stern countenance which was half averted from him he read neither sympathy nor grief. Sir Jasper looked, indeed, like a man carved in stone, and the imperturbable composure of his features appeared to mock the mourning cloak in which he was enveloped. There was no encouragement in that marble face; and the glance of the orphan returned to fasten, with even more avidity than before, upon the coffin beside him.

On his way to the church, even the presence of his stern relative had failed to moderate his grief, and he had wept as the young ever weep, with all the violence of despair; but, as the remains of his fond father were lowered out of his sight, a change came over his spirit which was destined to influence his character through life. When he turned to leave the spot where all his affections lay buried, and resumed his place beside Sir Jasper in the mourning coach—his eyes were as dry as though they had never known a tear, and a deep color was burning on his cheeks. A word of kindness, the merest approach to a caress, might have melted the rising bitterness, and crushed the demon that was tugging at his heart; but these were not vouchsafed. The baronet sat coldly and magnificently silent; and the homeward drive was performed without the interchange of a single sentence.

When they reached the Hall, its master alighted, and immediately shut himself into his study; while the bereaved boy, totally overlooked even by the menials about him, in his turn retreated to his solitary room, there to brood alike over the past, the present, and, it may even be, the future. He had heard his uncle, by the death-bed of his last parent, pledge himself not to desert the orphan about to be confided to his compassion; but he remembered with a burning and indignant heart, how tardily and grudgingly that promise had been extorted by the supplications of the dying man. He strove to recall one demonstration of interest or regard toward himself, displayed by his enforced guardian from his childhood to that very hour; but he strove in vain. The motherless infant, the child of tears, who drew his first sustenance from the breast of a stranger, had failed to awaken one feeling of commisseration or sympathy in the heart of Sir Jasper Trevanion. The baronet had tolerated his brother, not only because his own credit in the eyes of his fellow-men forbade that he should suffer that brother to starve; but also because his very imprudence had never tempted him to tarnish the dignity of his family. His marriage had been an act of reckless folly, almost amounting to madness, in the eyes of the fortunate possessor of twelve thousand a year, but still it had entailed no disgrace upon his name; and it was at least satisfactory to be able to present a Lady Catherine Trevanion, to the neighboring squirearchy; a circumstance to which may probably be attributed the fact that, instead of settling a sufficient income upon his less well-portioned brother, which might have enabled him to choose his own place of residence, and to enjoy the modest comforts of his own home, Sir Jasper insisted that the helpless couple should reside under his roof; and accompanied the expression of his will by a declaration that, should they decline to do so, no further assistance need be anticipated from himself.

Such were the circumstances under which Mr. Trevanion and his pretty, silly bride, became the inmates of the paternal mansion; where, as already stated, Sir Jasper had, even after the death of the Lady Katherine, tolerated his brother, partly from duty, and still more, perhaps, from habit; but the boy had been from the first moment of his existence, odious to the selfish and cold-hearted baronet. In the first place his birth had caused the death of his mother, whose lively absurdities, and buoyant spirits, had served to enliven the previous stately dulness of the old Hall; while, superadded to this privation (for the presence and companionship of the lively lady had become necessary to the comfort of the saturnine man), a lurking jealousy nestled at his heart. He—the representative of his family—was childless; while his brother—his penniless and dependent brother, to whom his will was law, and his protection existence—had given an heir to the house of which he was himself the head; while he had not even yet encountered a woman worthy, in his opinion, to share his fortunes.

And thus the boy had grown up beside him, unloved: an object of aversion and avoidance.

And the lad knew and felt this, although he was unable to fathom its cause. He remembered that he had never been addressed by his uncle, save in reproof; that his childish caresses had been repulsed, and his boyish errors visited with merciless chastisement; and bitterly did he writhe beneath the consciousness that he was now hopelessly dependent upon one whom he both disliked and feared.

"What will become of me!" groaned the unhappy orphan, as he paced, alone and unheeded, the floor of his little chamber; "Why could I not have died with my father? Who, in this wide desolate world, cares for me now?"

Well might he ask himself the dreary question.

It was late in the evening before any one appeared to have remembered his existence; and then he was summoned by a servant to the housekeeper's room, in which he was accustomed to take his repasts; but his heart was too full; he required no food; and he said so quietly and briefly.

"Nonsense, Master Hubert;" was the retort of the messenger: "be a man and make up your mind to what can't be mended. Fasting won't bring back the dead."

"I know it;" said the boy; "nor tears; and therefore I have ceased to shed them."

"That is reasonable at all events," replied the man; "so come down at once, if you don't wish to catch a scolding from Mrs. Pearson, for making her wait."

"She need not wait;" said Hubert; "I require nothing more to-night."

And he no sooner found himself once more alone, than he flung himself upon his bed, and resumed his musings.

For an entire month the orphan never once met his uncle; nor, in so far as he could ascertain from the attendants, had Sir Jasper even pronounced his name, or alluded to his existence. He was no longer directed to meet the curate, who had hitherto officiated as his tutor, in the breakfast-room, when it was vacated by his uncle; no longer occupied by daily task-work; but was left at perfect liberty to spend day after day according to his own caprice. And that caprice was a strange one in so young a boy; for, shunning the bright sunshine, and the wholesome avocations of his age, his hours were passed either in the dark recesses of the dense wood which formed the western boundary of the Trevanion property, or in the gothic picture-gallery, among the grim portraits of his ancestors.

One by one he paused before them, and gazed upon each, as intently as though the happiness of his future life depended upon his accurate knowledge of every separate feature; but, more than all, he studied the female portraits—from the stiff and stately dame of far-off centuries to the courtly and sylphic figure of his own mother. While thus engaged, the brow of the silent boy would occasionally flush, and his eye kindle, as he remembered that he, too, was a Trevanion; but the paroxysm of excitement never lasted long, and he soon sank back into his habitual gloom.

Thus had the month gone by; and, in that brief interval, the orphan, abandoned thus absolutely to himself, had ceased to pine either for sympathy or companionship. He came and went like one obeying the impulse of a dream; joyless, tearless, and alone. But he was to be no longer permitted to indulge in this negative happiness; for at the termination of the period named, he was suddenly summoned to the presence of his uncle, and he obeyed the command without the quickening of a single pulse. What had he to fear, or to lose?

"Come in, sir, and close the door behind you;" was the greeting he received; and he had no sooner obeyed the order, than the baronet pursued in a stern tone: "You are now of an age to understand that you can not spend your life in idleness, wandering like a poacher about the woods; or dawdling, like a gaping girl, through the galleries of the Hall. Moreover, your presence here must ere long be importunate, as you will one day comprehend. I supported your father in his uselessness, because he was my brother; but you have no such claim on my forbearance. Nevertheless, as I made to him a promise that I would not abandon you, I have no intention to falsify my word; and I have accordingly sent for you to state that you will, three days hence, be accompanied by one of my servants to the North, where you will remain four years in a school which I have selected, in order to complete your education. At the termination of that period, you will be —or ought to be—competent to uphold with credit to yourself the honor of the name you bear—an honor, young sir, which saved your father from beggary—either in the army or navy; and I give you your choice of either profession."

"I object to both," was the sturdy reply.

"You object!" echoed the baronet, startled into something like emotion by so unlooked-for a rejoinder; "you—a boy of barely twelve years of age—tell me that you shall oppose my pleasure. I say, Hubert Trevanion, that I will be obeyed."

The lad remained silent.

"You do well, sir;" pursued the angry voice; "not to repeat your rebellion. But enough of this. You have heard my decision, and it is immutable. Go and make your preparations, whatever they may be; our interview is at an end."

The orphan needed no second bidding; with a silent bow he left the room; but as he slowly traversed the gallery which led from his uncle's apartments, his clinched hands and heaving chest proclaimed the tempest within. His boyhood was now wholly swept away; the elasticity of his spirit was crushed; he had begun his wrestle with the realities of the world; and a dark, hard feeling, to which his tender age should have been a stranger, was working within him.

CHAPTER II.

UNCLE AND NEPHEW.

THE school to which Hubert Trevanion was conducted by his uncle's serving-man, was by no means calculated to inspire any regret on the boy's part, at his abrupt exodus from his inhospitable home; nor had Sir Jasper neglected to provide him with a wardrobe suitable to his station in life. There had been no leave-taking, it is true, between him and his nephew, but this omission was grateful to the orphan, who had few thanks, and less affection to offer to his repelling kinsman; and yet, nevertheless, as he saw his conductor on his return to the Hall, disappear at the end of the poplar avenue which formed the approach to the house, his heart sank within him, at the conviction that he stood alone among strangers, with whom he had neither feeling nor sympathy in common. He was, however, soon aroused from the somber reverie into which he had fallen by the voice of Dr. Birchmore, the principal of the establishment, by whom he was led into the refectory where his future companions were assembled at supper, and where his own place was assigned to him.

The personal beauty of the boy had interested the feelings of the worthy Doctor who was, moreover, not insensible to the credit which his academy would derive from the circumstance of his numbering among his pupils the nephew and ward of one of the oldest baronets in England; and it was accordingly with the greatest gentleness and indulgence, that he commenced his investigation of the progress of his previous studies. That the result was far from satisfactory, will readily be surmised, so long a time having elapsed since the lad had opened a book, or even bestowed a thought upon the lessons of the reverend divine who had formerly been his preceptor at the Hall; but despite the disappointment which this circumstance induced in the breast of the astonished pedagogue, he was encouraged by the evident intelligence of his young pupil, and his voluntary assurance that no application should be wanting on his own part, to retrieve the lost time.

Nor was it; for Hubert Trevanion had at least arrived at the valuable knowledge that without education, he could never achieve the independence for which he yearned; and ere long his assiduity and talent became the proud theme of the school. Still he was not popular as his silent and somewhat sullen habits disgusted his playmates; nor was it until he had excited a host of enemies, and fought his way manfully through the school, reckless alike of the age or strength of his opponents, that he succeeded in enforcing the respect of those to whom he had refused alike companionship and regard. This accomplished, he was allowed to indulge his own tastes and pursuits in peace; "the baronet," as he was sneeringly designated by the little community, ceasing by degrees to excite either curiosity or anger; and while peals of laughter and shouts of merriment resounded from the playground, he strolled alone and unheeded under the trees by which it was bounded, or flung himself down in some shady nook to study and reflect at ease.

Thus he made no friends, nor did he need them; and for all companionship he sought only the society of the ushers, three of whom being foreigners, he rapidly acquired the modern languages, and a certain acquaintance with the habits and feelings of other countries. And so the four years wore on. As, during the vacations, he was the only pupil left at the establishment, the portly doctor and his precise but kind-hearted wife, in their turn abandoned the classic shade of their academic home, in order to visit their respective families; and Hubert Trevanion was, to his infinite gratification, consigned to the sole guardianship of the German master, who, being as friendless as himself, had known no other home than that of Dr. Birchmore for many long and laborious years.

Simple and sincere, Herr Hauffman was as very a child in heart as the youngest of his class; but he was, nevertheless, a man of deep and varied information, and possessed of considerable skill in imparting the knowledge he had acquired. No companion could, therefore, have been more acceptable to the self-centered and eager Hubert, who, while his more fortunate comrades were reveling in the delights of family ties and paternal indulgence, was storing his mind hour by hour, and feeling his intellect expand without almost an effort.

How brief appeared to him those weeks of tranquil and undisturbed existence! and how heartily did he sympathize in the regrets expressed by his fellow pupils on their return to their old toils, and their old duties; for then, once more, he too was compelled to resume the monotonous routine of the classes, and to spend hours poring over the more abstruse branches of education for which he had no taste, and in which he felt no interest. The dead languages, the Latin verses, and the dull lore of buried ages, so dear to the scholar, and so soon to be forgotten by the busy, active, ambitious citizen of the day, were alike wearisome to him; the mind of the boy had already foreshadowed the future career of the man; and, while he grasped at every species of knowledge which might tend to his advancement in society, he gave but reluctant attention to that which could only be profitable in the closet.

Thus, when he at length terminated his scholastic career, Hubert Trevanion was declared to be the most accomplished linguist and the best mathematician who had ever quitted the establishment; while it was with regret that the principal found himself compelled to temper his approbation by the admission that he was, on the other hand, very deficient in that classic lore, so essential, as the Doctor sententiously observed, to the elevated station in life which he would soon be called upon to fill. On the whole, however, the indulgent pedagogue confessed himself proud of his pupil; while the gentle and kind-hearted Herr Hauffman parted from him with tears of unfeigned regret.

On his arrival at the Hall, the orphan at once discovered the motive which had impelled his uncle to declare that his residence there had ceased to be desirable; when, as he crossed the threshold of the drawing-room, he saw a lady seated in the deep bay of the western window, busily engaged at a tapestry frame, while three spaniels were lying upon their several cushions near her chair; who no sooner, however, became aware of his presence than they rushed upon him open-mouthed, as if to resent his intrusion.

"For shame, Flora; be quiet, Dash; come here instantly, Fido;" expostulated their mistress, as the tall, handsome lad calmly made his way toward her, regardless of the uproar; "I am really ashamed of you! Do not be afraid, Mr. Hubert; the dear pets never bite, it is merely noise."

"I am by no means alarmed, madam," was the quiet reply; "and am sorry that I have been the innocent cause of creating such a disturbance, by intruding myself upon you so abruptly; but I am informed that I should find Sir Jasper Trevanion in this apartment."

"Sir Jasper," rejoined the lady, without rising from her seat, "is, I believe, in the library —Flora, leave those wools alone; you will choke yourself, darling. Do you particularly wish to see Sir Jasper, Mr. Hubert?—or can I communicate to him what you desire to say?"

"As you please, madam," said the orphan, bitterly; "I merely intended to inform him that, according to his orders, I have returned to Trevanion Hall."

"In that case, he need not be disturbed, as that is a matter of course. You will, I believe, find your old room prepared for you; at least, I gave orders to that effect to my housekeeper."

"I am obliged to you, madam, and shall at once avail myself of your attention."

"But, before you leave me, Mr. Hubert, it will be as well to mention that henceforth, whatever you may require, you must apply to myself. I have undertaken to relieve Sir Jasper from all unnecessary trouble and exertion; and it will therefore be quite useless to make any appeal to him."

"I have no inclination to do so, madam."

"You are right, for it would be of no avail; and now that we understand each other, I will not detain you longer." A cold bend of the head, and a glance toward the door of the apartment, followed her words; and amid another storm of yelping and barking, Hubert withdrew from the presence of his new aunt.

A marvelous change had indeed come over the old Hall. The man of marble had become plastic as wax beneath the firm and determined will of a stronger mind than his own. The arrogant head was bowed; the haughty spirit lowered.

Within six months of his brother's death, Sir Jasper Trevanion had married the wealthy widow of an Indian Nabob, who had returned to England, with a colossal fortune, and an exhausted constitution, only to die and make way for his successor. Lady Trevanion had been a beauty, and was still a fine woman; but the long habit of command had rendered her imperious, self-willed, and despotic; while the consciousness of her enormous wealth had indued her with an arrogance which would have sat ungracefully even upon a duchess, and which the remembrance of her obscure origin (for the well-dowered bride of the high-born Sir Jasper could not trace back her lineage beyond the last generation), had altogether failed to diminish. The cold and haughty representative of the Trevanions had been dazzled by her magnificence, and captivated by her person; while the lady herself, with that yearning for a title which is one of the most potent weaknesses of a vulgar mind, after some hesitation, had consented to bestow herself and rupees upon the man whose greatest pride had hitherto centered upon the antiquity of his race.

Pompous was the display made at the marriage. The country journals had appropriated whole columns to the display of the magnificent rejoicings consequent upon the event. All the county had left cards at the Hall; and all the gossips had been busy with the diamonds and cashmeres of the bride; but it was not long ere the baronet himself discovered that the rod by which he was henceforth to be ruled, however thickly gilded, was not the less a rod of iron. The man of marble had found a mate of steel; the contest was an unequal one; for while the nature of the husband was too haughty for contention, that of the wife was too overbearing for concession; and thus, by the time that the happy couple were thoroughly established under their own roof, the question of supremacy was decided; and Lady Trevanion, whose accumulated thousands remained under her exclusive control, reigned undisputed mistress of the establishment.

All these circumstances were soon made known to Hubert by the indignant Mrs. Pearson; who, accustomed for half a life-time to the lofty carelessness of her aristocratic master, and the negative rule of the trifling Lady Katherine (whom, in imitation of Sir Jasper, she reverenced for her high birth), could ill brook the uncompromising sway of the new mistress of the mansion; "A nobody;" as she emphatically declared; "whose name would never have been seen in print had she not cast her spell over the proudest race in the land. However, Master Hubert," she continued exultingly, "it is only for a time, and you must have patience; you will be Sir Hubert Trevanion yet, as all the old servants hope and desire. You have good blood in you on both sides; and what should be, will be. Your uncle, poor dear man! married for an heir—he had better have contented himself with the one that Providence had already provided for him—and you see what has come of it. Here is my lady, three years a wife, and not yet a mother; nor ever likely to be, it's my notion. There's no end to her money, they say; but it's little good it is to us while Sir Jasper has not the handling of it. However, as I have heard that she has no relations that she cares to own, because she does n't dare to introduce them to her new connections, it may one day be yours, and you may be a great man yet."

"Without her help, I trust, my good Pearson," replied the boy, as the blood mantled over his brow.

"With all my heart: without her help, till she sees and feels that you do not need it, and then it will be given less grudgingly; but until that day comes, it is weary work here, Master Hubert. The only comfort we have now, Tomkins the butler, and I, and Sir Jasper's man, is to talk over old times; and often and often do we remember the days when we let you wander about, sad and lonely, and wished you away, that the sight of you might n't anger and worry our poor master, little thinking what was to come next! But that's all over now; and it's you we look to when we hope for better times. You have n't been to the picture-gallery yet? Well, don't go; for there you'll find my lady, full length, covered with precious stones, and with all her horrid dogs about her, hanging side by side with your own dear mother, who was a lady, and had always a kind word and a merry smile for every one about her. Don't go, Master Hubert; it will make your very heart ache."

"I will not," said the lad, bitterly.

"You 're not here for long, I take it," pursued the garrulous old woman; "for my lady can't abide your name, and wanted Sir Jasper to send you straight off to sea from school."

"I am not going to sea," said the youth, resolutely.

"Not going to sea! Why there 's a vesse bound for the Indies all ready to take you o board; my lady has made up her mind."

"And so have I," was the calm rejoinder.

"Then mercy deliver us!" exclaimed hi companion; "for we shall have such a storm in the old Hall as it has not seen for many a day But I'm glad to hear you say so, for all that I hate such kidnapping work. Sending you t sea, in the hope that you'll be drowned, or ship wrecked, or cast ashore, or something of the sort, and never heard of again; and all be cause she 's jealous of you."

"She has little cause to be so," said the o phan, sadly.

"I don't know that, Mr. Hubert," replied th housekeeper significantly. "It ain't so plea ant, after all, for a woman of that stamp, wh has nothing to be proud of but her gold, to se a fine young fellow like you ready to tear th lining out of her money-bags; and she witho chick or child of her own to stop you. N no; it can't be pleasant, and that 's the tru of it; for, as sure as my name 's Margare many and many 's the prayer that her prou ladyship has put up to have a young baron of her own; but no one prayed with her, I 'm a nation; not even Sir Jasper himself, wh poor, dear man, has had enough of her race r ready, if I don't mistake. Once on a time, fi two years back, she had a notion of some such thing, and a pretty fuss there was at the Hall, I can tell you; but it came to nothing, as might have been expected. A young baronet, indeed! Just as if baronets were made of such stuff as that!"

And Mrs. Pearson curled her lip, as though the very idea of such a catastrophe was too ridiculous to be entertained for a moment.

"And my uncle—Sir Jasper?"—said the boy; "how comes it that his proud spirit submits so tamely to her despotism?"

"Ay, there it is," responded the old lady; "that's what puzzles us all—man, woman, and child. You know, Master Hubert, that there was n't a prouder nor a sterner man than Sir Jasper for miles around. At home or abroad, he was always the same; caring neither for lords nor squires, but bearing himself, as he had every right to do, as the head of one of the ancientest families in England—and now look at him! Never does he venture to say 'ay,' when my lady sees fit to say 'nay;' and there he sits for hours shut up alone in his library, doing of nothing—she takes good care of that—but poring over a parcel of moldy old books that had been quiet enough upon the shelves for years, while she overlooks the steward's accounts, and arranges the house expenses, and receives the rents—ay, and raises them too whenever she is so minded, as though she had been a born Trevanion, a lady in her own right, and had married a beggar who had n't a word to say in any thing."

"My uncle must be strangely changed"—observed Hubert moodily.

"Right enough, my dear boy; he is strangely changed—body and mind too. And oh, Master Hubert;" continued the faithful old servant, as large tears swelled in her eyes; "we sometimes fear—Mr. Tomkins and I—that the poor dear gentleman may not be able to hold out against it; and should he go, what would become of the old Hall, and of all of us?"

"You would have me for a master," said the lad, with a kindling eye.

"Ay, but the widow—the widow would be left, you know; and she would keep you out of your own while she could."

The boy smiled scornfully.

"At all events she would take care of her money;" persisted the housekeeper; "you would see none of that. There are other husbands to be bought besides Sir Jasper—and then he will have suffered all this for nothing."

"He has, in any case, no one to blame but himself," was the sententious reply.

"That's true enough, too, Master Hubert;" said his companion; "but our mistakes are none the more easy to bear because we find them out too late. What 's done, can't be undone; and here we are, the laughing-stock of all the country, for what I know to the contrary—my honored master and all."

"Is it intended, do you know, Mrs. Pearson, that I should see Sir Jasper during my stay?"

"Perhaps yes, perhaps no;" replied the old dame, oracularly; "all will depend upon how my lady takes to you; and you will have hard cards to play, I can tell you."

"I shall play none."

"Well, Master Hubert, we shall see. Them that live longest, see most; but you must not forget that all will depend upon her ladyship."

"I never shall."

"Why bless the lad, what can you do of yourself? You are but a young thing yet, and have no one to look to but her."

"I am at least old enough," said Hubert with a touch of his uncle's haughtiness, "to revolt against tyranny. I would not submit to it from my father's brother; I shall assuredly defy it in the person of my uncle's wife."

"It will be of no use," sighed Mrs. Pearson; "Sir Jasper tried it, you may be sure, and you see how the struggle ended. Take an old woman's advice, Master Hubert; keep well with my lady; don't contradict her, but let her have every thing her own way; it will only be for a time."

"I thank you for your good-will, my old friend," said the orphan, "but I will make no such promise. Ha! there goes the dressing-bell; and now I shall soon be made aware whether I am to be honored with a seat at my uncle's table, or consigned once more to your kindness."

CHAPTER III

A DEPARTURE.

STRANGE, and even affecting, was the meeting between the uncle and nephew in the spacious and lordly dining-room of the old Hall, as, having received no warming to the contrary, Hubert Trevanion calmly passed the threshold, and advanced to greet its master. Cold indeed was Sir Jasper still, but he was no longer stern; and the stripling detected in his eye a yearning which he had never before seen there, as, for the first time, their hands met; but nevertheless no word of tenderness accompanied the look which lingered on his countenance for a moment, and then melted away; he asked no question—he betrayed no interest in his young relative; but languidly resumed his seat, as though he had done all that could be required of him, and eschewed further responsibility.

Lady Trevanion, in all the splendor of a parvenue, had already taken the head of her table, whence she glanced at her unwelcome guest with a haughty eye and a lowering brow, as though she already recognized in the calm, self-dependent youth, a formidable antagonist; and thus the meal commenced in comfortless and threatening silence. The servants moved noiselessly over the costly carpet, and performed their duties with the quiet vigilance of well-tutored automatons; the successive courses were served and disappeared—and Hubert remarked that, while his uncle ate sparingly and in silence, the lady of the mansion partook largely of the luxuries before her, although constantly evincing displeasure, and affecting to cavil at their quality. At length the cheerless repast came to a close; the dessert was placed upon the table, and the servants withdrew, evidently to the discomfort of Sir Jasper, who, although still silent, betrayed a fidgetiness wholly at variance with the calm self-centered manner for which he had formerly been so conspicuous; while Hubert, who had nerved himself for every contingency, remained impassive, coldly awaiting the pleasure of his companions.

As he had anticipated, it was the lady who took the initiative. "I presume, Mr. Hubert Trevanion," she said, superciliously, as she carefully arranged an emerald bracelet by which her left arm was encircled, "that you do not anticipate a long sojourn under the roof of your uncle?"

"I leave its term in my uncle's hands, madam."

Lady Trevanion smiled, but it was not a pleasant smile; it said, as plainly as any words could have done, that Sir Jasper was no longer omnipotent in his own house; "Down, Fido; Have I not yet taught you that I will be obeyed? For shame, to set so bad an example. You do right, young sir"—she was now speaking to her husband's nephew—"to disclaim any will of your own in such a case, as it saves trouble to all parties, Sir Jasper having made up his mind upon the subject. You have already been a great expense to him; a very great expense; and although, so long as he remained a bachelor, he was, of course, at liberty to dispose of his property as he saw fit, he has now other duties to perform, and he is prepared to act accordingly. Not," pursued her ladyship, with ill-bred eagerness, "that his marriage with me has impoverished him—far from it—very far from it—but he, like myself, is weary of dependents. He bore with your father as a duty, and with your mother as your father's wife; and with you, while you were still a child; all very right and commendable, no doubt—I do not mean to reproach him. I would have done as much for my own relations, had they required it."

"It was fortunate alike for them and for yourself, that you had none, madam," was the composed reply of the lad, as he remembered the tale so lately told to him by his humble friend in the housekeeper's room.

The lady flushed crimson. The first stone had been flung, and had hit its mark; but, like an able general, she scorned to acknowledge, or even to recognize the check, and, with a still more bitter smile, she continued:

"Your father, Mr. Hubert Trevanion, was, as I have heard, a mere inane and indolent man of fashion, and your mother the penniless daughter of a peer—poverty wedded to helplessness; but that was not your fault, my poor boy; and be assured that neither Sir Jasper nor I mean to upbraid you with it."

"I can believe so, madam," said the orphan, calmly meeting the hard eye which was fastened upon him, "and even had it been otherwise, I should have felt no shame in hearing myself rebuked on such a subject. Dependent as I may be, for the moment, I can proudly trace my descent for centuries on both sides; and feel richer in my apparent poverty with such a consciousness, than had I been born to inherit thousands, bequeathed to me by accident, and of which I should feel ashamed to trace the source."

"Sir Jasper Trevanion, am I to be insulted in my own house by a stripling?" demanded the lady, vehemently.

"Hubert, you forget yourself," gasped out the baronet.

"In what way, sir?" asked the lad, coldly; "I have but given utterance to feelings which you can not do otherwise than respect. You, the descendent of a long line of ancestors, will surely understand my reverence for high birth, and sympathize in my contempt for wealth which has no illustration less plebeian than its own vileness."

"Sir Jasper," exclaimed his wife, passionately, "this boy shall not remain another hour under my roof. Hark ye, young sir, I nurse no vipers in my bosom. You know best by whom you have been tutored; and were it not that you bear your uncle's name, I would cast you off, to learn the worship which the world will pay to your high birth and proud descent without a penny to enforce your claim. As it is—"

"I ask nothing of you, madam," said Hubert, as he rose from his seat; "I do not recognize either your power or your authority. I am the son of your husband's brother—the last of the race of Trevanion; and should its present representative see fit to deny me his protection and support, I must abide by his decision—but I acknowledge no will save his—I will abide by no desertion save his own."

"Do you dare to brave me, Hubert Trevanion?"

"I have no such desire, madam. I simply question your right to decide my destiny."

"You are wrong, Hubert—very wrong," interposed the baronet, evidently quailing beneath the anger of his wife; "you owe alike obedience and respect to Lady Trevanion."

"I am ever ready to render both, sir, where they are due;" said the orphan, with deep emotion; "but I appeal to yourself whether I have been met by her ladyship in a manner to induce either? She, probably, thinks merely of my age, and regards me as a child bound only to do her bidding; but she can know little of my boyhood when she so argues; and you, Sir Jasper—you who received me from the hands of an indulgent and dying father—you, at least, may convince her of her mistake. From the hour in which I lost my last parent I ceased to be a child, and grew, not so much by time as by trial. I had no youth, but sprang at once from the boy into the man. There were no home affections, no heart yearnings, to fling back my feelings upon others; I was alone—coldly, cheerlessly, frightfully alone—left to combat with my own passions, and failings, and necessities—given over to the purchased care of strangers—abandoned to the narrow sympathies of hired teachers, and uncongenial associates. You, at least, can utter no reproach, for I am but what you yourself have made me."

"And this, then;" exclaimed the lady, with a reproachful glance at her husband; "this is the boy of sixteen who was to bow to my will, and to know no pleasure but my own. Upon my word, Sir Jasper, I must compliment you upon your discrimination, and upon the admirable method in which you have reared your brother's son."

"We have been separated for four years," said the baronet, deprecatingly.

"And will do well to separate once more for a longer period;" observed Lady Trevanion.

as she rose in her turn; "at all events, Sir Jasper, you have only to choose between your nephew and your wife; for this young gentleman shall assuredly not remain under the same roof as myself."

"You know, my dear, that the vessel will sail within a fortnight," urged the master of the house.

"Until which period Mr. Hubert must be accommodated with a home elsewhere," was the haughty rejoinder.

"Pardon me, sir;" interposed the youth firmly; "but, if I just now understood your meaning you have it in contemplation to send me out of the country?"

"You are provided for," said the baronet nervously; "Lady Trevanion has procured for you a midshipman's berth on board an Indiaman which is shortly to sail; and has also had the kindness to interest in your favor some of her very influential connections in that country."

"Her ladyship does me honor," replied Hubert, bowing profoundly; "but I have no intention to embrace such a career, and no inclination to enter life under such auspices."

"Better and better!" sneered the irate lady; "and you will, perhaps, be so obliging as to inform Sir Jasper and myself of the precise nature of your future projects."

"Willingly, madam; I had already expressed my utter aversion to both services, and stated this distinctly to Sir Jasper, years ago—nor have I seen any cause to alter my decision. That I should not have the alternative of the learned professions, the nature of my education sufficiently evinced; and I have consequently left no effort untried to fit myself for the only honorable career, which was left open to me."

"And pray what may that be?"

"Commerce, madam. I aspire to the respected name of an upright English merchant."

"Trade, sir!" exclaimed the baronet, thoroughly aroused from his apathy; "am I to understand that you would degrade the presumptive heir of the Trevanions into a trader?"

"Such is, in fact, my purpose."

"You are a disgrace to your name, young man," said the lady, loftily.

"I regret, madam, that you should be involved in that disgrace," was the reply.

"I will not give you a shilling if you persist in such degradation," gasped the baronet.

"I ask nothing," said the lad, although his heart quailed for a moment; "I am informed by a letter which was placed in my hands by my father on his death-bed, that I inherit certain jewels once belonging to my mother; and I will owe my existence to her bequest. I know not that I could apply it to a more pious purpose."

"They shall be delivered to you," said Sir Jasper, coldly.

"A diamond mine, no doubt!" sneered Lady Trevanion, as she glanced at herself in a mirror; "one, however, which will be little missed, and may well be spared. I presume, Sir Jasper, that the young gentleman may at once take possession of his inheritance, and leave the Hall?"

"One moment"—faltered the baronet; "only one moment. You are mad, Hubert, thus to brave your family. Remember that you have no other home."

"Home, sir!" echoed the stripling. "I have never known a home—I can never hope for one, until I have earned it; and until I have done so, I must be content to find a resting-place among strangers."

"You talk like a child. Without means you can not make your way—and though revolted by your disobedience, I will not turn you adrift upon the world to starve. You do not even know in what direction to bend your steps."

"Pardon me, sir; I shall proceed immediately to London, where I shall dispose of my poor mother's jewels; and thence I shall at once make my way to Germany."

"And why to Germany?"

"Because I am assured of a welcome in the family of a firm, though humble friend, to whom I owe much more than I can ever repay; and, even should I fail to realize the hope which has been held out to me of a successful career in that country, the blessing of a welcome under any roof will amply repay me for subsequent disappointment."

"May I venture to inquire the name of this valuable friend?" again demanded the baronet.

"Certainly. It is Herr Hauffman, the German professor at Dr. Birchmore's."

"An usher!" interposed Lady Trevanion, with a bitter laugh.

"Even so, madam, if you prefer the term. An humble usher, who has long been to me a brother and a friend. A man who has coined his mind into wages, and nerved his heart to receive thankfully the salary won by his talents. I am proud of the regard which he has bestowed on me."

"You are lost, Hubert Trevanion!" groaned Sir Jasper. "It should have sufficed, young man, that you were born under this roof, to have preserved you from such groveling companionships as these."

"Groveling indeed!" echoed the lady, sarcastically; "and now, Sir Jasper, have you heard enough? or are we to pass the evening in listening to the revelations of your hopeful nephew? Surely there need be no more waste of words upon the subject. The young man has formed connections for himself more desirable in his eyes than those which he rejects; and I see no reason why you should not leave him at liberty to cultivate them."

"You forget, Lady Trevanion, that he is the last of his race."

"I forget nothing, sir;" was the sharp reply; "except that I have been insulted in your presence by one of your own blood, and that you have not deigned to chastise the offender."

"His only fitting punishment will be immediate exile from the home of his ancestors;" said Sir Jasper; but his lip quivered as the childless man suddenly remembered that he was, in order to conciliate his offended wife, about to banish, probably forever, not only his brother's son, but what to his selfish nature was infinitely more sacred, his own presumptive heir and successor. What might be the fate of the lad, thus cast forth into a cold and heartless world by his natural protectors? Struggle and hardship, contumely, and—it might even be—shame and death!

A clammy dew started to the brow of the baronet, and his head sank upon his breast, as his glance passed rapidly from the placid and proud countenance of the silent stripling, whose sense of wrong was too powerful to relieve itself by any outward emotion, to the exulting face of his inexorable wife, who with her tall figure rigidly erect, and her dark cheek flushed with passion, seemed to await the termination of the scene without one misgiving of its result.

No further opposition, as she at once felt, need be dreaded from Sir Jasper upon any point, when she had secured this victory over his young kinsman; and thenceforward the desolate man would be totally dependent upon herself for sympathy and companionship.

The same idea had, however, flashed dark and threatening on the mind of the baronet. Should Hubert, indignant at his desertion, refuse all further communication with his family, the ancient race would become extinct, and the name of Trevanion fall into oblivion. Sir Jasper felt that he must temporise with the youth, even at the risk of exciting the wrath of his wife; and, acting upon this conviction, he turned resolutely toward him, and crushing down alike his haughtiness and the vague terror which had grown upon him, he said sternly: "You have heard my decision, sir?"

"I have."

"Henceforth, then, you will possess the control over your own career which you appear to covet. The world is before you, and you must struggle with it as you can. Do not, however, imagine that I have so utterly lost sight of my own dignity as to permit you to go hence without the means of support necessary to uphold, in some degree, the honor of the name you bear—or, better still, if you will favor me by relinquishing that name until you have ceased to disgrace it—to enable you to give some show of respectability to the one which you may see fit to assume."

"I have no intention to resign the name of my father, Sir Jasper Trevanion."

"Perhaps if I propose to you, in the event of this concession, to increase the provision I have offered, you may be induced to change your mind."

"By no means; for while conscious that I am not in a position to reject your offer, I beg you distinctly to understand that I accept it as the son of Aubrey Trevanion, and not as your nephew."

"Then, sir, you shall be authorized to draw upon my banker for two hundred pounds annually, on condition that you inform him of your place of residence."

"I admit no conditions."

"Do not insist, Sir Jasper;" interposed Lady Trevanion; "if you are indeed prepared to commit so great a weakness as to reward this estimable young man for his disobedience, be it so; but pray do not descend to ask as a favor what you have every authority to enforce as a right."

"Then our conference is ended," murmured the baronet. "My steward shall communicate to you the address of my banker in town, Mr. Trevanion; and you are at liberty to leave my house at any moment when you may find it convenient."

"I would beg to suggest an early one," said the lady, as with a lofty bow she swept from the apartment.

The uncle and the nephew were alone; only a few paces separated them; and for an instant they stood gazing earnestly at each other. The heavy breathing of the agitated baronet was audible amid the silence, and Hubert almost pitied him, as he witnessed the violence of the struggle which shook his frame. For the first time his heart yearned toward the weak and spirit-bowed man, whom he remembered so stern of purpose, and so haughty of demeanor, but it was only for an instant, for, ere long, resentment swallowed up compassion, and contempt usurped the place of pity.

"Have you any further commands for me, Sir Jasper?" he asked, as he prepared to leave the room.

"None, sir, none. All is over between us."

And with a cold and distant salutation, the uncle and nephew parted forever as both believed in this world.

CHAPTER IV.

HUSBAND AND FATHER.

All was indeed over! And Hubert Trevanion, in his sixteenth year, stood alone in a world where the battle is too often to the strong, and the race to the swift. It is scarcely wonderful that after his uncle had left him, he should gaze around upon the once familiar features of his childhood's home with a strange sinking of the heart. The last hour had decided his destiny; he had returned to the halls of his ancestors only for one brief day, and he was once more about to abandon them for ever. But he soon subdued the emotion which this consciousness had called up; for, from what was he, in fact, about to separate himself? From mere inanimate objects which could be dear only from association, and which would remain unchanged, whatever might be the vicissitudes of his own fortune. No tear would fall for him—no heart regret him—no wholesome human sympathy be awakened either by his struggles or his success; he was an alien from the home of his fathers, and he must go forth to seek another, and forget what might have been, in what was.

And thus he did go forth, after a warm leave-taking with the old servants, who wept when they wrung his hand, and could not control their sorrow as they saw that his own eyes were tearless.

"It is not because you do not feel, I know that;" sobbed the soft-hearted Mrs. Pearson; "I don't like the wild strange light in your eyes, and I would sooner a thousand times.

see you cry like a child, than seem so cold and placid. It is n't natural, Master Hubert."

"Nothing is natural under this roof, my good old friend," replied the youth with a ghastly smile; "neither my uncle's supineness, nor his wife's tyranny, nor my own exile —nothing is natural, save, indeed, the kind hearts which are now throbbing about me. But I see that the chaise is ready, and I shall scarcely reach the post-town in time for the mail, so now, and perhaps forever, farewell! I need not ask you to remember me, for I feel sure that you will do so." And once more grasping the hands of the excited domestics, Hubert turned away; after having, with a mockery of courteousness born of the bitterness of his spirit, deposited his leave-taking cards upon the hall-table; and springing into the hired vehicle which awaited him, he drove rapidly from the splendid mansion which was no longer to be his home.

In accordance with the resolution that he had expressed to his uncle, the young adventurer at once proceeded to Germany, where he ultimately succeeded in obtaining a situation in a substantial house of business, through the good offices of the family of Herr Hauffman. Years passed on; and the knowledge which he had acquired of the different European languages served him well with his employers, by whom he was gradually intrusted with the whole of their foreign correspondence, and to whom his services ultimately became so indispensable, that he was received into the firm, and became the head of their London establishment. Here, as may have been already gathered from the conversation with which our tale commences, he had contracted a marriage with the daughter and heiress of a wealthy merchant; not without a certain repugnance consequent upon that pride of birth which he had never ceased to feel, but without hesitation, as the most rapid means of securing the independence which he had sworn to achieve.

Mrs. Trevanion was a weak, half-educated, quasi-fine lady, who had passed her life between the fashionable establishment where she had received her education, and her father's villa at Richmond. She had early lost her mother, and was petted and indulged accordingly. Before she had attained her eighteenth year, she had exhausted every circulating library within her reach, could paint flowers, work crochet, and "perform" on the piano. Small in stature, and slight in figure, there was nevertheless a grace and prettiness about her, which easily induced a casual observer to forgive the expressionless character of her face, with its abundant screen of pale, yellow hair, and its light and prominent blue eyes, in favor of an exquisite complexion, and a peculiarly pleasing smile. Hers was, in short, a style of beauty which resembled a clever, but incomplete sketch, without sufficient coloring to give it character, and which, place it in whatever light you would, never satisfied the eye, or thoroughly defined itself.

The morale of Miss Rotheringbury was in perfect accordance with her physique. She had passionate impulses; what spoiled child has not? but she did not possess sufficient strength of purpose to carry out her will. Timid by nature, she was easily overawed; and while she indulged herself freely in tyrannizing over those who readily yielded to her pleasure, she was cowed by a look from any individual who was bold enough to oppose her.

Such was the bride whom Hubert Trevanion, without much difficulty, wooed and won. His worldly position and commercial ability were satisfactory to the lady's father; while the lady herself, fascinated by his handsome person (which recalled at once her ideal of half-a-dozen of her favorite novel-heros), and dazzled by the hope of a some-day reconciliation with the stately baronet and his jewel-laden wife, and a possible sojourn in the ancestral home of her high-born lover, with the self-mystification common to young and unreflecting girls, who mistake the captivation of their fancy for a nobler and better feeling, saw only a proper sense of dignity in the unbending coldness of her betrothed husband; and had learned, long ere he led her radiant in Brussels-lace and orange-blossom to the altar, to defer to all his wishes, and to bend before his will, as entirely as if thenceforward she was to be a mere puppet in his hands.

And such in truth she proved, after one or two abortive struggles at supremacy, which only tended to rivet her chains still closer, by affording to her impassive husband an additional opportunity of enforcing upon her conviction her utter incapacity of self-government. To every appeal he replied by reminding her of her past violence, expatiating upon its extreme ill-breeding, and pointing out to her the necessity, now that she had become the wife of a man of family and station, of some effort on her part to prove herself equal to the position she had attained. For a time the poor girl pouted and grew sullen as she listened to these inferences of her inferiority, and received perpetual warnings to abstain from certain habits and expressions, which, as Mr. Trevanion coolly informed her, were totally incompatible with high breeding, and could not be tolerated in his wife; and at others she wept over herself as she remembered that, until the hour in which she became such, no words of blame had ever reached her ear. She was so miserably alone too: for with the exception of her father and the maiden sister who presided over his establishment, her fastidious lord would admit none of her former associates beneath his roof.

"You are now in a responsible position, Mrs. Trevanion," was his reply, as she endeavored to expostulate against the exclusion of her two favorite cousins; "and must learn to suffice to yourself."

The struggle was soon over. The total want of moral courage evinced by his wife, while it excited the contempt of Mr. Trevanion, admirably seconded his views; and when the violent grief of his victim at the sudden death of her father occasioned the premature birth of her expected infant, and stretched her for months upon a bed of sickness, he at once felt that he had no further opposition to apprehend. Enchanted with the lovely little girl, which throve upon the bosom of a stranger while its childish mother was still a helpless invalid, Mrs. Trevanion neither sought nor wished for other companionship. She watched with pleased and puerile curiosity all the details of the nursery; and was never weary of wondering at the astounding fact that she was herself the mother of the rosy smiling little creature before her—that it was her own—that it already knew her, almost as much as her nurse; and would stretch forth its little hands toward her, and crow with delight as it looked into her face.

It is true that there had been one drawback even to this innocent and natural felicity; and that one, as we need scarcely say, came from her husband, who, while occupied with the men of law in the settlement of Mr. Rotheringbury's affairs, had been summoned to the bedside of his suffering wife, whence, with childish eagerness, she directed his attention to her new treasure.

"Ha!" was the cold remark of the gentleman; "so you have given me a daughter, Clara. I anticipated as much. And now, take care of yourself, and you may yet one day make me the father of a boy."

He did, it is true, stoop down and kiss her pale cheek, but he turned no second glance upon the infant; and, in compliance with a hint from the nurse, he immediately afterward left the sick room.

Ere the recovery of Mrs. Trevanion was complete, her noble fortune had almost wholly passed into the hands of her husband; the villa at Richmond had become her own property; and the weak but well-meaning old aunt by whom she had been brought up had returned to Cumberland, anxious to end her days under the same roof which had witnessed her birth. Her other relations had, as we have already stated, long ceased to find a welcome in the house of Mr. Trevanion, and, in consequence, gradually forbore their visits; and thus the young wife was thrown entirely upon her husband for society.

Under these circumstances, nothing could be more natural than that as her grief for the loss of her father insensibly wore away, her whole happiness centered in her child, whose extreme loveliness soon won for it a deep affection, even in the heart of its greatly disappointed father; while, as years went by without any addition to his family, Mr. Trevanion at length brought himself to believe that the one-despised little girl might one day even better serve his ambition than the son for which he had so fondly hoped.

At the period of the infant's birth he had been sanguine in his belief that it would some day bear the title, and sustain the honors of his house, and his mortification at its sex was consequently deep and bitter; but when, a year or two subsequently, he ascertained that Lady Trevanion had, contrary to all expectation, become the mother of a son, his dream vanished; and he forthwith resolved to rear his daughter in such refinement as should, combined with her extraordinary beauty and noble fortune, render her a fitting bride for the proudest noble in the land.

Thus, as the child emerged from infancy into girlhood, she was placed under the immediate charge of a decayed lady of rank, to whom the luxurious home of the wealthy and high-bred merchant offered a welcome refuge from the cares and privations to which she must otherwise have been exposed; and surrounded by the most eminent masters, whose services were requited with unbounded liberality, and rendered with equal zeal. No interference was permitted on the part of Mrs. Trevanion, who had long before this period become so passive under the authority of her husband, that she uttered no remonstrance; and, finally, satisfied by the affection of the loving girl, whose tenderness suffered no abatement even under these unpromising circumstances, she ceased to assert the slightest wish to control or guide her actions.

Lady Mary Brookland was the ruling spirit of the house; and while Mrs. Trevanion lounged on her sofa engaged upon a novel, or took her solitary drive, the young heiress, accompanied by her high-born monitress, was introduced to the gayeties of London life; frequented the opera, the parks, and the public gardens; and, thanks to the able chaperonage of the accomplished woman of fashion, soon became a marked object of attraction in that sphere in which her father was anxious that she should move.

In due course of time the lovely Miss Trevanion was presented at court by her obliging friend Lady Mary, and welcomed to the intimacy of her aristocratic connections. Her great beauty and splendid expectations were sedulously whispered abroad; her extraordinary accomplishments and refinement of manner were the theme of general admiration; and, before she had attained her twentieth year, more than one highly-descended suitor had become a candidate for her hand.

The exultation of Mr. Trevanion was great, although perfectly undemonstrative; he felt as if, through his daughter, he was resuming his legitimate place in society; and already looked forward to the coronet which was to adorn her brow as the reward of his own humiliation and struggle. As his thoughts occasionally glanced to Sir Jasper and his heir, his lip curled rather with pride than resentment. He should yet teach them that he could win an illustration for which he was indebted solely to himself, and which was independent of their influence.

Under such circumstances as these, it does not require to be explained that Lady Mary Brookland gradually became all-powerful in the merchant's house. He had, as we have already shown, from the very period of his marriage, discountenanced the associates, as well as the family of his wife; and as his daughter grew to womanhood they were slowly and almost imperceptibly replaced by those of his aristocratic inmate, who was by no means averse to indulge her high-born but far from affluent nieces and cousins by a participation in the luxuries of her new home. First, it was the Honorable Miss Stapleton, who, at the entreaty of her aunt, consented to pass a month with her interesting charge, and to accompany her to exhibitions, and picture galleries; to appear in her opera-box, and to share in her riding excursions; then it was the charming widow of Sir John Snowdon, whose son and heir being at Eton, rendered it peculiarly desirable that his fond and anxious mother should occasionally reside in town for a few weeks, in order to assure herself more satisfactorily of his health and progress than she could possibly do in her Highland castle; and on the occasion of these gratifying visits, flocks of noble ladies availed themselves of the opportunity to welcome them to the metropolis, and to make the acquaintance of the charming Miss Trevanion, who formed so attractive a feature in the fashionable fêtes of the season.

The beautiful Richmond villa soon became immensely popular with the beau monde, who were enchanted with the déjeûners dansants and matinés musicales provided for their amusement; and who, as they strolled over the velvet lawns and flower-studded conservatories, many of them proud of their own condescension, and others careless of all beyond the passing amusement of the hour—little suspected that they were mere pawns upon the diplomatic chess-board of their host, and were unconsciously working out the one great purpose of his existence.

The unexceptionable breeding of Mr. Trevanion, his ancient descent, and the uncalculated munificence of his establishment, insured the respect and deference of all by whom he was approached; while his sterling good sense and general information were alike appreciated by the more reflecting portion of his guests. Dowager dames and middle-aged nobles soon learned to prefer his society to that of the pleasure-hunters who fluttered through his saloons; and his dinner-table in Westbourne Terrace was in due course of time as much and as satisfactorily filled as his Richmond shrubberies.

Early accustomed to submission and supineness, Mrs. Trevanion evinced no mortification at the fact that Lady Mary did the honors of her house, seemingly satisfied that by such an arrangement she was relieved alike from exertion and responsibility; and, as she was always courteous to her guests, amiable, and well-dressed, she was generally considered as a lady-like, quiet little person, somewhat uninteresting, but perfectly presentable, whose destiny was a most enviable one, and for whom the world must evidently be couleur de rose.

Nor was the existence of Mrs. Trevanion, in point of fact, by any means an unhappy one; she was proud of her husband even while she feared him; and still more proud of her daughter, whose unfailing affection had been proof against all the temptations to arrogance and heartlessness by which she was surrounded; while she was at the same time dazzled and delighted by the perpetual stream of gayety and splendor upon which she was borne unresistingly along. She was amused by the eager pursuit of pleasure in which she was too indolent to share, even had she been permitted to do so; and flattered when her comfortable sofa was shared by a titled dowager or a withered man of fashion.

For years the courtly Lady Mary, who had become strongly attached to her young charge, had earnestly encouraged the ambitious dreams of her host, and watched the patrician admirers by whom the fair girl was approached with a jealousy equal to his own; but, a few months previous to the opening of our tale, she had relaxed wonderfully in her vigilance. Whether it were that she considered Miss Trevanion at six-and-twenty, and, in other respects, her own mistress, equally competent to judge and act for herself in the most important circumstance of her life, or that some other undivulged reason existed for her sudden quiescence, it is at least certain that her lectures upon the subject of eligible marriages, and the expediency of forming desirable connections, altogether ceased; while it was equally apparent that the beautiful heiress, although courteous and affable to all her suitors, evinced no preference toward either. And as the popularity of his daughter increased, so did the worldly dreams of Mr. Trevanion grow more and more brilliant. It was a matter perfectly settled in his mind that she was destined to accomplish a splendid alliance—a conviction which was strengthened by the peculiar disposition and habits of the young lady herself, who, reared in indulgence and luxury, was at once self-relying and refined, and entirely unsuited for an existence of obscurity or struggle.

How many visionary coronets danced before the mental sight of the proud father, poised only by a silken thread above the polished brow of his child, which it required but her touch to snap. With what silent delight did he anticipate the moment when as a peeress she might look down in disdain upon the haughty relatives by whom she had hitherto been overlooked and neglected. The otherwise high-minded and right-judging man, whose sense of honor was acute upon all other subjects, was alike blind and weak on this. He did not give a thought to the happiness of the bright being who made the sunshine of his home; but, his better feelings warped by ambition and resentment, he looked only to her worldly greatness, and to his own revenge. Every luxury of attire which could enhance her beauty was lavishly bestowed upon her; and even he himself, unbending as he was to all around him, treated her with a deference which to his jaundiced mind was already a triumph.

CHAPTER V.

A FÊTE CHAMPÊTRE.

THERE was a brilliant fête at the far-famed villa of Mrs. St. Maur Fulke at Putney; and as Mrs. St. Maur Fulke was the fashion, "all the world" had been intriguing for the last month to procure tickets. Various were the rumors which had been circulated on the subject of the approaching festivity; and the invited were meanwhile busied in preparing their fancy dresses for the occasion, and congratulating themselves upon the charming idea of their hostess, who had positively refused to sanction the admittance of such guests as should present themselves otherwise than en costume. The extensive grounds of the villa swept down to the river, where gayly-caparisoned boats with silken awnings lay moored beneath the over-hanging willows; gipsy-tents, dancing-booths, and marquees fitted with counters, and crowded with glittering trifles, which were to be distributed by lottery, dotted the lawns and shrubberies; hidden orchestras made the summer air vocal; and on every side groups of fair women and gallant cavaliers in many-colored raiment, rendered the whole scene one parterre of moving flowers.

We are not about to describe these more minutely; a fancy-fete of this description may be readily imagined; pecresses were content to play peasant girls for the hour, while private gentlemen strutted as kings among the brilliant crowd

And a crowd in truth it was; for, although Mrs. St. Maur Fulke had resolutely turned a deaf ear to many an earnest entreaty, declaring that she merely sought to assemble her more immediate friends, she was so popular an individual, and so singularly favored in that respect that upward of seven hundred intimates graced her entertainment. The lively and wealthy little widow herself made a charming grisette. Nothing could be more perfect than the arrangement of her magnificent hair, nothing more becoming than the tightly-fitting boddice, and nothing more captivating than the fairy-like foot and ankle which were revealed by the short jupon. No wonder that many of the women and all the men were enraptured with Mrs. St. Maur Fulke!

Nevertheless, however, there was one more brilliant and stately beauty who fairly divided with her hostess the admiration of the courtly revelers, and that one was Miss Trevanion, whose dark loveliness was rendered striking by her gypsy garb. Many was the palm extended to invite her predictions and many the low-breathed and anxious question to which she replied with a dignified composure well calculated to extinguish the hope that her bright eyes had inspired. For a time her attentive chaperone, Lady Mary, moved majestically beside her, habited as a sybil; but gradually, as the human kaleidoscope varied its figures, the two ladies became separated by the crowd; other gypsies with dark eyes and hair bewildered the titled duenna in the distance; and finally she relinquished all idea of pursuing her lost charge.

It was a glorious summer day; one of those rare days all balm and sunshine, which make the very sense of existence doubly enjoyable; the flexile branches of the trees danced in the light and perfumed air; the flowers lifted their glowing blossoms to the sky; the ripples of the river were brilliant as diamond dust; and every sun-touched leaf glittered like a living emerald; while the long dark avenues of flowering shrubs, over-arched by forest timber, offered their welcome shade to those who sought escape for a season from the heat and hurry of the open lawns.

Through one of these bowery areades, a few hours after the commencement of the fete, slowly wandered two figures engaged in a low and evidently engrossing conversation; who, ever as they approached the termination of the allée, retraced their steps, as if anxious to secure themselves against intrusion. One of these was Miss Trevanion; but all the dignified playfulness which had won for her the admiration of the groups by which she had been previously surrounded, had totally disappeared. Although her movements were steady and measured, her head was bowed, and the hand which grasped her cloak was so tightly clinched that her small fingers were rigid and bloodless. Her companion, who was dressed as a minstrel, and carried a guitar slung across his shoulder, was evidently several years her junior in age; his fair hair clustered massively about his cheeks and brow, and his large eyes, of a deep and intense blue, were fringed by long dark lashes upon both the upper and the under lids; in person he was tall and slight, symmetrically and vigorously formed; and there was a distinction in his finely chiseled features and lofty carriage peculiarly attractive.

"It is worse than vain to indulge in such a hope, Sydney;" said the lady despondingly, as they turned onee more into the deepest shade of the shrubbery; "even Lady Mary herself would not dare to broach the subject to my father, great as her influence undoubtedly is; and now, as if to render our difficulty still more insurmountable, I am persecuted by the insane pursuit of that superannuated old peer."

"But surely, Ida—"

"Nay, nay—" interposed Miss Trevanion, striving to smile; "you need waste no words on him. I have no inclination to purchase a coronet, and as little desire to wear one."

"And can not you convince your father of that fact? You are all-powerful with him."

"Perhaps I might, but our position would still remain unaltered. For that purpose, as I have already explained to you, I have been reared and educated. My own inclinations have never been consulted; nor will I hesitate to confess, that until I knew you, I never cared to speculate upon the future; and my father has consequently lived on in the firm conviction that his wishes would not be thwarted. From this fatal mistake I can anticipate nothing but unhappiness; for, whatever may be my final decision as regards yourself, I can foresee only displeasure and disappointment on his part."

"And can there be any doubt as to that decision?" asked the young man, earnestly.

"I fear not;" was the subdued reply; "but still I shrink from the contest like a coward. It is not your want of fortune which will operate against you, for as an only child I have more than enough; but it is—"

"My obscurity;" said her companion, bitterly.

"Sydney!" exclaimed Miss Trevanion with haughty indignation; "You are a gentleman, both by birth and breeding, or I never could have loved you; but you have no title to offer to me—and, then—," she paused, and blushed deeply.

"Say on, Ida. What more? I will endeavor to bear all which it may be your pleasure to inflict."

"Your youth"—murmured the lady.

"Now you are in truth fighting against shadows!" was the impatient retort; "a marvelous disparity of six years if I mistake not. Can Mr. Trevanion possibly infer from that circumstance that I am unable to protect you?"

"I was not thinking of my father when I urged the objection;" said his companion; "No, Sydney; it was born of my own fears. You have assured me, and I believe you, that I am the first woman whom you have ever loved; but where can I find the assurance that I shall be the last?"

"In yourself. Who that has won the affection of Ida Trevanion can ever turn a thought of love upon another of her sex? You do yourself injustice by such an apprehension."

"At this moment you feel all that you declare: of that, I have no doubt;" was the low reply; "nor will I be guilty of the pitiful affectation of seeming to think otherwise; but time, Sydney, time is a sad magician; and the day may come when even you may feel the imprudence of having bound yourself to a wife even those six years your senior."

"Never!" exclaimed the young man energetically.

"And mark me, Sydney;" pursued Miss Trevanion, laying her hand heavily on his arm, and raising her eyes steadily to his; "mark me—for this moment may be the turning-point of both our lives—I could bear all but that. Were such a contingency possible, I could share poverty, hardship, and even exile with you; but one symptom of change, one suspicion of coldness, one dream —mark me, I say once more—one dream that you had bestowed upon another the love which you had vowed to me, would kill me. Reflect, therefore, before it is too late. I fear that you have not yet learned to understand my character; to see that under an habitual quietude of manner I conceal a strength of purpose and a depth of feeling which must make me either supremely happy or supremely miserable. I must be all or nothing to the man into whose hands I resign my destiny."

"Ida," said her companion, "I have not deserved this doubt. Did I not feel that from the moment in which you become my wife my whole being will be centered in yourself for ever, I would not expose you to the trial which awaits you."

"Again I say, reflect;" continued Miss Trevanion solemnly; "it is my perfect consciousness of my own nature which causes me to hesitate. Little did I dream when we first met, that in you I saw the arbiter of my destiny; nor can I yet understand that the ordinarily keen-sighted Lady Mary should, up to this hour, have failed to remark the progress of our intimacy."

"My aunt is by no means so blind as you suppose," said the young man with a quiet smile; "nor would it appear that she considers Sydney Elphinstone so ineligible a match, even for Miss Trevanion, as that young lady herself. Her own sister married a commoner, and was a far happier woman than Lady Mary."

"Do you really mean to infer that she is aware of our attachment?"

"Has she not lost you in the crowd, Ida? Does she not occasionally doze at the opera? Can you have failed to remark the long, prosy conversations in which she indulges from time to time, with persons whose intellect she despises, and with whose modes of thinking she has no sympathy?"

Miss Trevanion became suddenly thoughtful, but only for an instant. "No, no; it is not possible;" she said firmly; "my father trusts her so implicitly; and it would be too cruel were he to be deceived in us both."

"My assurance that she is our friend gives you no pleasure then, Ida?" said her lover reproachfully.

"Do not mistake me. I only fear that Lady Mary, in her affection for her nephew and her friend, is unconsciously incurring a frightful responsibility, and may hereafter have cause to regret her indulgence."

"Listen to me," broke in the young man impetuously. "My position is a painful one. Loving you—and you can not doubt how well! and how entirely for yourself—I may, and must, to the world appear sordid and interested. This consideration was bitter enough, but it has hitherto been my pride to feel that you at least acquitted me of so base a motive. Would that you were a beggar, Ida; for then, at least——"

"Shame on you!" exclaimed Miss Trevanion; "Do not suffer your mind to be sullied for an instant by such a thought. Money!"—and her proud lip curled with all the scorn of one who had never been taught to feel the value of the riches for which she evinced so unequivocal a contempt; "surely you have already betrayed annoyance enough upon that odious subject, and it is quite superfluous to renew it."

"Forgive me; and you will do so, when I explain that, conscious of my own suffering upon that point, I was anxious to exonerate my aunt from a similar suspicion. She loves me; I have acknowledged to her that my every hope of happiness depends upon an union with yourself; and thus, if indeed she has betrayed her trust, I can but bless her for the weakness."

"But did she not endeavor to impress upon you the imprudence of such an attachment?"

"I suppose I must acknowledge that she did. She told me, I remember, that Mr. Trevanion was ambitious, and that she could hold out no hope; that my suit would be considered by him, and probably by yourself also, as presumptuous and absurd."

"Absurd?"

"Even so."

"And wherefore?"

"Because it was so evidently hopeless."

"Did not the word imply another meaning?"

"None that I could discover."

"And yet it might be that she meant to show you the absurdity of asking the hand of a woman older than yourself."

"Again, Ida!"

"I can not help it. The conviction haunts me pertinaciously, that, in overlooking so serious a fact, I am wilfully risking our mutual happiness. Women are so frail, Sydney; they fade so soon; they are at the mercy of a thousand casualties, from which men are free. They are, moreover, so susceptible of wrong, that, although they may appear to forget as well as to forgive, it is strange but true that every new sorrow recalls the memory of past suffering. Griefs and trials which had seemed for a time, even to themselves, to have been outlived and obliterated, add their mental pang to the new wound; and scars, which had apparently closed, bleed again; for the heart is more difficult to heal than the body, and more tenacious of the hurts by which it has been injured. If, then, such be the fate of the most forbearing of the sex, judge what must be the destiny of those whose nature forbids them either to forget or to forgive—for whom the first insult is final—who can hate as fiercely as they can love. Should they not be wary? Should they not shrink from rushing upon their own destruction?"

"Ida, you torture both yourself and me."

"And it is because I love you, Sydney, that I do so. Because my love is so selfish and so engrossing, that I seek to forge arms against myself. Because I would not that hereafter you should look back with pity or with scorn upon my weakness."

"And do you in reality believe that I could ever prove so vile an ingrate?"

"I think less of you individually, Sydney, while thus listening to the voice of reason and common sense, than of human nature in the mass. Who can answer for the effect which may be produced upon his nature by time and circumstances?"

"It is in the power of every man of honor to do so."

"But I would owe nothing to the honor of my husband upon a point like this. Such a safeguard to my pride would but revolt my affection."

"You distort my meaning, Ida. Is this generous?"

"I know not!" said Miss Trevanion sadly; "I only feel that in becoming your wife, I should so utterly resign my every chance of happiness into your hands, that, were I to deceive myself, the wreck would be a fatal one."

"You do not, then, consider me worthy of the trust?"

"As you are, Sydney? Oh, yes! Worthy—most worthy. I only tremble when I reflect upon what you may one day become."

"This discussion is idle and most painful, Ida," said Elphinstone in an unsteady voice, "I have but assurances to offer, to which you apparently assign no credit. I was not prepared for such mistrust on your part."

"Do not wrong me," was the eager rejoinder. "I do not mistrust you—this interview is a sufficient evidence to the contrary; but—"

"But you dare not confide your happiness to my keeping?"

There was silence for a moment, and nothing could be heard in that quiet and secluded avenue, save the sounds of far-off music, the ringing of distant laughter, and the whisperings of the wind through the dense foliage of the overarching trees; and then came a low murmur of "I do—I will;" and the extended hand of Miss Trevanion was passionately clasped in that of her companion.

"Ida—my own."

"Now, and forever."

"Without doubt or misgiving?"

"In all faith and trust."

"I will merit both."

"I believe it, Sydney; and on my side I will endeavor to prove to you that I deserve your full and entire affection; and I will strive to forget—"

"Forget nothing, save that you have been unjust to yourself; and if a life-long devotion can repay you for the blessedness which you have conferred on me, it is, and must be yours. Do not imagine for an instant that I am unconscious of the sacrifice which you are willing to make in order to secure my happiness; do not suppose that I am blind to the worldly advantages which you so generously resign for my sake; I am but too keenly alive to their extent. I know that you will be blamed, and even pitied, for bestowing yourself upon a poor and nameless suitor, in the fullness of your beauty, and the zenith of your fashion, when the noblest and the proudest are contending for your favor; but you shall have no cause to regret such a concession."

"I accept the assurance," said Miss Trevanion tenderly; "I will henceforward throw all misgiving to the winds, and trust implicitly in your affection. We have, however, still to struggle against very formidable difficulties, Sydney; and I confess, that when I think of my father's anger I feel terrified."

"Surely, with such an auxiliary as my aunt, you will be able to overcome the objections of Mr. Trevanion."

"I repeat that I believe them to be insuperable; but, as it has now become my duty to make the attempt, I will not shrink from the task, onerous as it is."

"Would that I could spare you the trial!"

"Impossible! I must meet the displeasure which I shall have incurred, alone; and this Sydney, will be a sufficient proof of the sincerity of my affection; for, peculiar as he may be on this one point, my father has hitherto been to me all kindness and indulgence; and I can no involve him in mortification and disappointmen without suffering severely on my side. My only consolation will exist in the conviction that he desires my happiness, and that I shall have secured it by uniting myself to the only man who has ever won my love. And now let us part, or our absence will be remarked."

"So soon, Ida?"

"Believe me, it is better so."

But still they lingered awhile, her hand in his, and conversing in those low tones which are audible rather to the heart than to the ear, but which are nevertheless trumpet-tongued to those who love. And then their hands were more firmly clasped together; their eyes met in a long and eloquent look; the lady emerged into the sunshine, and the gentleman plunged yet deeper into the shadows of the shrubbery. The cheek of Miss Trevanion was pale, but she betrayed no other symptom of emotion; and if she played her adopted part less gayly than before she indulged in that sylvan tête-à-tête there was a graceful languor in her whole deportment which rendered her only the more fascinating and attractive to her assiduous admirers.

Nothing could go off better than the fête of Mrs. St. Maur Fulke; and numerous were the compliments which she received from her reluctantly-departing guests, warned by rising moon, and a rising mist from the river, that even the most refined pleasures must at last terminate. Nymphs and goddesses folded their shawls and mantles about them; knights and courtiers resolved themselves into mere mortals; carriages thundered to the gates; the voices of servants and policemen were loud in every direction, and Miss Trevanion handed to her chariot by a minstrel, whose plumed hat completely overshadowed his countenance, was soon rolling along the road to London, seated beside the silent and somewhat conscience-stricken Sybil, to whose care she had been confided.

CHAPTER VI.

A REVELATION.

"And so," said Mr. Trevanion on the following morning, as he rose from the breakfast table, and transferred the "Morning Post" to his wife; "the fête of Mrs. St. Maur Fulke was the most brilliant affair of the season. Do you concur in this opinion, Lady Mary?"

"There can be no doubt that it was admirably arranged, and very successful;" was the quiet reply. "In fact I never saw a collection of more effective costumes, or listened to more agreeable music. What say you, Ida?"

"That if the guests were not amused, it was assuredly not the fault of the hostess," said the young lady.

"You, at least, have every reason to be satisfied," observed her father; "as I find it recorded in 'The Post,' that 'the lovely and accomplished Miss Trevanion was one of its brightest ornaments;' although I still maintain that the costume which you selected, was by no means that in which I should, had I been consulted on the subject, have counseled my daughter to appear."

"I think that you would have altered your opinion, had you seen how admirably Ida enacted her assumed character," said the indulgent and politic Lady Mary; "I can assure you that it excited general remark."

Mr. Trevanion acknowledged the courtesy by a gracious bow.

"And it was, moreover, excessively becoming," pursued the family friend; "I never saw the dear girl appear to more advantage. I was quite proud of my charge."

"I hope, madam, that you will never have cause to be otherwise," observed Mr. Trevanion, haughtily; "but that ere long—"

"No doubt, no doubt, my dear sir," interposed the lady somewhat nervously; "there can not be a question that the social success of your daughter will augment, while that of so many less highly-gifted girls is terribly apt to diminish. Ida's fashion is now so perfectly established, and the set into which I have had the privilege of introducing her is so thoroughly unexceptionable, that her future station depends entirely upon herself."

"I am convinced," said Mr. Trevanion, with a second lofty bow of acknowledgment, that she will not lose sight, either of her obligation to you, or of the immense responsibility which now rests upon herself."

"I am sure," whined the thin voice of Mrs. Trevanion, from behind the broad pages of the newspaper, by which she was entirely concealed; "that if Ida is not happy and satisfied, I can not tell what could make her so."

"My young friend has certainly drawn a prize in the great lottery of life;" said the bland Lady Mary in her smoothest accent.

"A fact of which I trust that she is fully aware;" was the sententious rejoinder of the gentleman, as he strode loftily across the floor; "for, truth to say, I can scarcely imagine a want or a wish on her part which she is unable to gratify—young, handsome, and fashionable, with the prospect of a fine fortune, and the offer of a peerage—"

"Can I speak a few words with you in private, papa?" asked Miss Trevanion in a firm voice, but with a heightened color.

"In private, Ida! Are we not now sufficiently private for any communication which you may find it necessary to make? Is not Lady Mary one of the family? While your mother—"

"Excuse me, Mr. Trevanion;" said the noble widow with alacrity, at the same time rising from her seat; "I have letters of some importance to write, and shall be glad to commence them as early in the day as possible; you must therefore allow me to retire to my own room."

"As you will, madam, as you will;" replied the host, holding back the door with the ceremonious courtesy which he always observed to the other sex; "if such be the case I can of course offer no objection, but were it otherwise—"

"Not a word more, my dear sir; believe me that no apology is necessary; I was about to withdraw as Ida spoke;" and gathering the rich folds of her gray damask dress about her, the portly lady disappeared.

"And you, Mrs. Trevanion?" said her husband interrogatively.

"I would rather that mamma should remain;" was the calm remark of his daughter.

"Her opinion on the subject to be discussed, of whatever nature it may be, can not but prove valuable;" observed Mr. Trevanion, contemptuously.

"That is precisely my own sentiment;" said the young lady, "for I have firm faith in her affection for her only child, and as I am about to speak frankly and seriously upon a matter involving my future happiness in life, it will be a sincere gratification to me should she see and feel as I do."

"You have then some doubt as to my sympathy—" said her father tartly.

"I confess it; but I do not despair of convincing alike your heart and your reason, for I have also an unshaken trust in your paternal tenderness."

"Enough of this verbal skirmishing, Ida. What have you to say? I have business in town to-day, and expect the carriage round every instant."

"I shall not detain you long, sir. You have for the last four years expressed a great desire to see me settled in life, and I consider it my duty to tell you without procrastination or concealment that my election is made."

"You accept Lord Downmere?"

Miss Trevanion smiled disdainfully. "Decidedly not. I have no ambition to become the wife of a man old enough to be my grandfather."

"A peer of the realm—"

"A selfish sensualist."

"Pshaw! The only chance of married happiness to a woman is to unite herself to a man of twice her own age, who knows how to appreciate her youth and beauty at their proper value. A sensualist! And why not? How can that affect your comfort? An egotist? Trash! Let him indulge himself as he may, you are not likely to suffer from his selfishness. Upon this subject I shall admit of no argument, as I have already promised your hand to Lord Downmere."

"Sir!" exclaimed the young lady indignantly; "I can not surely have understood you rightly; did you say that you had promised my hand?"

"I did."

"And without my sanction?"

"Even so."

"Then you must excuse me, if I at once declare that I am as little disposed to defer to the tyranny of a father as to that of a husband. We are not, happily, in Circassia, where parents make a trade of their children, and dispose of them to the best bidder; and thus I do not acknowledge the right even of my own parent to transfer me like a bale of merchandize."

"You might at least have spared me that taunt, Miss Trevanion!" exclaimed the merchant with vehemence; "it comes badly from you, who are indebted to my self-sacrifice for all the advantages upon which you pride yourself."

"Pardon me, sir; I intended no sarcasm," said his daughter deprecatingly; "nor can I comprehend how you should for an instant attach such a meaning to my words. My very rejection of the suitor whom you have proposed to me is a sufficient guarantee of my utter indifference to the empty distinctions of rank and name. No one can have a more profound respect for high blood and ancient lineage than myself, but I have no inclination to immolate my happiness at the shrine of mere rank."

"I shall not bandy phrases with you, Miss Trevanion," was the tart reply; "my straightforward mode of speech is no match for your sentimental eloquence; and it would appear that my paternal authority is no curb to your will. Be good enough, therefore, to inform me of your pleasure, in order that I may not waste time which can be more profitably employed."

Tears rose to the eyes of the young lady, but they did not fall. She remained silent for an instant; and then, grasping the hand of her father, as it rested upon the back of the chair from which he had risen, she said beseechingly, "Do not be harsh with me! If you only knew how much it costs me to thwart your wishes upon so important a point as this, I am sure that you would rather pity than condemn me; but believe me when I assure you that it is its very importance which gives me strength to do so. You have been so invariably kind and indulgent; you have so long made my happiness your chief care, that I dare not bring myself to suspect your affection when I am about to put it to the test."

"What more?" was the cold inquiry, as Mr. Trevanion withdrew his hand from her clasp.

"I have already declared," said his daughter, retreating a step or two, as if stung by his tone and gesture, "that my election is made—my promise is given—my hand is pledged. That promise and that hand were mine to bestow or to withhold; and I have acted upon the firm conviction that I possessed an undoubted right to decide my own destiny."

"And this conviction has induced you to counteract my wishes, and to disappoint my views. What compensation have you to offer? What brilliant establishment have you secured for yourself which may tend to reconcile me to your disobedience?"

"Will not my future happiness—"

"No romance, if you please, Miss Trevanion. Mine has been a life made up altogether of realities, and I have little taste for supplying incidents for a novel in my own family. Happiness in this world, young lady, as you ought by this time to be aware, implies wealth, station, and influence; and once more I ask you if you have secured these?"

"And on my part, sir, I frankly answer—No."

"Better and better!" was the sarcastic reply of the merchant, as his cheek became livid with suppressed passion; "but pray proceed."

"I will; my hand is pledged, and pledged irrevocably, to Mr. Sydney Elphinstone."

"To Mr. Sydney Elphinstone — Indeed!" sneered Mr. Trevanion; while a "Good gracious me" came from the lounging chair in which his wife had hitherto sat silent and disregarded.

"A beardless boy, and a pennyless pauper!" pursued the gentleman after drawing a long breath "you do honor to your birth and breeding even by such an inclination, Miss Trevanion. Rest assured, however, that no folly of the kind shall ever be perpetrated in my family; I positively forbid all further mention of the young man's name beneath my roof."

"I much regret, sir —"

"And so do I, madam; so do I; deeply, bitterly regret the degeneracy of a child from whose sense of personal dignity and filial affection I had looked for obedience, and a ready co-operation in my own views. Do you imagine, Miss Trevanion, that I have bestowed a fortune upon your education, and petted and pampered you like a peeress, in order that you may make me the laughing-stock of my haughty relatives?"

"I had flattered myself, sir, that I was indebted for all the advantages and indulgences which I have enjoyed, to your fatherly affection alone."

"Listen to me;" said Mr. Trevanion, sternly

"Let my motives be what they might, you owe me tenfold the gratitude which a parent could claim from an ordinary child. Your very birth, madam, was a bitter disappointment. I had married your mother in the hope that she would make me the father of a son; that I might meet Sir Jasper upon equal terms; and that the heir to my wealth might illustrate the family name as proudly as he who was its representative. You know me, and the one ambition of my life, well enough to feel that I became a husband from no selfish seeking after personal gratification; I could and should have sufficed to myself, had I not had an ulterior aim—but enough on that subject. You were born; a girl—a woman—and my first hope was frustrated. Your mother bore me no other child, and new prospects opened before me. You were handsome, and I was careful that your beauty should be enhanced by every extraneous aid. I have reared you rather like the daughter of a duke than the heiress of a commoner. I have spared neither gold nor care; and, I believe I may be permitted to hope that neither has been expended injudiciously. I have done more. I have secured to you the services of a woman of rank—do you mark me, Miss Trevanion? I say—and I say it advisedly,—the services of a woman of rank; for, whatever you may feel inclined to think upon the subject, you may trust me when I assure you that there is no leveller like wealth; and however respectfully we may see fit to treat Lady Mary Brookland, it is not the less certain that her poverty has compelled her to bow her pride; and that she is as completely my hired dependent as the butler who officiates at my sideboard. And now, allow me to inquire what return you are anxious to make for all my solicitude? I believed, and I had every right to believe, that the false position in which I had so long lived, must necessarily end when you attained to womanhood, and were competent to secure such a marriage as my birth, and your own personal and acquired advantages, rendered expedient. I secured for you the homage of a nobleman, and I was satisfied. I felt that my task was ended, and my object accomplished. I had toiled and waited for years, but I had ultimately effected my purpose; and I turned back no regret upon the past."

"Yet surely, sir, my future happiness may be considered as worthy of some consideration."

"I have already requested that you would have the courtesy to spare me all phrase-making;" was the impatient retort: "we are wasting words. Will you, or will you not, Miss Trevanion—I must now insist on your definitive reply—accept the hand of Lord Downmere?"

"I can not;" said the young lady with a quivering lip, but with unabated firmness; "I do not even respect him; and I will never give myself to a man whom I despise."

"This is, if I rightly understand, your final determination. Good. Listen, in your turn, to mine. Become the wife of your pauper-lover, and share his poverty; marry your boy-suitor, and expose yourself to the ridicule of the world; but do not expect me to take any part either in the privations or the sarcasms to which you are willing to expose yourself. Do not, moreover, expect that I shall render myself responsible for your obstinacy, or your error,—for I am willing to give it whichever name you please. Whatever may be my disappointment or my mortification, I have still moral courage enough left to assert myself; and no hardly-earned gains of mine shall go to enrich a son-in-law whom I will never recognize."

"My dear father—"

"You have heard my decision, Miss Trevanion. It now remains for you to make yours."

"It is made, sir. My word is pledged; and I should not be your daughter if I failed to redeem it."

"The flattery is delicate, but useless and ill-timed. We then thoroughly understand each other?"

"I fear so."

It is a fatal error to compel, by unreasoning severity, a feeling which was perhaps not yet sufficiently strong to withstand tenderness and entreaty, into direct and deliberate opposition, and to assail it too roughly by giving to it the stimulus of anger; while it is a common mistake, and a fatal one, to suppose that by harshness and intemperance we can succeed in crushing it, as though it were a mere brute antagonist to be overcome by physical force. There is a recoil against oppression in every heart; and many may be persuaded and convinced by gentleness, who become only the more resolute when opposed by violence.

Whether such would have been the case in the present instance it is impossible to decide, as the trial was not made; while the look of calm defiance which passed between the mortified father and his indignant child at this period of the conversation gave ample evidence that neither was disposed to yield.

"Now, don't be obstinate, Ida;" whined out the thin voice from the arm-chair; "your father does not like you to marry Mr. Elphinstone—I do not like it—and I am quite sure that Lady Mary will be furious."

"Your opinion is, no doubt, a valuable one, Mrs. Trevanion;" said her husband sarcastically; "but, nevertheless, I take the liberty of dissenting from it; as I am quite prepared to believe that we are indebted to that very lady for the pleasant position in which we now find ourselves."

"I can assure you—" commenced his daughter, as a flush of generous indignation burnt upon her cheek and brow; "that you wrong Lady Mary Brookland, sir, by such a supposition. It is true that she originally presented Mr. Elphinstone to me; and surely nothing could be more simple than that she should introduce so near a relative to the members of a family in which she resided; but, beyond the fact of this introduction, Lady Mary has never made the slightest effort to force Mr. Elphinstone upon my acquaintance."

"Probably not;" was the cold reply; "Lady Mary is a woman of taste and tact, and not likely to commit herself by any overt exertions to that effect; but there are such things, Miss Trevanion, as negative helps—assistance rendered rather by omissions than by actual services."

"Is not this ungenerous, sir?"

"It may be so; but I apprehend that it is not unjust. I can not be deceived in believing that the admirable 'understanding'—Is not that the conventional term applied to such dignified and womanly arrangements as that to which it would appear that you have lent yourself?—must have taken place at the fête of Mrs. St. Maur Fulke. Now, will you permit me to inquire how your chaperone had disposed of herself when this very romantic scene was taking place? Was she present?"

"She was not. We had been accidentally separated by the crowd."

"No doubt. I suspected as much; and the great extent of the pleasure grounds naturally rendered it quite impossible that you should meet again until the gentleman had carried his point. It is precisely as I thought; and confirms me more steadfastly than ever in the conviction, that in every affair of life there is nothing so desirable as to secure the co-operation of persons of sense, who appreciate so admirably the extent of what is required of them; while simpletons on the contrary, are like grey hairs—they are always obtrusive, and never can be kept in their right places. I was quite sure that poor Lady Mary had, in some way, lost sight of you altogether."

"Pardon me, sir, if, in my turn, I remark that we are losing sight of our subject;" said Miss Trevanion with dignity; "I have already exonerated Lady Mary from all blame, and am quite willing to take upon myself the responsibility of my own actions. I am no child to obey the leading-strings of a nurse—no puppet to dance obedience to the wires of an exhibitor—but a reflecting and anxious woman, conscious that I hold in my own hands the control of my future destiny."

"So be it;" contemptuously retorted her father; "and I congratulate you that they are so full, as you are likely to have little else to grasp in them."

"The jest is a bitter one, but I will not resent it;" said the young lady. "I see and feel, painfully feel, that on the one most important action of my life there exists no hope of our sympathizing. But still, oh, my dear father, still have mercy on me; and do not refuse to me at least your blessing and your forgiveness. Reflect that, in taking so decided a step in opposition to your wishes I am already sufficiently to pity; and do not let me have in addition to apprehend the misery of your permanent displeasure."

For an instant the lip of Mr. Trevanion quivered, but only for an instant. The proud spirit of the disappointed man was stronger even than his paternal love, and he rallied ere his daughter had time to remark the passing emotion. "My blessing!" he exclaimed vehemently; "my blessing! on what? On your deliberate disobedience? My forgiveness? Of what? Of your premeditated overthrow of all my hopes? Look for neither, madam; look for neither. Avail yourself of your boasted privilege of free-will—give yourself to a beggar—the law will be your sanction, and I your victim. Let that consciousness suffice you. All further words are needless. I withdraw all opposition—I will offer no impediments to your folly; go, and like other lunatics, rush upon your fate."

"Father!"—

"Enough, Miss Trevanion;" was the stern rejoinder; "I still feel sufficient pity for your madness to accord you four-and-twenty hours to reflect; but, if at the termination of that time, you adhere to your present insane purpose, you will no longer have a father, and will be at perfect liberty to replace his protection by that of any husband you may see fit to select."

As these words were uttered, Mr. Trevanion hastily left the room, while his daughter sank back upon the sofa, and buried her face in her hands.

For a moment only there was silence, as the weak and timid wife had no sooner ascertained the disappearance of her husband than she roused herself from her habitual apathy, and querulously upbraided her agitated daughter, with what she characteristically designated as her silly and nonsensical obstinacy. The reproaches of Mrs. Trevanion, however, fell upon the ear of Ida with no greater force than the whistling of the subsiding wind amid the cordage of a tempest-tossed vessel, when the deep booming of the death-dealing waves has passed away; and as they concluded by an instruction to her daughter to ring for her maid, and to reach her eau-de-cologne, the poor girl having obeyed, hastened to escape from the room, in order to reflect in solitude upon the exigences of her painful position.

CHAPTER VII.

A NOBLE SUITOR.

It is marvelous that although daily experience should suffice to prove that we are at best the poor creatures of circumstance, the mere puppets of accident, we are all prone to believe that nothing can go on satisfactorily unless, even while professing to trust in Providence, we undertake to guide the whole action of the machinery ourselves; and thus, too often, instead of being, as we fondly and blindly imagine, the spiders that weave the web, we find ourselves in the end, merely the flies that have been caught in it.

Such was, in a great degree, the case with Mr. Trevanion, who having for years fondly hugged the belief that he had taught all around him to bend to his indomitable will, suddenly found himself opposed by the very being upon whose obedience and submission he had calculated the most securely; and as he rolled toward London, in his well-hung and luxurious chariot, he felt like a person stunned by some sudden blow. Calm and concentered was his rage; and none who looked on him would have suspected the bitterness of the feelings which were masked by the stern and cold demeanor that he successfully maintained.

For the first time in his life the proud and self-reliant man was compelled to acknowledge to himself that the obstacle flung upon the path of his ambition might prove beyond even his strength to remove. There was that in the eye of his daughter during their late conversation, which convinced him that she had inherited no small portion of his own resolute spirit; and while he dwelt in moody and wordless anger upon her ingratitude, and recapitulated to himself all the advantages and indulgences by which he had surrounded her from her very cradle, he never once suffered himself to remember that these had been conferred for his own sake rather than for her's; and that he had built up a dazzling edifice of greatness upon her loveliness, grace, and talent, of which he would not have laid a single stone, had she been less eminently gifted by nature to work out the cherished purpose of his existence.

He thought of his ancestral home, and his haughty relatives with a pang at his heart—his cloud-dream of crushing the arrogance, and revenging the neglect of Sir Jasper and his wife by presenting to them his daughter as Countess of Downmere, had vanished; and how was it replaced?

As the question shaped itself in his mind, Mr. Trevanion crushed the arms which were folded across his breast almost into the flesh, and set his teeth closely, while his lips grew ashy white. He could better have borne any thing than this. Then his thoughts reverted to Lady Mary Brookland, whom, despite his daughter's disclaimer, he was far from exonerating from at least a tacit connivance with her nephew; but on her, he bitterly felt that it would be impossible to wreak his displeasure. A rupture with the person whom in his heart he silently designated as a titled viper, would effectually disorganize his whole household, and overthrow the work of years. Thanks to the persevering system of contempt which he had pursued toward his wife, she had ended by becoming a mere cypher under her own roof, whose authority was not recognized beyond the circle of her dressing-room; while the free-masonry of rank would, as a matter of course, induce half his aristocratic acquaintance to adopt the cause of the peer's daughter, and to find food for satire rather than sympathy in his own mortification. No; happen what might, he felt that he must at least keep up appearances with Mr. Elphinstone's aunt, although it by no means followed that he should for the future place the same implicit reliance on her prudence and loyalty as he had hitherto done.

In any, and every point of view, his position was accordingly a perplexing one; and had he not been made of sterner stuff than the generality of his sex, who, however, self-sufficing so long as the wheels of life's chariot run smoothly along the broad highway of prosperity and comfort, are prone to turn for help and solace to others when those same wheels become clogged by the mire, and arrested by the masses, of doubt and difficulty, he would have been sorely conscious on that unlucky morning of the height and breadth of the barrier which he had himself built up between his own will and the free agency of those about him. As it was, however, he merely sought to discover the most effectual means of meeting and combating the exigences of the emergency in which he was placed, single-handedly, and resolutely.

As we have already shown by the history of his past life, the nature of Mr. Trevanion was eminently energetic; with him to will had hitherto been to accomplish; and even now he would not suffer himself to believe that he should finally be defeated; Ida's exhibition of spirit had rather startled than convinced him. Women were impulsive, he knew; but he clung to the belief that they were by no means equally consistent. It was the first occasion upon which the wishes of his daughter had been seriously opposed, and she had, almost as a natural consequence, indignantly and determinedly resented that opposition; but when she had taken time to reflect, she must and would see her folly in its true light. It was absurd to suppose that, reared in luxury as she had been, and habituated to have her every desire gratified as soon as expressed, she could be mad enough to cast from her all these advantages to share the comparative penury of a younger brother. No—no—he had only to give her time. Her woman-vanity would do the rest.

The mental argument was a comfortable one; and before Mr. Trevanion reached town the pressure of his folded arms relaxed, his eye lost some portion of its dark fire, and he breathed more freely.

Suddenly a thought struck him; he pulled the check-string, and the carriage, turning down a lateral street, rolled rapidly toward Piccadilly.

The Earl of Downmere was at home; and as Mr. Trevanion had long been a privileged visitor, he was instantly admitted to the breakfast-room, where his mature lordship sat discussing in solitary state a most récherché repast.

Henry Ferdinand, Earl of Downmere, and Baron Woodlyn, was a portly personage of tall stature and stern countenance, who bore his sixty years of life with considerable dignity; smoothly and composedly too, without any attempt to disguise their amount by hair-dye or cosmetic, like one who scorned such puerilities as at once utterly beneath his own notice, and beyond that of others. An equal independence of feeling was also visible in his costume, which, although unexceptionable in material, was worn with a careless disregard to every consideration save that of ease, which betrayed the innate selfishness of the individual; one slipperless foot rested upon the seat of a chair in front of him, and looked suspicious of incipient gout; while the knee of the other leg was covered with a napkin which had become considerably sullied during the process of the meal to which his attention was directed. The Times lay on the table, luxuriously bathing one extremity of its colossal sheet in the savory jelly of a dindon aux truffes; while his valet, infinitely better dressed than himself, stood behind his chair, reading aloud from the Morning Post the fashionable news of the day. The room in which the peer was seated was gorgeous with gilding, and paneled with family portraits, the most recent in date being a likeness of himself taken in the year of his majority, and forming a woeful and saddening contrast with his present appearance. A heavy sofa, and a well cushioned fauteuil stood near the fire-place, and a large folding screen partially vailed the door; it was indeed evident in all the details of the apartment that the "creature comforts" of this life were by no means disregarded by its owner; and a feeling of surprise was elicited involuntarily that so thorough a self-seeker as my Lord Downmere, should for a moment contemplate the possibility of so great a risk as marriage, tending, as it could not fail to do, to the disturbance of his long cherished habits of personal indulgence.

The secret lay, however, in the fact that Henry Ferdinand, Earl of Downmere, was the last direct scion of his noble house; his nearest relative and presumptive heir being a second cousin, whom he had never seen, but whom he had nevertheless honored with his unqualified dislike. Earlier in life he had resisted all the entreaties of his widowed mother to give a new mistress to Woodlyn Castle—"Time enough yet!"—was his constant reply to her representations; "I will marry when to do so becomes a duty to my family, but I will not sacrifice myself until I am convinced that it will be necessary to nip the hopes of Mr. Augustus Mordaunt in the bud. Time enough for that, my dear lady-mother."

And so time went on, until the venerable Countess was laid in the family vault; and the dashing young noble grew into a staid, middle-aged gentleman, who began to weary of hunting, and to sit longer at the dinner table; to forswear waltzing, and to patronize whist. Nor did time even then stand still, but most pertinaciously did it persevere in its progress until the dark hair, which had once been abundant, grew scanty on the summit of his head, and became thickly streaked with threads of a dull grey; while crows' feet began to gather beneath his eyes, and to pucker the corners of his mouth. In short, as we have already shown, his lordship had attained to the ripe age of sixty; when even he was reluctantly compelled to admit that if Mr. Augustus Mordaunt were indeed to be baulked of the coveted peerage, it might be as well no longer to delay the bestowal of his name and rank upon a wife.

Then came the difficulty of selection; for, aware of the greatness of the honor to be conferred, the broken-down roué was by no means inclined to bestow such advantages upon any woman who could not secure to him a very ample equivalent. Young she must be,—that was a sine qua non—handsome, that was equally indispensable—and wealthy, for he was resolved to exact the price of his coronet—beyond these requisites, however, he asked nothing more; he could dispense with high birth, provided that the respectability of her family was unquestionable; and to her disposition and temper he was perfectly indifferent, being most agreeably satisfied that no wife, be she who she might, would long venture to oppose his will.

Even when he had conceded thus much, however, the difficulty was no slight one, as many young, beautiful, and well-dowried women were to the full as conscious of the value of their advantages as Lord Downmere of his own, and unhesitatingly declined to barter them for an empty title; and thus he had been half a dozen times civilly rejected by as many reigning beauties, when he accidentally made the acquaintance of Ida Trevanion. The repulses to which his lordship had by this time been subjected had, however, taught him caution; he began to understand that people as frequently overdo things in this world by a want of judgment, as they neglect what is necessary to be done by a want of energy; and he consequently resolved on the present occasion to ascertain how far the prestige of his rank would influence the father of the lady in his favor, and to what extent he might trust to Mr. Trevanion's authority over his daughter, before he committed himself by a direct offer of his hand.

No proceeding could have been more judicious under the circumstances; and accordingly but a few weeks elapsed ere the peer, who had most graciously extended the right hand of friendship to the princely merchant, became satisfied that Mr. Trevanion would consider no sacrifice too great by which he could place a coronet on the brow of his beautiful heiress. Lord Downmere easily detected his weakness, but he was far from suspecting the motive; and while he haughtily, and somewhat contemptuously, assured himself that the man of commerce estimated his rank and birth at their full value, he was little aware that in this instance the commoner was by far the prouder individual of the two—the true nobleman in heart and feeling—and that the ancient blood which throbbed and leaped in his pulses when the earl at length confided to him the passion which he professed to feel for the fair Ida, was quickened, not by the prospect of a titled son-in-law, but by that held out to him of social self-assertion.

The character and temperament of Mr. Trevanion had, moreover, satisfied Lord Downmere that he was not a man likely to yield his own judgment or wishes to those of his child upon so serious a point as marriage, when he saw him steadily enforce them on all around him, upon occasions of comparatively minor importance; and thus, having secured the consent of her father, he took little pains to ingratiate himself with the young lady in any other way than by making the most liberal settlements; a generosity greatly increased by his consciousness that the magnificent fortune of his intended bride rendered it altogether supererogatory; and while Mr. Sydney Elphinstone was breathing his tale of love into the ears of the listening beauty, his self-complacent rival was trotting his hack in the ring, and dozing over crown points at the whist-table of his club.

When the pretensions of Lord Downmere were made known to Miss Trevanion by her father she smiled incredulously, and merely asked if the poor old gentleman were insane; but when she found his suit urged upon her firmly and imperatively, she coldly declared that she would never consent to listen to its repetition. The rage of Mr. Trevanion was unbounded at this open opposition to his will, but he succeeded by a strong effort in controlling it; and abruptly informing her that he should ere long insist on her obedience, he sternly left the room; while his weak-minded wife who "loved a lord," not, like her haughty helpmate, as a glittering tool wherewith to work out his own purposes, but purely and wholly for the pleasure of feeling that she was of sufficient importance to be the associate of nobles, poured forth a rapid flood of wondering reproaches upon the devoted head of her daughter; could not conceive what she could expect if she could afford to refuse an earl—to wear a countess's coronet—and perhaps, for any thing she knew to the contrary, to become a member of Her Majesty's household. It was really too bad—it was cruel to her, for she should have liked so much to have been the mother-in-law of a peer. However, she had one consolation, and that was, that she knew Mr. Trevanion well enough to be quite sure that Ida must yield in the end, for it was of no use to attempt to oppose his will.

"And is it possible, mamma;" asked the proud girl with an indignant blush; "that you can wish to see the happiness of your only child sacrificed to such puerilities as those you have mentioned?"

"Nonsense, Ida;" was the peevish retort; "surely, with my experience, I must know best what constitutes happiness; I tell you that if I had married a peer, I should have been the happiest woman alive."

Miss Trevanion sighed. She had too much respect for her spirit-crushed mother to express the contempt with which she listened to her childish wailings; and from that day neither of her parents had reverted to the subject of Lord Downmere's proposal until the morning upon which we first introduced them to our readers.

CHAPTER VII.

SOCIAL TACTICS.

EVEN at the close of the unpromising conversation recorded in the last chapter, Mr. Trevanion had not, as we have already stated, abandoned all hope of ultimate success; but, misjudging the lofty nature of his daughter, had so far deluded himself before he reached town, as to believe that the vanity of the young beauty was piqued by the carelessness of Lord Downmere's courtship.

"Natural enough! natural enough!" he murmured to himself with a grim smile. "He has played his cards badly, and deserves to lose her; nor would I move a finger to assist him, were it not for my own sake. But he is necessary to my scheme of vengeance, and I must give him a hint to be more cautious for the future."

And, full of his newly born-hope, the stately merchant entered the breakfast room of his noble friend.

"Hah! Trevanion, my good fellow;" was the greeting of the peer, as, with a portion of pâté de foie gras provided upon his fork, he extended two fingers of his left hand to his visitor; "You are early to-day. Have you breakfasted? or will you join me?—No—well, then, take a seat, and excuse me if I finish my breakfast. How are the ladies?"

"Perfectly well, my lord, I am obliged to you; and my somewhat untimely visit—"

"Never ill-timed, Trevanion, never ill-timed;" interposed the host; "always delighted to see you, as a matter of course. I was about to drive to Richmond to-day to pay my respects to my fair enslaver, and to inquire after her health."

"I am glad to hear it," said the merchant, "and trust that you will still persist in your intention, for I will frankly tell you that it was to suggest a little more devotion on your part to Ida that I drove to Piccadilly this morning. Young ladies, as your lordship must be aware, like to be wooed as well as won, and I begin to fear that the paucity of your visits has already produced a bad effect upon the mind of my daughter."

"Pooh! pooh!" chuckled the old earl, "you deceive yourself. Girls are fond enough, no doubt, of being dangled after by a bevy of smart young fellows, who, like French poodles, are skilled in the art to fetch and carry; but when a man reaches my age, he is only in the way in a lady's drawing-room; and I am much mistaken if Miss Trevanion does not see the matter with the same eyes as myself. She is a fine creature, a very fine creature, and will adorn her coronet, but I have no intention to make her purchase it too dearly. I am a man of the world, Trevanion, and have a most particular aversion to degenerating into a bore."

"My dear lord—"

"Nay, nay, no disclaimers. We are both rational beings; I have a sincere regard for your daughter—I admire her exceedingly—she is a superb woman—and as Countess of Downmere, will, I am convinced, do honor both to her father and her husband; but I do not expect impossibilities; and I am as little inclined to interfere with her comfort, as I am to sacrifice my own. I have, moreover, already seen enough of Miss Trevanion to feel certain that I am pursuing the best method of securing her favor."

"You must pardon me if I persist in doubting it," replied the visitor; "Ida has been so long accustomed to adulation and homage, that her vanity can not fail to be piqued by your apparent indifference, contrasting as it does so forcibly with the devoted attentions of the other candidates for her preference. I can quite understand that your lordship conceives (and very properly), that the honor which you have conferred on her by the offer of your hand must necessarily more than counterbalance all such puerile considerations; but women, especially handsome ones, are capricious and exacting; nor can we, while our mighty world itself works on such pigmy hinges, afford to be too severe upon them."

"Well, well," said Lord Downmere somewhat impatiently, "I shall decidedly drive to Richmond to-day, and come to a more explicit understanding with the young lady herself. I should, no doubt, have done so before, had you not assured me that I might safely leave the affair in your hands; an arrangement which struck me as being, under all circumstances, an excellent one. I never, even in my young days, was a lady's man; nor should I have so far disorganized all my habits at my present time of life as to take a wife, were it not that the duty which I owe to my name demands it. I ask of the Countess of Downmere to give me an heir in return for the coronet which I place upon her brow, and I exact no more. As for love, my good sir, it is a mere myth in the fashionable world at the present day; an ignis fatuus, a will-o'-the-wisp, just as unattainable as the rainbow; and I am too reasonable a man to clutch at the vapor."

"But surely, my lord, you will not be rash enough to explain yourself thus to my daughter?"

"No, no, Trevanion; I have not walked through the by-ways of society for so many years not to understand the sex at least better than that. I have, as you may perceive, no remnant of romance left in me, always supposing that I ever possessed any; and I have no faith in 'mutual affection,' and 'disinterested sacrifice,' and 'self-immolation,' and all this fiddle-faddle which supplies the raw-material of the novel-writers. When I officially offer myself to Miss Trevanion, I shall do so by urging upon her acceptance my rank and the family diamonds; I shall talk to her, not of my own feelings, but of Woodlyn Castle and Downmere Abbey; not of the color of her eyes, but of the style of her equipage; I shall appeal to her ambition, not to her heart; excite her self-value, not her sensibilities; and, rely on it that my method is the only rational one with any woman who has passed her teens, and learned to look at life in its true aspect. Taxes upon vanity do not require to be voted by parliament; they can always be levied without difficulty; and I am greatly deceived in you, my good friend, if you have reared your daughter for the purpose of seeing her settle herself in a cottage over-grown with honeysuckles, and over-run with earwigs."

"Far from it, my lord; far from it," replied Mr. Trevanion; "nor is Ida Trevanion at all calculated for a life of privation and struggle; a conviction which tends to increase my satisfaction when your lordship did me the favor to demand her hand. Indeed, so thoroughly resolved have I ever been that she should only marry into that sphere in which she is so well calculated to shine, and thus to re-integrate not only herself, but me also, in the position which I lost through the injustice of my relatives, that I assured her—and with truth—that in the event of her disappointing my wishes, not one shilling of my property should ever devolve to her."

"A forcible argument," smiled the earl complacently, stroking down the leg which rested on the chair before him, "and one which will, no doubt, prove more efficacious than a whole volume of sentiment. You are a sensible man, Mr. Trevanion, a very sensible man; and the conviction that you were superior even to your present position—highly honorable as that is in itself, I admit—was, to me one great inducement to overlook what some of my friends were inclined to consider as an inequality of rank, when I offered my hand to your daughter."

The blood rose to the cheek of the merchant. "Your lordship does me honor," he said coldly, "but I trust that even elevated as your position undoubtedly is, the contemplated marriage can scarcely be regarded a mésalliance. My own family —"

"I know it, my good sir, I know it;" hastily interposed the peer; "on her father's side Miss Trevanion had every right to pretend to the rank which I am happy enough to offer to her —while, as regards her maternal descent, why, we must accept her youth, beauty, and accomplishments as a substitute for blood. I have already carefully considered all the bearings of the question, and am satisfied with the result. It is, however, unfortunate that you are not on terms with your uncle, as his presence at the ceremony would have given a prestige to the affair which would have told well in the world. Not that the thing is material, certainly not; my position is one which, as a natural consequence, renders me independent of such considerations; and I confess that I shall regard myself as a very happy man when I become the possessor of so much youth and beauty; and feel, as I shall have every right to do, that I have fulfilled to the letter the duty which I owed to my family."

"I am obliged by so flattering an assurance;" said Mr. Trevanion, though he looked infinitely less gratified than he sought to appear; "nor do I apprehend that your lordship need fear any very severe animadversion on the part of your friends when the dowry of my daughter is taken into consideration in addition to her personal merits."

"True, true;" replied the earl, somewhat impatiently; "but, after all, are we not rather premature in our self-gratulation, if, as you hinted a while back, I have failed to find favor in the eyes of the young lady herself?"

"Nay, nay; I can admit no such construction of my remark;" objected the merchant; "I merely sought to impress upon your lordship the policy of a little more attention on your part."

"While I on the contrary give myself no small credit for my diplomacy, my good friend;" said Lord Downmere; "charming as she is, my fair bride-elect is still a woman, and she may have no especial taste for a husband whose years outnumber those of her father; thus, rely on it, the less I absorb her time and attention the more likely she will be to overlook the disparity, which is, I flatter myself, the only valid objection which she can offer to our union."

"I think, my lord;" said Mr. Trevanion, "that you do Ida injustice as well as yourself; Time—when we bring ourselves to look the truth steadily in the face—is to the full as much our friend as our enemy. He plants wrinkles in our foreheads, I admit, but even while doing so, he engrafts wisdom in our hearts; he strews threads of silver among our hair, but he condenses experience and warning in our minds, and thus more than compensates for his petty larcenies by a full-handed liberality which we are too slow to acknowledge until its actual value is forced upon us."

"A very happy view of the case, my good sir, and one which deserves to become popular;" replied the peer, petting his gouty leg with increased tenderness; "though, unfortunately, it is never likely to do so. It is a trite saying that gray hairs are honorable, and there can be no doubt of the fact; but it is equally certain that it is an honor with which every one is satisfied to dispense as long as possible. However, as you advise me to venture upon a more assiduous course of homage, I shall follow your counsel, only hoping that you may have been able to inspire your brilliant daughter with a portion of your own wisdom."

"I am glad that you have arrived at such a resolution, my lord, for trust me when I assure you that no woman's heart is to be won by proxy."

"Heart! pshaw! do not let us travel back into Utopia, Trevanion; I have already been sufficiently explicit as to my aticipations on that score. Hearts are merely heavy luggage with which to be hampered on the journey of life, and it is far better to travel untrammeled. It is Miss Trevanion's hand which I have asked of you, and which I shall ask of herself; she is a gentlewoman and a woman of the world; she will, therefore, understand what is due to both of us, and I require no more. I wish I could induce you to try one of these côtelettes au jus—my cook is famous for them."

"I am obliged to you, my lord, but I have already breakfasted."

"I am sorry for it, for I can conscientiously recommend them. However, you know best. Well then, I will decidedly drive to Richmond this morning, and settle the business. I am no friend to delay, when once a thing is settled in my own mind; and, under all circumstances, I think that the sooner matters are concluded on this occasion the better. The season is nearly over, town is beginning to thin, and Miss Trevanion will not, in all probability, be averse to spending her summer at Woodlyn Castle."

We have said that Mr. Trevanion was a proud man, and so in truth he was; and yet, so resolutely did he cling to his one darling project, that he ben this haughty spirit to tolerate the insolent egotism of the cold-hearted noble, who was, should he succeed in overcoming the repugnance of his daughter, to render that daughter the instrument of his revenge upon his relations. Had he witnessed a similar exhibition of self-abasement in another, his contempt would have known no bounds, but he was blinded to his own degradation by the wretched idiosyncrasy which he had nourished for years, and which had been the hidden spring of his every thought and action.

That Ida, the proud, the beautiful, and the gifted, should be wooed after such a fashion might well have revolted him, but he would not look beyond the fact that the wooer was one whose rank and station must compel the haughty spirit of Sir Jasper to bend before him; while they would, in all probability, induce him to sue for a renewal of that intercourse which he had been so eager to terminate for ever. The only doubt by which he was tormented was caused by Ida herself; he did not forget throughout the interview which he had courted, and during which he had suffered an amount of mortification greater than any to which he had ever been subjected since the day on which he became an alien and an outcast from the home of his ancestors—he did not for one moment forget that when he had parted from his daughter, he had left her in no mood to tolerate the addresses of her titled suitor; she might persist in the insane resolve which she had announced to him—she might peremptorily decline the hand of the Earl, and thus thwart the hope of his whole life—she might—but no! Lord Downmere had truly said that, after all, beautiful as she was, gifted as she was, she was a woman, and as she no doubt would be, by the glitter of a coronet, with its concomitant attractions. And so Mr. Trevanion sagely resolved to think no more of the matter until he returned home to ascertain the result of the peer's visit; and he accordingly proceeded to the city, transacted business as usual, authorized the transfer of thousands, dictated letters, and occupied himself as he was wont to do, haunted throughout every detail by the flashing eye and firm demeanor of his rebel child, and wincing from time to time as the suspicion would force itself upon him, that her will might after all prove as unbending as his own.

'Therefore to be won,'

CHAPTER IX.

A LOVER AND HIS MISTRESS.

THE life of Miss Trevanion had hitherto flowed on with all the smoothness of a rivulet, shadowed perhaps at times by some slight sorrow, as the stream is darkened by an overhanging bough, but soon recovering its brilliancy, and once more gliding gladly onward under the broad light of a sunny heaven. Happy in the present and confident in the future, the petted heiress had known no real care; nor had she even guessed how fatally her own nature was constituted to ruffle the current of its existence when its tide should be impeded by adverse circumstances, until she became conscious of a growing partiality for Sydney Elphinstone. When the suspicion of this preference first arose in her mind, she struggled resolutely against it, for not only did she at once perceive that such an attachment must inevitably prove distasteful to her father, to whose ambition she was no stranger, but it also revolted her own good sense when she remembered that she was several years his senior; while it must at the same time be confessed that her vanity took the alarm, as such was by no means the realization of her previous dreams.

Accustomed from her earliest youth to regard high rank as the foundation of all earthly honor and even happiness, she had ever associated the idea of marriage with luxury and station. She had, in fact, dreamed as girls ever dream before that inner life, which is the most powerful position of existence, is aroused; and while fancy supplies the place of feeling, such baseless visions suffice to employ the imagination; and where the nature is finely organized they seldom endure long; the heart makes its low whispers heard, faintly indeed, it may be, for a time, but so perseveringly that they can not long remain unheeded; and then commences the stern conflict between the real and the ideal, the sharp warfare between the outer world of action, and the inner world of passion, which may indeed be hidden from the crowd, but never wholly deadened, save in despair or in the grave.

Miss Trevanion was startled by the vehemence of her own feelings. Accustomed as she had been to see herself the first object with all around her, the idol and the pride of her family, to whom her every wish was a law, she had never suspected the depth and strength of her own nature; but when, ere Mr. Elphinstone had ventured to hint at his admiration for herself, she on one occasion saw him apparently engrossed by a fair girl for whom she had previously felt a warm regard, she became painfully aware that she could hate as intensely as she could love; and that her life was destined to be one of perfect happiness or misery. The discovery startled her, and she strove earnestly to liberate herself from the growing thraldom of a passion which both her reason and her pride condemned; but she found both pride and reason powerless before it; high-sounding titles became mere empty words; wealth and station worthless units in the heart's reckoning; and when, after a brief and ineffectual struggle against a weakness for which none could blame her more bitterly than she accused herself, she consented to pledge her faith to the nephew of Lady Mary Brooklands, she yielded up her whole soul to the new and delicious feeling which the assurance of his affection rendered legitimate and sacred.

Still, however, there were moments when she shrank appalled from the strange knowledge which she had so suddenly acquired of herself —when she became aware of the smothered fire within, which, should it ever burst forth, must involve not only her own wretchedness, but that of those who were most dear to her; her pride, her vanity, and her ambition were but as straws borne before the lava-stream of her passion, and buried beneath its burning tide. She learned—and it was a fearful lesson—that while she could give away her whole heart without one reservation, so could she, in like manner, revenge the perfidy by which the full and perfect gift might be cast back upon her.

As this conviction grew upon her mind, she thrust the massy braids from her burning brow, and literally gasped for breath. "It is unwomanly—it is fiendish"—she murmured to herself; "and yet I feel that even so it is. I love him with all the impetuous fervor of my nature; but should he fail—should I be deceived in him—that love will burn into a flame of hate that must destroy us both. Why did he ever cross my path? Why was he thrust upon me? Tutored as I have been for a far different fate, why should he have been gifted with the power of teaching me that I had a heart? I might have gone through life as I had commenced it, toying with trifles, and emulous only of admiration; but now I have cast all my chance of happiness upon one stake, and should I lose it, I shall be worse than beggared!"

It was from such a train of thought as this that Miss Trevanion was aroused by the announcement of the earl's visit. A more timid spirit than her own might have been occupied by her late misunderstanding with her father—the first, be it remembered, which had ever occurred between them—and by his threat of making her want of obedience to his wishes the signal of their total estrangement; but not even for an instant had her thoughts been engrossed by that circumstance, important as it was to her future fate. The intensity of her passion, and the wild jealousy of an exacting nature, rendered all other considerations insignificant in her eyes. She remembered, she felt, only the possibility of change in her heart's idol; she cared not for the struggle, the sacrifices, by which she must win him to herself; she dwelt only on the dread that when won, he might be found wanting——And then?—what would remain to her then? The suffocating throbs of her tortured heart, the fire which shot from her flashing eyes, and the fierce clinching of her slender fingers, afforded a mute but eloquent reply.

As Lord Downmere entered the apartment, Miss Trevanion rose calmly from her seat. It is often in moments of the most intense emotion that strong natures exhibit the greatest power of self-control. She did not dislike the titled egotist who sought her hand, she simply despised him; and although she intuitively suspected the purport of his visit, she received him with as much indifference as though it had merely been dictated by common courtesy.

The storm of passion which had just swept over her spirits had meanwhile tended to heighten her peculiar style of beauty; a warm flush burnt upon her cheek; a brilliant light danced in her eye, and there was a proud statelines in her whole appearance which for a moment startled even the unimpressionable peer.

"I will ring and inform my mother of your lordship's visit, with your permission," she said coldly, as she advanced to the bell; but ere she had reached it, she was arrested by the voice of the earl, who exclaimed eagerly:

"By no means, Miss Trevanion. I beg that Mrs. Trevanion may not be disturbed on my account. My visit was to yourself."

The lady withdrew her hand, and resumed her seat.

"You will no doubt divine its purport;" continued Lord Downmere with more embarassment than he had ever before felt in the presence of any individual upon whom he believed himself about to confer a favor; "your father was with me this morning, and he has led me to anticipate—to hope—that my presence here to-day will not be unwelcome to you."

"By no means, my lord;" was the reply; "this is the hour at which we are accustomed to receive our friends."

"But it is not simply as a friend that I am here;" resumed the earl; "you must be quite aware, Miss Trevanion, of the admiration—the regard—which I have long felt for you; and you will not therefore be surprised to learn that my errand is to lay myself and my coronet at your feet, and to declare to you that I shall be the happiest of men should I prevail on you to accept the offering."

"I am not surprised, my lord;" said Miss Trevanion, retaining all her previous composure; "I will not be guilty of the pitiful affectation of assuming an astonishment which I do not feel; but while I beg of you to receive my acknowledgments for the honor which you desire to confer on me, I am compelled to decline it."

"Very prettily expressed;" smiled the peer emphatically; "I am aware that such is always the first reply of every lady under similar circumstances; but after what has passed between your excellent father and myself, I feel confident that before we part we shall come to a better understanding. In short, my dear Miss Trevanion, after mature reflection, I have arrived at the conviction that you are the only woman upon whom I could confer, without one misgiving, the title of Countess of Downmere. I am not a young man, but I can still appreciate all the perfections of your sex; and in yourself—"

"I entreat of you, my lord, not to deceive yourself;" interposed his listener; "my words were so far from being words of course, that I must request you to receive them in all the strength and fullness of their meaning. I am greatly flattered by your good opinion, and shall be proud to retain you as a friend, but that can be the only bond between us."

"You can not be serious, Miss Trevanion—"

"Perfectly so. In seeking my hand your lordship has been guilty of a grave mistake. We are by no means suited to each other."

"Is it the incompatibility of age?" demanded the earl.

"By no means;" was the reply, as a slight flush rose to the cheek of the lady; "I do not deem the question of age of the slightest consideration in affairs like the present."

"What then can be your objection? I can offer you rank, wealth, and station."

"I am quite aware of the fact, and must be excused if I confess that I attach little value to mere worldly advantages."

"The finest diamonds in England, not excepting Her Majesty's;" followed up the persevering peer.

Ida smiled a smile of scorn; as she said, disdainfully: "Affection and regard are not marketable commodities even in this commercial country; and, as to the diamonds, your lordship will, no doubt find little difficulty in inducing some far more worthy person than myself to wear them."

"I confess," said the discomfited suitor; "that I do not understand your meaning, Miss Trevanion, when you so unhesitatingly declare that we are not suited to each other; I am by no means of an exacting nature; you will have no interference to apprehend from me, and I can not help thinking that when once united we should find many points of resemblance; or, at all events, constant communion would soon induce it."

"Your lordship must pardon me if I declare that I should consider the experiment to be highly dangerous," was the reply; "souls of mere ordinary caliber may lose their distinctive qualities, and, blending into one common mass, neutralize each other; but when individuals are possessed of refined and elastic minds, they do well to remember that there is a point at which attraction may change into repulsion, and not rashly incur so great and fatal a risk."

"In the present case there can at least be no danger of such a result," said Lord Downmere; "and I confess that after my late interview with her father, I was altogether unprepared for such determined coldness on the part of Miss Trevanion; nor is it quite fair to augment my regret at her obduracy by foreing upon me the conviction that she is a wit as well as a beauty."

"Do not say so, my lord; do not say so;" exclaimed his companion, earnestly; "I am the last of my sex, to strive after the reputation of a wit. It is like laying down the cestus of Venus to brandish the club of Hercules, and a woman's strength is, or ought to be, unequal to the task. But your lordship has twice alluded to a recent interview with my father. You surely can not seek to infer that he led you to believe—to anticipate—"

"Pardon me, Miss Trevanion; I received every encouragement from your father to prosecute my suit—every promise of his own influence—and, such being the ease, you will readily understand that I am not to be lightly discouraged. Despite your disclaimer, I suspect that I have in reality taken you by surprise, and that you require time for consideration. You shall have it. I can afford to wait for a few days in order to secure so rich a prize. I will not intrude upon you further upon this occasion. I have faith in the future; and shall leave Mr. Trevanion to explain to you certain points—worldly points—which in the enthusiasm of your age, you have in all probability overlooked."

"I am obliged by your intention, my lord, but I must request that you will not leave me with so mistaken a view of my character and sentiments," said the young lady. "I grieve, deeply grieve, that my father should have misled you, and trust that you will at least exonerate me from the imputation of a similar error."

"Good morning, Miss Trevanion;" said the Earl, blandly stretching forth his hand; "I leave my ease to the advocacy of your father, for, as I before remarked, he can, with more propriety than myself, place before you in their fitting light the advantages which you appear so willing to forego. Be good enough to offer my respects to Mrs. Trevanion. I shall wait your final decision with impatience."

And as he ceased speaking, Lord Downmere bowed himself out of the room.

CHAPTER X.

A TRIAL OF STRENGTH.

The dressing-bell had rung before Mr. Trevanion had reached home, and he was consequently compelled to wait with such patience as he could command for the information which he was anxious to obtain of the result of Lord Downmere's appeal to his daughter, a circumstance which by no means tended to tranquilize his nerves, as the more he suffered his thoughts to dwell upon the previous conversation between himself and Ida, the less confidence he felt in his power to shake her resolution. Like a child who has succeeded in building up a card-house story by story until it has reached a height almost unhoped-for, he dreaded lest his next movement might bring the whole unstable edifice in ruin about him; and yet the move must be made; the work must be terminated; and every moment of suspense became intolerable to him. He hastened his toilet, and descended to the drawing-room, although aware that even should his daughter be already there, a subject of such intense importance to both of them could not be broached with any prospect of a final arrangement in the brief interval between that time and the announcement of dinner; but as the moment approached which was to decide the fruition or the overthrow of his cherished hope, he became restless and irritable, and the self-control which he had exercised throughout the previous portion of the day altogether abandoned him. He threw himself heavily into his well-cushioned chair, caught up the daily paper which lay upon his reading-table, "pished" and "pshawed" over its columns as if each had contained some intelligence peculiarly distasteful to him, and finally suffered it to fall from his hand, and sank into a deep fit of musing. That his reflections were any thing but pleasant ones might be detected at once, for his brow darkened, and he beat nervously upon the floor with his foot, as he sat with his head bent upon his breast, and his gaze riveted upon the carpet. Throughout the whole of his career, with Mr. Trevanion to will had been to accomplish. Even as a boy he had never, as we have shown, suffered himself to be discouraged even under the most trying circumstances, but having fixed his eye steadily upon one point, he had exerted all the energies of his mind to reach it. For this purpose he had compelled his haughty spirit to commerce—for this purpose he had united himself to a woman for whose intellect he entertained the most sovereign contempt, and to whose person he was utterly indifferent; for this purpose he had tolerated and even courted a man whose only recommendation was his exalted position in society; and now, when the goal was almost reached, he suddenly found himself thwarted by his own child; found an apparently impassable barrier raised upon his own hearth; and after having compelled success on the broad highway of the world, discovered that utter defeat might await him in his home, where he had hitherto believed himself to be all-powerful.

To his stern and unbending nature this first check, end as it might, was gall and wormwood; he felt humbled, when he found himself compelled to measure his strength with that of a mere girl, for as such he still regarded his daughter; it was monstrous to feel that she could venture to oppose his wishes, be they what they might, and still more monstrous to know that she held his destiny in her hands. He was impatient for her appearance; he believed that he could instantly divine from her manner the determination at which she had arrived; but first Mrs. Trevanion entered the room with her faint greeting, to which he replied only by a slight movement of the head, as she slid into her accustomed seat, and drew her shawl about her without hazarding a second remark; and next, Lady Mary Brooklands sailed majestically in, heralded by the sharp rustling of her rich dress, and smiling blandly upon her host, who, had he dared to betray the real feeling with which he once more met her, would not assuredly have welcomed her appearance by the words of studied courtesy which he compelled himself to utter; and then, just when the last bell rang, the butler as he threw open the door, at once admitted Miss Trevanion, and announced dinner.

The merchant turned one glance—and but one—upon his daughter, ere, according to his usual custom, he offered his arm to Lady Mary, and the result of that glance was unsatisfactory, affording as it did no solution of the mystery which he sought to penetrate. She was as calm, as graceful, and as self-possessed, as though her fair brow had never been ruffled by an anxiety or a care; and as he proceeded to the dining-room, the stern expression of Mr. Trevanion's features became sterner still. Had she betrayed emotion of any kind, had he detected the faintest flush of anger upon her cheek, the slightest flash of defiance in her eye, the least tremor in her voice, as she moved across the floor to assist her mother from the room, he would have been satisfied, for he might have read irresolution, fear, or temper, in such indications of feeling, but he had not studied human nature so closely for years, without learning that a settled purpose never betrays itself by petty weaknesses.

At table, Miss Trevanion was neither more silent nor more voluble than usual; her well-modulated voice retained its accustomed tone as she addressed himself; she listened to her mother's captious complaints, and to Lady Mary's brilliant small-talk, as patiently and as courteously as was her habit, and vainly did her father watch for one symptom of discomposure or uneasiness.

"The struggle will be a sharp one," murmured the merchant to himself, as on the termination of the meal the ladies retired, and he rose and paced the floor like a caged lion; "well, be it so, it will not be the first from which I have come out the victor. She conceives my threat to have been an idle one, and does not believe that I shall meet her determination with one as firm. She presumes upon my affection while she makes no effort to retain it. She does not know that, like a child playing with the fire, she will be the victim of her own folly. But it it shall be so; I will not be the only sacrifice. The labor of a whole existence shall not be lost through the headstrong obstinacy of a woman, without her bearing her own share of the suffering. Let her refuse Lord Downmere at her peril. She shall become his wife—she shall work out the one great purpose of my existence, or I will disown her forever—cast her off to the poverty which she affects to treat so lightly—leave her free to beggar herself with her penniless husband, and to feel how widely the fact of such a sacrifice differs from its theory. But I must learn what passed between her and the earl. I was a fool to urge his coming here to-day, while the spirit of resistance was still strong upon her; no doubt the selfish dotard piqued her pride by his assumption of superiority. I should have been present at the interview; but all is not yet lost; the hour of weakness is over; she owes me the obedience of a child, and I will exact it."

Full of this resolution, Mr. Trevanion passed into the library, and ringing the bell with violence, directed that his daughter might be informed that he desired her presence. His summons was promptly obeyed, and he had scarcely seated himself, when with a calm step and a steady eye, Ida entered the apartment.

"I have sent for you, Miss Trevanion," he commenced, as she advanced toward him, "in order to learn the result of Lord Downmere's visit; with his motive I am already acquainted; and I now wish to hear what reply was made to his proposal

"It was declined, sir, definitively, but I trust courteously."

"And did his lordship bow to such a decision, may I ask? Was he satisfied to receive as a final answer the rejection with which you saw fit to requite the honor that he had done you?"

"I hope, sir, that I left no doubt upon his mind of the sincerity of my meaning. I should scorn to trifle with the feelings of an individual who had evinced toward me the preference expressed by Lord Downmere."

"That is no answer to my question, Miss Trevanion," said her father harshly; "I desire to know whether his lordship parted from you, convinced that his suit was unsuccessful?"

"As far as regarded my own feelings and determination, most certainly."

"But he did not, nevertheless, consent to resign his pretensions—is that what I am to understand?"

"Precisely. He professed to leave his cause in your hands, sir, believing, or affecting to believe, that his rank, his wealth, and his family diamonds, would plead in his favor more forcibly with yourself than with me."

"Be careful, young lady, you assume a tone strangely unbecoming in our relative positions. Do not add disrespect to your disobedience."

"You mistake me painfully if you suppose me capable of sarcasm," said Miss Trevanion, and for a moment her lip quivered; "no, sir; the contempt which my tone perhaps involuntarily betrayed, was called forth by the scorn I felt for the man who could suspect my father to be guilty of so much meanness."

"Seat yourself, Ida, and listen to me," said Mr. Trevanion more mildly than he had yet spoken; "it is essential that we should perfectly understand each other, for this is an important crisis in both our lives. Henceforth we must be every thing or nothing to each other. Reflect seriously on what I am about to say. My life has been, as you know, one long period of mortification, brightened only by the vision of one day paying back into the bosoms of those who injured me, the bitterness with which they filled my own. This I could not do simply by amassing wealth—had it been otherwise I should have required no co-adjutor in the struggle—but by placing myself on an equality with the noblest and the proudest in the land. My hope rested on you, Ida—on you, so richly gifted by nature, to overcome the last obstacle with which I had to contend. It may now be realized—you have a peer of the realm at your feet—the coronet of a countess awaiting your acceptance—will you disappoint my hopes? will you compel me to curse the hour in which I trusted to the strength and devotion of a daughter's love?"

The beautiful head of Ida drooped as she listened. She had nerved herself to contend against violence and opposition; she had felt strong in the conviction of her right of free action, and of her privilege to bestow her hand where she had already bestowed her affections; but although her resolution did not waver for an instant, the altered manner of her father sent a pang to her heart, and for a moment rendered her unable to reply. Mr. Trevanion instantly perceived his advantage, and hastened to profit by the impression which he had made.

"You will not do this," he pursued earnestly; "I feel that you will not by one mad act negative the anticipations of years. Remember, Ida, all that I have been to you. Look around you, and ask yourself if you have hitherto found cause to envy, not merely the fate of those of your own rank in society, but that of others far more highly born. You have been the child of luxury and indulgence; you have never formed a wish which I have not sought to gratify; I have spared nothing—neither gold nor exertion—to fit you for the station which I was resolved that you should attain; and, up to this day, you have seconded me nobly; nor can I believe that you will fail me now."

"I am grateful—most grateful"—faltered out his listener.

"And you have cause to be so," continued Mr. Trevanion, overlooking in his eagerness to compel his daughter's submission to his will, that an open avowal of his motives for the indulgence upon which he dilated must necessarily weaken his hold upon her feelings, "for, I need scarcely explain to you, who so well understand my nature, that I should never have made such sacrifices had I not had an ulterior object in view. I acted in regard to yourself upon the same principle which has regulated every action of my life. Once more I tell you, frankly, that you have been reared and educated to assist in the prosecution of my one darling scheme; I have watched and waited patiently for the moment in which it should be realized—that moment has come at last, and I look to you to secure me against a failure which would blight my whole after-life."

"And you ask me to farther the gratification of a vindictive feeling by the sacrifice of my own hopes of happiness, if indeed I understand you rightly," said the daughter, with a heightened color; "and you seek to impress upon me that I owe the tenderness and care which have been lavished upon me to no affection on your part—to compel me to feel that I have been regarded less as a child than as a tool which has been gradually tempered to its destined use! Surely, sir, you employ strange arguments to enforce your purpose. Have the talents which you pride yourself on having nurtured; the beauty which you confess has reconciled you to my sex; no higher value in your eyes—in the eyes of a parent, and he the parent of an only child—than any mere base and sordid agent by which you may hope to accomplish your wishes? You have said that it is essential we should understand each other; do we do so now? In pity tell me, no! I have so long paid you back every kindness in love and reverence, that I dare not trust myself to think that my affection has been unrequited."

"I shall believe in that affection when I see its fruits;" said Mr. Trevanion coldly; "it is easy to profess a feeling which involves neither sacrifice nor trial; it is only to be trusted when it stands the ordeal of both."

"Thus then suffer me to test the depth of yours, my father!" exclaimed his daughter imploringly; "am I not your child—your only one?—and will you seek, for the vain gratification of a vengeance which may after all fail in the attainment of its object, to condemn me to a blighted and loveless existence? Can an alliance with a Lord Downmere, a man whom, were it not for the mere accident of rank, you would despise, ennoble you in the eyes of your estranged and haughty relatives? Will they not rather scorn you for a weakness which must shame your noble nature?"

"Permit me to be the best judge of the result of my own actions, Miss Trevanion;" was the curt rejoinder; "you, in your ignorance of the world, are quite unable to form a rational opinion on such a subject. Perhaps, when you find the door of your father closed against you, and are put forth to strive and struggle with the world, as it was once my fate to be, you will be better able to appreciate my feelings. At present your ideas of such a destiny are doubtless vague enough—your romantic notions would probably drape beggary in a tinsel petticoat and nourish it upon chickens' wings; but I beg to assure you that it is fed and clad far otherwise; and that I owe the privilege of having exchanged its rags and black bread for the comforts of existence, to a resolute will and an indomitable energy. Do not imagine, however, that I have forgotten to whom I was indebted for the chance of failure; or that I will not repay the wrong. If I have been content to wait, it has been because mine was no weak and timid spirit likely to be seared by difficulties; I know with whom I have to deal; I know that there is one method, and but one, of revenging the cruel injuries which have been heaped upon me. Could I have bowed the pride of my puling uncle or his arrogant wife by gold, I should have needed no co-adjutor, and your marriage with a pauper would have been a matter of indifference; but it is not so; and your alliance with this peer, scorn him as you may, is consequently an imperative necessity."

"Hear me in my turn, sir;" said his daughter with calm dignity; "had you been poor, or even dishonored, and that my self-abnegation, the sacrifice of my whole life, could have restored you to affluence or to honor, I would have placed my fate in your hands without a murmur, too happy to have been thus enabled to repay the debt I owe you; but I will not consent to be made the victim of a chimera—the tool of a caprice. From the moment when you first acquainted me with the intentions of Lord Downmere, I frankly told you that he was not merely indifferent, but positively disagreeable to me—"

"But you did not in your boasted frankness, add that such was the case because you had seen fit to form another attachment," interposed Mr. Trevanion.

"I did not, because at that time I had come to no resolution on the subject; but even had I decided against Mr. Elphinstone, I should not assuredly have accepted the earl as a substitute; I declare, however, that I was then free, in so far as regarded any pledge or promise to another; for I was well aware, that the suit of Sydney could not be otherwise than unwelcome to yourself, while I was at the same time keenly alive to the apparent risk which I should incur by an union with a man my junior in age; nor was it until I had become conscious that my happiness depended upon this marriage that I could bring myself to incur your displeasure; and I entreat of you to believe that I did so ultimately with a reluctance and regret which have cost me many bitter tears."

"You will have many still more bitter yet to shed, should you persist in your present insane purpose, Miss Trevanion;" said her father; "for although you have been pleased to designate my legitimate desire to re-integrate myself in society as a 'chimera' and a 'caprice,' I beg to assure you, that I will not be thwarted by a whim. Lord Downmere has, you say, left his cause in my hands and he has done well, for as your parent I have a right to enforce your obedience. I am aware that you calculate upon your legal power to set my wishes at defiance: I do not dispute it; but you have forgotten to calculate upon the opinion of the world. Are you prepared to encounter its ridicule and its blame? Are you strong enough to spurn its avoidance and its contempt? you are no longer an ignorant and willful girl, whose folly might be poetized into romance; you have seen enough of society to know that its sympathies will not be enlisted on the side of a woman who has reached her six-and-twentieth year, and who deliberately throws herself away upon a penniless boy."

"I care little for the opinion of the world, sir;" said Ida, firmly; "I have, as you say, seen and judged it; and I know, and can fully appreciate, its hollowness. Were that the only difficulty with which I should be called upon to contend, I should not waste one thought upon the subject."

"But, as I need scarcely again inform you, it is by no means the only one;" coldly observed the merchant; "although I may be permitted to remark that even were it so, it is not to be dismissed so lightly. Hitherto you have, surrounded by affluence and adulation, found the world a warm and willing friend; you will, in a reverse of fortune, find it a keen and bitter enemy; and one which no woman can defy with impunity; and mark me when I tell you —for I do so advisedly—that you will have to make the trial."

"So be it then;" said Ida, sadly; "I can no longer hesitate. Had you sought to detach me from Mr. Elphinstone by entreaty and affection, I might perchance have yielded—I know not—but it might have been so; now, however, the die is cast, for I were unworthy the love of any honorable man if I could abandon him from mercenary motives. I understand the threat which you have held out—I am to be disinherited. If such be indeed your will, I must submit; I may feel the injustice of the sentence, but I can not question your right of action."

"That is at least fortunate," observed her father, ironically.

"Nor shall I suffer myself to be dismayed by the prospect," pursued Ida. "It is hard, no doubt, to wrestle single-handed with the world, but in such a strife even defeat is not altogether without honor; our hands, heads, and hearts were bestowed upon us in order that we might be enabled to help ourselves; and the honest struggle for independence has ever an ennobling effect, while the poor tame spirit that is content to remain a burden upon others at the expense of its best and worthiest feelings, rather than boldly to launch out into the ocean of life, and resolutely to buffet its billows, must necessarily, with its own loss of dignity, incur the contempt of all around it."

"Very eloquently put," said Mr. Trevanion, still in the same accent of sarcasm; "but you must excuse me if I say that your well-rounded periods on this occasion remind me of a coarse daub set in a costly frame; it may be surrounded by glitter, but it remains as worthless as ever. However, you have explained your determination, and fully understand mine; we shall shortly see which is of the most avail, you either marry Lord Downmere, or you cease to be my daughter."

"Father—dear father!" exclaimed Ida imploringly.

"Do not exhaust your talents at the commencement of the tragedy, Miss Trevanion;" said the merchant; "I ask for deeds, not words; and if you decline to prove your affection, I beg of you not to express it. As Countess of Downmere, you are my heiress—as Mrs. Elphinstone, you are without a home in my house."

Ida rose; her cheek was very pale, and there was a convulsive movement about her mouth, which betrayed the depth of her agony. She leant for an instant upon the table before her, as if unable to support herself, as she turned a long and appealing look upon her father; but the eyes that met hers were cold and stony; and after the lapse of a second, Mr. Trevanion with ceremonious politeness threw open the door of the library, and so soon as his daughter had crossed the threshold quietly closed it behind her.

CHAPTER XI.

MISS TREVANION TO MR. ELPHINSTONE.

"I PLEDGED myself to write to you, Sydney, and I redeem my promise. I assured you that I could be firm when our mutual happiness was at stake, and I almost begin to fear that I have been firm even to sin. Nor is this all—for while incurring the displeasure of my father, I have, I fear, rendered our union impossible. Be honest with me, Sydney, and above all be just to yourself; when I tell you that in becoming your wife I cease to be the daughter of Mr. Trevanion. I shall no longer be the petted and pampered heiress, but a disowned and disinherited child, whose poverty can only tend to aggravate your own. I know my father well—such has been his declared decision; and I am well aware that even although in secret he may weep tears of blood, he will never reseind it. For myself I care not; for beggary as your wife would be a happier fate for me than the most fabulous affluence with another. Let not that consideration, however, have any weight with you; a woman's world is her home—her ambition does not travel beyond her own hearth; but with your sex it is far otherwise; and you Sydney, are still very young, too young to sacrifice all your hopes and prospects in life to an affection which—bear with me when I remind you of such a possibility—may one day fail. And even were it to endure through every trial and hardship, yet remember that home-cares and home-anxieties must cripple your exertions and weaken your energies. You were born for a brilliant destiny, and you deserve it. Renounce your claim to my hand; assert yourself, and do justice to the noble talents that you possess. Do not suppose that I say this lightly. In liberating you, I desire no freedom for myself. If I never bear your name, neither will I accept that of any man on earth. My future happiness and pride shall consist in watching your career, in exulting over your success, in praying for your prosperity. Reflect seriously—for the crisis is an awful one to both of us—whether indeed the affection which you have vowed to me has not been unconsciously to yourself, deepened by the circumstances under which we have hitherto met. You saw me the spoiled child of fortune, whatever beauty I possess, heightened by dress, and perfected by art; whatever accomplishments I may have acquired, exerted amid scenes which lent them a prestige not their own. You may have deceived yourself, and how fatal must such an error prove alike to yourself and me. Look beyond the present, Sydney; endeavor to realize that years have passed over us both—years of struggle. You will still be in the full pride of manhood and of hope, competent to struggle with the world, still an object of admiration—a mark for that world's homage. But I, Sydney, what will those years have done for me? Already far before you in the race of life, I shall have reached the turning-point; and withered, changed—I can not proceed, Sydney—but I can feel the rest! No, no; it must not be—look on the past as a dream; have the courage to awaken; and in after years I shall hear you thank me for your release. IDA."

Calmly, and with a steady hand, Miss Trevanion sealed and closed her letter, but her fingers were as cold and bloodless as marble; and although her eyes were tearless they were dilated, and the transparent lids hot and discolored, as though the drops which should have fallen had burnt and blistered there. For a time she sat thrown back upon her chair, with her gaze fastened upon the fateful missive. It contained indeed the destiny of her future life, and she dared not ask herself how it would be answered.

After a while she raised her head, and looked languidly about her; luxury surrounded her on every side; her glance traveled from silken hangings to gorgeous mirrors—from costly toys to jeweled cabinets and flowers, and birds, and books, and all the other appliances of wealth and taste with which her hitherto indulgent father had delighted to environ her; and as she noted each in its turn, an expression of loathing passed over her countenance. It was for vanities such as these that she had been urged to barter away her self-respect—to sell her liberty—to perjure her faith—to crush her heart; and it was from the fear of losing these that she had voluntarily offered to resign Sydney Elphinstone. But no, no; not from this fear for herself, but for him—and could it be that he would prize them so dearly as to accept her self-abnegation in order to secure them? Did she not wrong him by suspicion? And yet who should say? And then once more arose the fatal thought—"He is so young—the world and all its gauds are still so bright for him. Let him but look into the future, as I have urged, and then—" she did not pursue the anticipation further, but with a convulsive shudder that shook her whole frame, she clasped her spread hands on the table, near which she sat, and buried her throbbing brow in their open palms.

How long she had continued thus motionless in her misery she knew not, when she was aroused by a gentle knocking at the door of her room, which slowly opened, and Lady Mary Brooklands entered, and closed it behind her.

"My dear Ida;" said her visitor as she tenderly approached her, and took a seat by her side; "what is the meaning of this terrible emotion? What has happened?"

"Oh, my kind friend, I am very, very, wretched;" was the faint reply, as one large scalding tear rolled down the fever-crimsoned cheek of the unhappy girl; "I have just gone through a scene with my father which has nearly destroyed me."

"Just gone through such a scene, my sweet child;" exclaimed the noble widow; "you have surely had time to compose yourself since the interview took place, for I have myself been closeted with Mr. Trevanion in the library for the last two hours."

"But he has surely not expressed any displeasure toward you?" said Ida anxiously; "whatever cause of complaint he may have against myself, you, at least, are guiltless in this affair."

"No, no; apprehend nothing on my account;" replied her friend with proud composure; "Mr. Trevanion is a man of the world, and has sufficient regard for my rank, whatever may be his feelings toward myself personally, to avoid any undue exhibition of temper in our intercourse. On the contrary, throughout the whole of the interview to which I have alluded, nothing could exceed his suavity; and although I detected a certain coldness in his manner which betrayed a suspicion that I felt to be totally undeserved on my part, I refrained from any observation which might tend to show him that I was conscious of the change, feeling that situated as I am in this family, my rôle should universally be that of a mediator; and as such you are aware that I have universally striven to act."

"I am indeed well aware of it, dear Lady Mary;" said Miss Trevanion affectionately "but as my father appeared to think that you had favored the addresses of Sydney, and refused to receive my assurances to the contrary, I feared that he might have expressed the same suspicion to yourself."

"That he does so believe, I am convinced;" was the quiet rejoinder; "but as I felt that such was not the case, I would not afford him the triumph of perceiving that I considered the suspicion to be possible; for had I done so I could not of course have remained under his roof; and the rather, as you know how utterly unjust it would have been, since I had never been admitted to your confidence—that my advice had never been sought, and that I was of course completely ignorant of the engagement between yourself and my nephew."

"It is true that I did not solicit your advice;" said Miss Trevanion; "because I felt that had I done so I should have rendered your position one of difficulty and delicacy from your relationship to Mr. Elphinstone, although I could not doubt that you must have perceived our mutual attachment."

"By no means, my dear girl, by no means;" was the ready disclaimer of the lady; "I had now for many years been so accustomed to see you an object of admiration to all by whom you have been approached, that I considered Sydney only as an additional mote sporting in the sunshine of your smiles, or you may rest assured that I should have warned you of the policy of such an attachment. It is true that the poor boy is handsome and intellectual as well as high-born; and, I really believe, truly amiable and honorable; but still he is poor, and I therefore imagined it impossible that with all your advantages you would ever dream of making such a sacrifice."

"Surely, dear Lady Mary, you at least should have known me better than to suppose that I could marry for mere wealth or rank."

"Forgive me, Ida, if I have so far done you injustice," was the fond reply of her visitor as she passed her arm round the waist of Miss Trevanion, and drew her gently to her bosom; "but you must remember that I was fully aware of your father's views and wishes; and I knew him to be absolute in his family; and that from the nature of your education, and your great success in the world, I had every reason to anticipate that you would become so wife of a man of decided rank. How, then, do you conceive it probable that I should even for a moment dream of your bestowing yourself upon poor Sydney. Why, my sweet child, much as I am compelled to admire your beautiful disinterestedness, I can even now scarcely bring myself to credit the fact."

"But tell me, my dear friend," said her listener, involuntarily soothed by the placid kindness of her manner, "had I ventured to confide the truth to you, should you have blamed me for my love of Sydney?"

"Blamed you, darling? No, I should not certainly have, had the heart to blame your unselfish generosity; but still I should have felt it my duty to discourage the attachment as one which could not fail to excite the displeasure of your father, who had, as you must yourself admit, every right to be ambitious for such a daughter; and even now my errand is to dissuade you from persisting in this unpropitious engagement."

"At my father's request?" asked Ida.

"Yes, love, at Mr. Trevanion's request, who appears to place great faith in my influence, far greater than I fear it deserves. He has strenuously urged me to exert all my eloquence in pointing out what he considers as the madness and folly of such a marriage, and you see that I am conscientiously doing so. He moreover requested me to represent the policy and propriety of your union with Lord Downmere; and I must be confessed, Ida, that, in a worldly point of view, there can be no comparison between the two."

"Is Lord Downmere the husband you would have selected for me, Lady Mary?"

"Perhaps not, dearest, perhaps not precisely; but he is, you know, as a peer of the realm and a man of enormous wealth, a very desirable match. There can be no doubt that you can do much worse."

"I scarcely think it possible," said Miss Trevanion, with a shade of haughtiness, "that is, however, a point which we need not discuss, as it is one upon which my mind is unalterably decided. Happen what may, I will never become Countess of Downmere; I should despise myself, could I be mercenary enough to barter my happiness for such considerations to such a man."

"Well, my love, you know best, of course; while it is quite certain, that if you have really resolved to give your hand to my nephew—if you really feel that he possesses your affections—we can only hope that Mr. Trevanion will, after a time, become reconciled to the marriage. Still I must, as I have promised, caution you, that all your friends will regard it as an imprudence. But if you feel that your happiness depends on him, I actually have not the courage to distress you by any further arguments. Indeed, under the peculiar circumstances, I almost feel it a treason against Sydney to say another word upon the subject; for I can not forget that he is my sister's son, and that he is, moreover, a man of whose alliance any father might be proud. However, I must not suffer the affections of a relative to seduce me into a failure against friendship, and I am anxious to be able to assure Mr. Trevanion that I have performed my onerous mission faithfully."

"Of any after-reconciliation with my father, when I have once become the wife of Sydney, I am utterly hopeless," said Ida sadly; "I know that once to have incurred his anger and thwarted his will, is to have forfeited his affection for ever. No, he will never forgive me."

"Nonsense, silly child," exclaimed Lady Mary Brooklands, laughingly; "do you forget that your father is a wealthy man, and that you are his only child, and must, consequently, one day inherit that wealth? Do you suppose that after having throughout life exerted all his energies to make his daughter a mark for the admiration and envy of the world, he will long permit his affections to be alienated from the idol which he has himself set up? No, no; trust me, he will desire to see his ample fortune produce its legitimate effect, and for that purpose, if for no other, you are certain of forgiveness."

"I can not entertain any such hope, my good friend," sighed Miss Trevanion; "I do not seek to do so for a moment, as I feel convinced that ultimate disappointment must ensue. My father, with all his noble qualities, never forgives—he is truth itself—and he has assured me that in the event of my disobedience, he will bequeath every shilling of which he is possessed to the son of Sir Jasper."

Her companion visibly started. "You know him well, my dear Lady Mary," she pursued, "and therefore you will readily understand that he will fulfill his word; while I do not hesitate to confess that bitterly as I feel, and ever shall feel, his displeasure and his estrangement, the thought that instead, as I had fondly hoped, of enriching Sydney, and of affording him the opportunity of displaying his brilliant talents with the effect that they deserve, I shall go to him helpless and almost penniless, and thus increase his struggle with the world, is yet more painful."

Lady Mary remained silent for a moment, and then said in a constrained tone, very different from that in which she had hitherto carried on the conversation: "I can well believe it, my dear, for in the present factitious state of society, it is impossible for any individual to do justice to himself, however highly gifted he may be by nature, unless he has the means of improving his advantages. I do not for a moment suspect Sydney of any mercenary views; indeed I believe him to be incapable of such considerations, particularly when you are the object of his affections, but still the imprudence of undertaking the responsibility of a family under such circumstances, will, undoubtedly be very great; nor, my love, must you be hurt if I venture to remind you that this imprudence will be considerably increased by the disparity of age which exists between you. You will, as I before urged upon you, really do well to reflect before you decide; as these particulars may not have struck you before, I considered it my imperative duty to point them out."

"Pardon me, madam," said Miss Trevanion, haughtily, as she rose with a flushed cheek and a flashing eye; "I am not the heartless egotist you think me. I have considered all and more of the difficulties which a marriage with me might entail upon Mr. Elphinstone, than even you have enumerated. Nor have I simply grieved over them in selfish sorrow; there—" and as she spoke she pointed toward the letter which still lay upon her desk; "there, I have forced them upon the attention of your nephew himself—there, I have urged him to consider them as insurmountable, and to resign his claim upon my hand. If I am fated to a life of suffering, I am at least willing to suffer alone."

"You are warm, Ida!"

"Perhaps so." said Miss Trevanion, and she sank back into her seat, "but you must pardon me—it is hard, very hard, to be abandoned by all in whom you have trusted; but I thank you, Lady Mary, for having kept me no longer in suspense as to the support I might expect from your affection. You have indeed complied even to the very letter with the request of my father—your mission has been fulfilled as conscientiously as you could desire; and now I have but one request to make of you, and I make it unhesitatingly, as it can not by any possibility involve your interests. Should Mr. Elphinstone, your nephew, after having received that letter, persevere in seeking the disinherited daughter of Mr. Trevanion as his wife, it is more than possible that Lady Mary Brooklands, may be solicited still to remain his guest, and to do the honors of his house—and oh! if indeed it should be so," she added, as her voice sank and her lip quivered, "be kind to my poor mother, I shall not be there to support her weakness, and to conceal from her the isolation of her neglected and wasted existence—and believe me, that, careless as he may appear of her happiness, my father will in his heart, thank you for the care of her."

"Miss Trevanion, I do not understand you," faltered Lady Mary.

"No—you are right, you do not understand me;" was the reply; "but you may one day do so: meanwhile, this interview has ceased to be pleasant to either party, and I will not detain you longer."

"Ida, your impetuous feelings will be your ruin," said her companion harshly.

"It may be so," murmured the unhappy girl, despondently; "it may be so: at present I am only the victim of the passions of others."

"What am I to say to your father, Miss Trevanion?" asked Lady Mary, as she rose to depart.

"Tell him all that has passed between us;" was the indignant rejoinder; "I have no cause to shrink from one word that I have uttered, I have no intention to retract it."

And so they parted.

CHAPTER XII.

DOUBTS AND FEARS.

Miss Trevanion was now, indeed, as she had said, alone. To her mother she knew that it was in vain to cling for council or support, for the poor lady had been so long self-centered, and crushed beneath the iron hand of her husband, that her heart was dead to sympathy, and engrossed by its own petty feelings of discontent. The marriage from which she had anticipated alike honor and happiness had been a mere gilded slavery, and she had worn her chains with a passiveness which had gradually but surely benumbed all the most generous qualities of her nature, and so broken her spirits that the only enjoyment of which she was still susceptible was that of perfect quiet every event that tended to interrupt it being regarded as a personal and willful injury. Weak, as we have already shown, both intellectually and morally, a neglected if not vicious education had caused her greatly to overrate mere worldly advantages; a meanness of mind which had been fostered in after-life by the puerile course of novel-reading in which she delighted; and although it is probable that had she been permitted to perform the part of mother to her child, and to exercise the privileges of the maternal character, that sacred tie might have awakened her to holier and higher feelings, the fact of her having seen her legitimate duties delegated to another, had caused her to regard her daughter rather as the heiress of Mr. Trevanion, than as one upon whose love she had a claim, and whose happiness she was bound to promote. Awed by the rank of Lady Mary Brooklands, it never occurred to her on the first domestication of the titled stranger beneath her roof, to control her own right, or to assert her own dignity while as Ida passed from infancy to girlhood she had looked with bewildered surprise upon the bright and beautiful being whose talents were the theme of every tongue.

Even the affection which was lavished by on her by the brilliant girl, who never for an instant suffered the indulgence of which she was the object, to induce her to fail in respect or assiduity to her neglected mother, could not lessen the estrangement. Mrs. Trevanion was vaguely conscious of their utter incompatibility of mind and feeling; and thus by slow but inevitable degrees, a barrier had grown up between them which neither could ultimately overpass. In her secret heart the childish and vapid woman felt herself wronged by the superior qualities of her own child, and consequently met all her advances with querulous discontent, if not with actual distaste; yet still her daughter, with the persistence of a generous nature, even when she was compelled to admit to herself that she had little respect for her mother's judgment or understanding, continued to act as though she possessed the firmest faith in her.

In such a crisis as the present, however, Miss Trevanion at once felt that it would be idle to make any appeal to her, for even as she had herself become the wife of Mr. Trevanion, in the weak hope of attaining a rank in society superior to that in which she was born, so was she comparatively angered and annoyed by the refusal of her daughter to accomplish a marriage which would have made her the mother-in-law of an earl. Like her husband himself, but from a far different motive, she cared little what might be the qualifications of the individual through whose agency this desirable object was to be effected; she merely fastened upon the fact of its possibility, nor could she control her irritation at what she denounced as the obstinacy of Ida, when, to her extreme amazement, she learned that not even the commands of her father could induce her to accept the hand of a peer of the realm.

"It is really too bad, Lady Mary," she said, peevishly; "a great deal too bad, and using me extremely ill, when she knows how much I wish it. What can she possibly want, I wonder! I'm sure if Mr. Trevanion is satisfied, she has no right to look higher."

"I quite agree with you in that opinion, madam," replied the titled dowager with a quiet sneer; "there can be no doubt that even Miss Trevanion should be satisfied with the rank of the Earl of Downmere; that is not, of course, her objection."

"Then what can it possibly be?" asked the lady, vacantly.

"I should presume that it is to Lord Downmere himself."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Mrs. Trevanion, with more energy than she had exhibited for years; "I see nothing objectionable in him, and even if there were, what can it signify?"

Her companion shrugged her shoulders, and remained silent.

"I am sure," pursued the mortified mother with unusual garrulity, "that I was not at all in love with Mr. Trevanion when I married him, for, to tell you the truth, he always frightened me, he was so cold and proud, but when he told me of his uncle, Sir Jasper, and Trevanion Hall, and his poor dear mother, who was, like yourself, an earl's daughter, I felt at once that I was never likely to do better, and so, you see, I consented to be his wife."

"A resolution, madam, which I trust that you have never had reason to repent," was the sarcastic rejoinder.

"Well, I don't know exactly, I am not quite certain," said the poor lady, musingly; I sometimes fancy, and particularly since I have become convinced that Mr. Trevanion's great relations are never likely to be reconciled to him, that we were not altogether suited to each other, and that I might perhaps have been happier, had I married John George Harris, my father's head-clerk, who early went out of his mind when he found that I had engaged myself to 'the Don,' as they called my present husband in the office."

"It is possible," said Lady Mary, "that some similar idea may have struck your daughter, and that she may have acted upon it."

"If I thought so—" commenced Mrs. Trevanion; then suddenly checking herself, and turning toward her companion, she added, with what she evidently intended to be an accent of severity; "at all events, Lady Mary, I believe she has more good sense than to think in earnest of throwing herself away upon your nephew."

No; Miss Trevanion was right; she could anticipate neither counsel nor comfort in her trial from such a mother.

Thus then there was but one individual to whom she had looked for sympathy and support, and that one was Lady Mary Brooklands; the near relative of the man on whom she had consented to bestow her hand; the attached friend who had been the guardian of her girlhood and the companion of her riper years; by whom her attachment had been, if not openly applauded, at least covertly encouraged, and even this last stay had failed her at the very moment when she had placed the firmest faith in its stability—failed her because what her haughty and calculating ladyship had coveted for her nephew was, not the heart of the loving girl, who had for years clung to her as to a second mother, but the hand of Mr. Trevanion's heiress.

This was a bitter conviction, and as it grew upon her, a stronger feeling of desolation crept over the affrighted Ida; "He too," she murmured to herself, "he too, will now perhaps become suddenly aware of the imprudence which he was lately so anxious to commit—he may discover in our disparity of age, which he has hitherto treated so lightly, an obstacle and a ridicule. I am prepared for every thing; deserted on all sides, I must learn to suffice to myself, and I will do so. They may destroy my happiness, but they shall not bow my pride. My heart may break—it must—but I will ask no pity; I will submit to none. I am no weak girl to be a mark for the whispers of the idle; my father's spirit of endurance is strong within me; and like the Spartan boy I shall know how to hug my agony without a groan. And yet how I had garnered up my heart in him—how madly I had loved him, and love him still; the better, perhaps, that I thought he would owe all to me. It can not be that Sydney will prove hollow and heartless like his worldly aunt; but should it indeed be so, better now than after I had become his wife, for now I would struggle to forgive; while then—" and she paused and grasped her burning brow so tightly that it grew pale beneath the pressure; "then I should have scorned to make the effort; never would I have forgiven him had he pleaded to me upon his knees. And it might have been so—yes, yes, it might have been so; in some ten short years, and how quietly would those ten years pass, my boasted beauty will be on the wane, and the world will be full of young and blooming faces, fair and fresh, with the first light of life bright upon them—and how then? Would he—he, still in the unfaded glory of his manhood, remain true to me? true to herself? I dare not doubt it—for his sake—I dare not for my own. Now I am wretched, but not guilty—but then—then what would not his falsehood make me! Lady Mary is right. I have forgotten my own sense of dignity—I have been the victim of my own vanity—he will do well to rebuke my folly by submitting to her judgment, by following her counsels. I shall at least be spared the pang of his neglect, and the bitterness of his contempt!"

Worn with excitement, and crushed by mortification and anxiety, the painful picture which the jealous imagination of the excited girl had conjured up, overcame her little remaining strength; and when her French maid entered her room an hour subsequently, she found her stretched upon a sofa, cold and insensible; nor was it until after a considerable time, and the application of all the restoratives within reach, that she slowly recovered her consciousness.

As she did so, the first object upon which her eyes fastened was a letter, and the femme-de-chambre no sooner perceived that it had attracted her attention than she placed it in her hand. Mademoiselle Seraphine was enchanted. In one instant she had composed a most touching romance. Her haughty mistress must now confide in her; and her little black eyes would twinkle in spite of herself as she decided that her assistance must at last be needed, and her talents recognized. Eagerly did she watch the effect of her ready zeal; but her hopes were destined to be disappointed: the letter was no sooner in the possession of Miss Trevanion than one glance sufficed—it was the handwriting of Sydney; and faintly murmuring "Leave me," the agitated girl closed her eyes and fell back upon the cushions, with the fateful packet tightly grasped within her rigid fingers. For awhile she remained motionless, not a sob, not a sigh escaped her, but her heart labored painfully, and her pulses throbbed with an excitement strangely compounded of hope and dread. Her destiny lay hidden within the narrow folds of the paper that she held, and she had not courage to learn its secret. But suddenly she started from her recumbent position, shook back the masses of her dark hair, and with febrile energy, tore open the seal.

Thus ran the letter:—

"I know not, Ida, whether to be pained or rejoiced at the tone of the note which I have just received from you; for while much of its contents is calculated to cut me to the heart, it also contains much which has made me supremely happy. That you should have been subjected to so severe a trial of your feelings is to me a source of wretchedness greater than even you can comprehend; but you must not blame me if I confess that the conviction, that you willingly endured it for my sake, has almost made me selfish enough to forget at times how dearly my own triumph has been purchased. Mine is no common love, Ida; it has become part and parcel of my existence. I feel that I can not live without you, and that with you I could brave every trial which the tyranny of the world could heap upon me. You say that should you persist in fulfilling your promise to become my wife you lose all claim to the affection and inheritance of your father—proudly, then, shall I feel that you will owe all to me—that we shall be every thing to each other. This, dearest, is my idea of happiness; I am young alike in years and hope: my energies are strong, and with you beside me to cheer me in my labor, and to rejoice in my success, I can not fail. I will not resign my claim to possess you; you have promised, and you must perform. And yet, may I not, in my miserable egotism, be condemning you to sacrifices so great that even my tenderness can not requite them? Oh, if it indeed be so, let me not drag you down from the proud eminence on which you stand, only to ensure my own happiness. Like you, I will strive to be generous—to exult in your prosperity, in your success—I know not if I shall have strength to do so, but I will try, even though my heart burst in the effort. Care not for me, however, if, on mature reflection, you find that you shrink from the contrast between what is and what must be, when you can no longer command the luxuries by which you are now surrounded. If you doubt that my love and devotion—a love and a devotion which can end only in the grave—will not suffice to replace them. I can not now offer you affluence—I may not be enabled to do so for years to come. Can you forego it for my sake? If so, trust me that it will come at last. Laboring with you, and for you, I shall compel success—you will be my life, my my light, and my reward. I make no comment upon the fears which you express, that time can weaken my affections; it is true that when we first met, it was your wondrous beauty by which I was thralled, and that beauty will live unchanged in my heart forever; while all your nobler and better qualities will only tend, as years pass on, to render you still dearer.

"Should we part, therefore, Ida, the ruin of our hopes will be your work; for never never will I willingly resign the claim which you have given me upon your hand. I may be unworthy of such a boon in the eyes of those around you, but am I so in yours? It is for you, and you alone, to decide my destiny. I urge you now as I should not have dared to do, had you still been enabled to become mine, rich in the world's gifts; for then indeed my earnestness might have been misinterpreted; but now, when you assure me that it is not so, I may freely own that life itself will be a burden when you are lost to me. I have never loved another; and now my heart is so filled with your image that it can never admit a new one. Let your beauty wane; to me you will be ever beautiful beyond all on this earth; let sickness withe you, I will render that suffering light by my tenderness and devotion; and if sorrow should reach you even in my arms, I will only clasp you the closer that its bitter pressure may not be felt. Ida, noblest, best of women, torture me no longer, tell me only that you are still mine—mine for time—mine for eternity

"SYDNEY."

"Yes, my brave-hearted Sydney, yes," exclaimed Miss Trevanion, vehemently throwing herself upon her knees; yours, and only yours—yours for time—yours for eternity I can not, and I will not doubt you. Years will not change you, poverty will not chill you. You will love me to the end. What are the gaud and glitter of the world beside the possession of such a heart as yours? And I have dared to wrong your noble nature—to believe that the cold reasonings of the selfish and false could shake your steadfast faith! Shame on my sordid spirit? But I can never doubt you more. I will be worthy of your affection by the trustfulness with which I will repose upon its truth and strength. Oh! I am happy—happy—even as the mariner who in his storm-tossed vessel sees a safe harbor near, and knows that after one more fierce struggle, he shall gain the wished-for haven of peace and rest."

When Miss Trevanion rose from her knees, she was no longer pale from exhaustion, and subdued by the long-sustained anxiety which had so lately crushed her, there was a proud light in her eye, and a firmness in her tread, which betrayed her inward exultation. The anger of her father, the treachery of her friend, all was forgotten in that moment of triumphant happiness. Sydney was true—Sydney was all, and more than she had dared to hope—and she had no room for any other memory Again and again she read the letter which she still held tightly clasped, and again and again the smile of the heart's gladness played upon her lip. She drew aside the window-drapery, and threw back the sash, as if to breathe more freely, to have more scope for her joy, more space for her intense and thrilling rapture, and never had she thought the sky so glorious in its blue and tranquil beauty, the trees so graceful in their waving greenery, the flowers so rich in color and in perfume. "Of these, at least, even poverty can not deprive us," she murmured to herself, "we shall need no gold to purchase these. Nature is no niggard of her gifts, and she will not withhold her treasures from the hearts by which she is worshiped. The future can not extort a sigh from me now, nor will I even shrink from the present."

True to this resolution, Miss Trevanion summoned her maid, and calmly devoted herself to the duties of her toilet: every vestige of emotion had faded from her features, and a soft serenity had succeeded the storm of passion to which she had so lately yielded; extreme in all her feelings, she now dwelt only upon the happiness which was, as she fondly believed, so soon to repay her for all the suffering of the past; and as she rejected one after the other the ornaments with which her zealous femme-de-chambre was anxious to adorn her according to her usual custom, and placed in her luxuriant hair, and in the girdle of her simple dress of snowy muslin, a few natural flowers from a vase which stood upon her dressing-table, she smiled exultingly as she became aware that Sydney could scarcely consider her less lovely thus, than when covered with the costly gems with which she must henceforth dispense.

The astonished French woman looked on in silence. That her beautiful young mistress, who, she had every reason to believe, was betrothed to an Earl, should suddenly so far forget her dignity as to throw aside her jewels for a handful of paltry flowers, was to her mysterious and annoying in the extreme. What could it mean? And the pale face, which had so terrified her only a few hours previously, and which was now beaming with a quiet joy—that was another problem. Mademoiselle Seraphine was convinced that there was a secret somewhere; and never before had she felt so indignant at the proud reserve which led Miss Trevanion habitually to avoid all unnecessary intercourse with her attendants. The smart soubrette would have willingly given a year's wages, which would have been no slight sacrifice, could she have dived into the depths of the heart which was beating so tranquilly beside her, but she dared not ask a question; and, consequently, she flitted and fluttered about the apartment with the indignant air of a grievously-offended person, occasionally murmuring beneath her breath certain doubts as to how far "Milord" might approve of the sudden "caprice" of his incomprehensible "fiancée"—wondering how long this fit of "coquetterie maladroite et mal entendue" was to last; and inquiring of herself whether she ought to condescend to live with a mistress who appeared to be steeped in grief one hour, and as happy as a child the next—who preferred rose-buds to rubies, and, worse than all, kept her own secrets.

Upon the object of her speculations, however, all this display of irritation was wholly wasted; Ida was living that inner life which deadens the perceptions to outward things, and she finally dismissed Mademoiselle without the least regard for her injured feelings, in order that she might enjoy in solitude the thick-coming thoughts which crowded upon her heart and brain, and without one suspicion that had not the ill-used woman anticipated a nôce, and the glory of arranging the bridal coronal of Madame la Comtesse, she would, in the exasperation of the moment, have given her warning on the spot.

CHAPTER XIII.

A FAMILY FRIEND.

While Miss Trevanion was occupied with her new and pleasant visions, her father was moodily pacing the library where he was closeted with the family friend; who, although she had told the tale of Ida's resolute rejection of the earl, and her equally determined adherence to Mr. Elphinstone, in her smoothest and blandest manner, had nevertheless raised a storm in the breast of her host which it required all his self-control to combat. The placid smile and studied phrases of Lady Mary jarred upon his nerves, contrasting as they did with the irritation of his own feelings; and as she sat playing with a paper-cutter as calmly as though no subject of importance occupied her thoughts, he inwardly cursed the high-breeding which had hitherto been the theme of his admiration.

"I believe that nothing would ruffle her," he murmured to himself; "nothing, so long as she was secure of a home under my roof; and I believe, too, that this affair has been her own work; and that, in spite of Ida's denial, she forced her beggarly nephew upon the girl for the very purpose that she has accomplished. No, no, my Lady Mary, I am not your dupe, as you imagine; I see through the whole plot; but I will circumvent you yet. I will not be fooled with impunity. I will compel you to act for me, and with me, although as yet you have declined to express your own sentiments upon the subject. But I must be calm; and I will."

And in pursuance of this resolution Mr. Trevanion re-seated himself, and smoothed his ruffled brow.

"Ida assures me, Lady Mary," he commenced abruptly, "that you were altogether ignorant of the imprudent engagement into which she has entered with Mr. Elphinstone. Is this really the case?"

"It is."

"But may I ask if it was quite unexpected on your part?"

"Perfectly so, the age of my nephew, and the narrowness of his means, alike rendered it impossible that I could indulge in any idea of the sort."

"And no wonder, madam, coupled as these circumstances were, moreover, by your knowledge of my views and intentions for Miss Trevanion—whom—I now tell you, as I have done frequently before—I would rather follow to her grave than permit to throw herself away upon a nobody"

"I must be permitted to remark," observed the lady with a stateliness of manner intended to reprove the arroganee of her companion, "that Mr. Elphinstone is at once highly-born and well-connected. The equal at least in that respect, even of Miss Trevanion."

A dark cloud gathered on the countenanee of the merchant.

"I do not deny it, madam," he said coldly; "as your relative the gentleman has assuredly that qualification, but still I must be pardoned if I persist in considering him as a nobody. He has no stake in the country. He has even a reputation to make; he is known only by a certain set as 'a man about town,' well-looking and well-dressed; and so obscure an individual can never be the husband of my daughter."

Lady Mary replied only by a listless bow, and having been engaged for the last few minutes in cutting some colored paper into narrow strips, she now began to amuse herself by twisting them into spills.

Nothing could be more aggravating to a proud and impetuous nature like that of Mr. Trevanion, than this assumption of perfect composure. His blood rose to fever-heat, and his temples throbbed almost to pain.

"I trust, madam," he said, after a moment's silence, "that you did me the favor to explain to my rebellious child that I peremptorily insisted upon her accepting the hand of Lord Downmere?"

"I did, with the same frankness that I communicated to yourself, her equally peremptory refusal."

"And do you not yourself—now, Lady Mary, I put the question to you in the full conviction that you will answer it frankly and undisguisedly, even although you chance to be the kinswoman of Mr. Elphinstone—do you not, as a woman of the world, consider that her marriage with that gentleman would be to the last degree imprudent?"

"Since you compel me to declare my opinion, Mr. Trevanion," said the noble matron; "I most assuredly do."

"I am happy to hear it, very happy," exclaimed the merchant; "and may I hope that you expressed as much to my daughter?"

"I did."

"My dear madam;" said Mr. Trevanion, earnestly; "I regret to say that I have wronged you by supposing that you had at least encouraged Ida's infatuation by your silence; I should have known you better than to suspect, even for a moment, that you could be guilty of such monstrous disingenuousness; but if you now, with your usual admirable judgment, disapprove of my daughter's folly, what will be your opinion when I confide to you that I have positively assured her, that, in the event of her persistenee, not one shilling of my property shall ever be hers."

"What can I think, my dear sir," smiled the lady; "but that you held forth a threat, which you would never have the courage to realize."

"You mistake me," was the stern rejoinder; "I shall fulfill it without an effort."

The strip of pink paper upon which Lady Mary Brooklands was at that instant engaged, visibly quivered in her fingers; "Remember," she said, in a somewhat unsteady tone; "that Ida is your only child."

"I do," replied the merchant; "but I remember also that I have a nephew; one moreover who bears my name, and will be no obscure recipient of my bounty. If I can not humble Sir Jasper in the way which I had every right to hope that I should have done, I can still, at least, effect my purpose by crushing him beneath the weight of an obligation which he can never cancel."

"Still, my good friend;" urged the lady, discontinuing her employment, and evincing infinitely more interest in the conversation than she had hitherto done; "still I would plead for Ida. Recollect the nature of her education, and how little it has fitted her for a life of privation and struggle. Do not overlook the fact that she has done more than justice to your expectations; that her beauty, her grace, and her attainments have made her universally popular, and caused her society to be courted by persons of exalted rank and acknowledged judgment. In short, do not suffer your own—I confess, very legitimate—disappointment, to render you ungenerous or unjust."

"Miss Trevanion has seen fit to emancipate herself from my authority, madam;" was the dogged reply; "and I most sincerely congratulate her on the fact that her godmother bequeathed to her the magnificent sum of three hundred pounds a year, as she will, should she become Mrs. Elphinstone, have an admirable opportunity of testing the capabilities of such an income; while I equally congratulate myself upon the circumstanee, as I could not conscientiously have left her to starve."

"Mr. Trevanion," persisted the lady; "do nothing rashly, lest you incur the misery of your own reproaches."

"I will run the risk of any remorse likely to be awakened by my assertion of self-respect, madam."

"But the world, sir—you would surely not desire to brave the comments of the world; and believe me when I assure you, that public opinion will condemn so unprecedented an act of severity."

"I will venture even that," said the merchant; "when once the dream of my life is past, the world and myself will have little in common. I ask nothing of it, I owe nothing to it; I have been the architect of my own fortunes, and the edifice that I have raised is substantial enough for me to trust to its stability."

"Consider, nevertheless," resumed his companion, as she laid her jeweled hand lightly upon his arm, and looked pleadingly into his face; "do not, I entreat, suffer it to escape you, that by renouncing the interests, and—if I understand you rightly—the society of your daughter, you also tear asunder the holy bonds which knit together a mother and her child. No, no; you can not have the heart to do this."

"You are an able advocate, Lady Mary," was the rejoinder, as a questionable smile played about the mouth of Mr. Trevanion; "but unfortunately for the success of your argument, we are both sufficiently conversant with the dessous des cartes to be quite aware that the bonds to which you allude hang somewhat loosely in this instance. The mother will easily console herself with a new shawl and a new novel; while the daughter, whose temperament and training must years ago have taught her that the lady in question is merely a harmless simpleton, to whom she is indebted for nothing beyond the single fact of her existence, will find little difficulty in reconciling herself to the privation of a very negative advantage. These are, however, idle speculations, as I still hope—and moreover, expect—to see Miss Trevanion Countess of Downmere."

"I sincerely trust, should the resolution which you have declared be really unalterable, that your expectations may be realized," said Lady Mary, as she once more busied herself with the shreds of pink paper; "for I shall be truly gratified on vacating my place at your hospitable hearth, to feel that you have not been disappointed in your hopes."

"I do not understand you, my dear madam," said the merchant.

"And yet nothing can be more simple than my meaning," replied his companion, with a sigh that was only just audible enough to imply that she had failed in her effort to suppress it. "Let my sweet friend bestow her hand upon whom she may, my mission in your family is necessarily at an end; and although I shall, as you must be well aware, deeply and keenly feel my separation from a circle endeared to me alike by sympathy and habit, still—"

"And do you really mean me to infer, my dear Lady Mary," asked the merchant earnestly; "that you contemplate such a separation? and that because my daughter, in the natural course of events, leaves her home, you will also abandon the roof which you have so kindly regarded as your own?"

"In my turn I ask, can you be serious, Mr. Trevanion?"

"Perfectly so," was the calm reply; "you know precisely, my dear madam, how I am situated; and that after the departure of Ida, be it to Woodlyn Castle or to a suburban lodging, there will be no longer a mistress of my house, should you indeed fail me? Nay, don't talk to me of Mrs. Trevanion: she exists, and nothing more. To you alone can I look for companionship and help; and I trust that our long friendship gives me some claim upon your consideration."

"My position, under such circumstances, would be an onerous one;" remarked the lady.

"Pardon me if I can not see it in that light. You have now been my guest, my honored guest, for years; the tie between us has become stronger than that of kindred; I must induce you to rescind your resolution."

Lady Mary was an excellent actress, and on this occasion she put forth all her talent. Although the idea of leaving the luxurious home of which she had for so long a period been the actual if not the nominal mistress, had caused her many an unquiet moment, she was by no means inclined to avow the truth, when by gratifying the secret wish of her own heart she might seem to concede a favor; and she consequently adduced a multitude of arguments against the proposed arrangement, although none of them were powerful enough to defy refutation; and even while she was eager to yield, and thus to secure to herself the advantages she had so long enjoyed, she refused to pledge herself to any thing; there was so much to consider; circumstances might arise to render her determination imperative; she was, of course, both gratified and flattered by so unequivocal a proof of regard on the part of Mr. Trevanion, but the point was a delicate one, a very delicate one. She would not, however, positively refuse, because there was nothing on earth which she should regret so much as to wound the feelings of so old and esteemed a friend; but at the same time she must request to be allowed the opportunity of turning the matter over in her mind. Nothing could be more reasonable; and as her companion entertained a shrewd doubt of her ultimately proving inexorable, he instantly complied with the very natural suggestion. He did not seek to be importunate, although he should await her decision with anxiety; and thus the question was left in abeyance for the time. Mr. Trevanion readily perceived, however, that it had been mooted at an auspicious moment, for a quarter of an hour had not elapsed before he discovered that the certainty of her own impunity in any and every case had singularly tended to modify the noble matron's sentiments on the subject of his contemplated severity to his daughter. She reluctantly agreed, but she did agree, that he had a right to be disappointed by the pertinacity of Ida—that he was entitled to compel her obedience—that the Earl of Downmere was in every respect the most eligible husband that he could have selected for her—and that the 'love-affair' was a mere folly, which ought to be discountenanced on every account.

"And now that you have compelled me to speak plainly, my good sir," she resumed; "although I assure you that I had resolved to do nothing of the kind, you may appreciate the difficulty of the position in which I was placed. Sydney Elphinstone is my nephew, and at first I feared (as you are aware, with some justice) that you might possibly so far mistake me as to believe that I should countenance his suit from interested motives, while, after you had informed me of your intention of adopting and enriching your nephew, should your wishes be disregarded, I became equally apprehensive that I might appear to abandon the cause of of my own, because Ida could no longer enrich him with the noble fortune to which she had expected to succeed. Now, however, that we thoroughly understand each other, there is no longer any reason why I should shrink from acknowledging that I have, from the moment in which it was confided to me, considered the whole affair as childish and absurd in the extreme. Sydney is a fine young fellow, but he is still a mere boy, who can scarcely be supposed to know his own mind; while Miss Trevanion—"

"Is a woman of six-and-twenty, who is as ready to make a fool of herself as any boarding-school Miss of fifteen," broke in the merchant, with a portentous frown; "and who must consequently be treated as such. I will see Lord Downmere to-morrow. Fortunately he has no false delicacy on the subject, and, moreover, knows nothing about the Elphinstone affair; so that in so far as he is concerned, there is no harm done; and after I shall have seen his lordship I will lose no more time in making my final arrangements, in which, my dear Lady Mary, I shall rely on your assistance and advice."

"You know how sincerely both will be afforded, my good sir;" said his companion with dignified suavity; "while I, on my part, am convinced that you will ask nothing from me inconsistent with the tender affection which I feel for my sweet young friend."

"Of that you need have no apprehension;" was the rejoinder of the merchant; "for that very affection must, as a natural consequence, lead you to desire her prosperity and happiness. The path is therefore plain before us, and we have only to follow it steadily and resolutely. And now, sans adieu, my dear Lady Mary; I fear that, in my inconsiderate egotism, I may already have detained you too long."

The lady rose with a polite disclaimer on her lips; and then, having carefully collected her scattered treasures, and playfully enriched the silver sandish of the master of the house with a portion of her rose-colored labors, she smilingly took her departure. Come what might, she had carried her own point.

CHAPTER XIV.

AN INTERVIEW.

Henry Ferdinand, Earl of Downmere, and Baron Woodlyn, had, as we have already shown, no very overpowering passion for the beautiful Miss Trevanion; although he was by no means insensible to the fact that with her many graces and attractions, she could not but do honor to his name and rank. His pertinacity in the pursuit of the lady was prompted by other, and to him more serious considerations. His lordship had throughout life restricted his worship to one idol, and that idol had been self; while so zealous had been his devotion, that his large income had gradually failed to meet the demands made upon it by one, who was at once a profligate and a sybarite. More than one of his estates was deeply mortgaged, and this fact not only crippled his resources, but jarred with his pride; and he accordingly looked to the money-bags of the wealthy Mr. Trevanion for release; nor did the unpleasant and mortifying circumstance of his rejection by sundry well-dowered beauties to whom he had previously offered the privilege of relieving him from his embarrassments, tend to weaken his anxiety for success in the present instance. He was deterred by no false delicacy in his pursuit of a woman to whom his addresses were unwelcome, for his past associations with the sex had not initiated him into the shrinking sensitiveness of its purer and better portion. Recognizing no dignity save that of title, he looked upon the marriage which he now contemplated, as a fair and equitable barter. He needed the princely fortune of the heiress to enable him to terminate his life as he had commenced it, in self-indulgence and display; while he was content to give in exchange a name which he had done nothing to illustrate, and a rank which he had done nothing to adorn.

Nevertheless there were moments in which the haughty and self-centered man brought himself to believe that in bestowing his hand upon the high-bred and fascinating daughter of Mr. Trevanion, he was about to make a heavy sacrifice; nor were his private reflections more flattering to Mr. Trevanion personally. That the courtly and dignified merchant desired the alliance for his own sake, the peer could not, and did not believe, for he had wit enough to perceive at once that their several natures were not merely incompatible, but even antagonistic both in principle and feeling. "No, no;" would the earl murmur to himself with a saturnine smile, as he shook his gouty leg, and swallowed an olive to relish the more keenly his penultimate glass of claret; "no, no; the old fellow can not deceive me, bland and smooth as he is; he wants a lift upon the social ladder, and is willing to pay handsomely, provided the stride be a long one, but perhaps it is better so; I am not anxious to marry the whole family."

And Lord Downmere was right; Mr. Trevanion had never for a moment cheated himself into a belief that he was working for the happiness of his daughter in forcing forward her union with the selfish egotist who was to raise her to the peerage; his motive stood bare and unconcealed before him; nor had he ever striven to vail it from the child whom he desired to sacrifice to his own personal views and ambition; and although under such circumstances, policy induced him to affect toward the peer the respect and deference which appeared to be a legitimate homage yielded to his rank, the haughty merchant despised him in his secret heart, and looked upon him merely as a necessary tool to further his own views.

Thus, each thoroughly understood the other; each had a point to carry, and each was equally resolved to carry that point, if success could be ensured by his own exertions

As he had intimated to Lady Mary, Mr. Trevanion on the morrow had another interview with the earl, whom he encouraged to persevere, laughingly reminding him that no woman of spirit would willingly be won unsought, and dropping at the same time, as if accidentally, certain hints regarding the brilliant expectations of his daughter, which wonderfully tended to increase the enthusiasm of the noble suitor

This fact, however, Lord Downmere did not desire to render too apparent, and he consequently considered it expedient to evince something like sentiment, although an attempt to play the lover sat but loosely upon him.

"She is certainly a monstrous fine woman, my dear sir," he said complacently, "a very fine woman indeed, and has no doubt every right to play the coquette a little before she yields, provided always that she yields at last, and as you assure me that she will do so—"

"Your lordship may rest assured of it."

"Well then, I see no objection to the course which you propose, and I will afford her another opportunity of recanting her declared determination. I will call at your house again, but you must promise me the support of your influence and authority. I am so unaccustomed to this sort of thing, that I am quite unable to do justice to myself."

"Had not your lordship better see her alone?" asked the merchant.

"No, sir, no;" was the eager rejoinder, "I consider your presence to be most desirable."

"As you will, my lord," said Mr. Trevanion, somewhat impatiently; "but, perhaps, after all, we had better be guided by circumstances. All that I will venture to urge is, that no time should be lost, as the present state of things must necessarily be unsatisfactory to all parties. My carriage is at the door; will your lordship accompany me at once to Richmond?"

"If you really consider it expedient for me to do so, certainly;" was the reluctant reply; "although I have an important engagement at my club, but 'when a lady's in the case,' you know, there is no alternative; and as you justly remark, there will be many arrangements to make on both sides after the affair is decided, which will occupy a very considerable time, so let it be as you propose; in ten minutes I will be ready."

Lord Downmere was almost as good as his word, and in less than half-an-hour, the two gentlemen were on their way to the splendid villa of the merchant.

When their arrival was announced to Miss Trevanion, she excused herself on the plea of indisposition, but a second and peremptory summons from her father, compelled her appearance in the drawing-room, which she entered, to his intense mortification and displeasure, in a loose white muslin wrapper, with her fine hair hidden beneath a close and simple lace cap.

"Miss Trevanion!" he exclaimed, angrily, "Is that a fitting costume at such an hour, and for the reception of such a guest?"

"Not a word, my dear sir, not a word," said the earl, as with a courteous inclination he rose from his seat, and extended his hand to the pale and shrinking girl; "have you yet to learn that ladies understand all these little matters to perfection, and do you imagine that your fair daughter is not well aware that she is ten times more bewitching in her present costume as when avowedly adorned for conquest?"

"I trusted that my indisposition would have sufficed to excuse my non-appearance," said Ida, addressing her father, as with a cold and haughty inclination of the head, she withdrew her hand from that of her unwelcome visitor.

"Well, well, since his lordship is kind enough to overlook so great a breach of decorum and good-breeding, we will say no worse upon the subject," said Mr. Trevanion, who could not conceal from himself, that had his daughter been influenced by the most refined coquetry, she could not have succeeded in appearing more lovely than in her present plain and simple attire; "and we have moreover, a more serious subject to discuss. Lord Downmere, is here, Ida, to receive your final answer to the proposal with with which he has honored you. Mark me, your final answer."

"I regret," was the firm rejoinder, "that his lordship should have considered such a visit necessary after our late interview. I had hoped—"

"Pshaw!" interposed the merchant, impetuously; "all recurrence to the past is idle; and you know my determination, and you have now only to express your compliance with my will."

"And is it thus, that the Earl of Downmere would woo his bride?" asked Ida, contemptuously.

"I am content to woo her after any fashion," said the peer, with a courteous bow; "so that I am happy enough to win her."

"Be generous, my lord;" said Miss Trevanion, "and abandon a suit which can bring you neither honor nor happiness. I should be false, alike to you and myself, did I not at once avow that I have no longer a heart to bestow. I feel, as I have already declared, flattered by your preference, but I can never become your wife."

"So you assured me at our last interview, my dear young lady," replied the earl, perfectly unmoved; "but I am quite aware that it is one of the many privileges of your sex to torture the hearts of your admirers, and I accordingly trusted to time and reflection to operate a change in your decision."

"And your lordship did wisely," broke in the merchant, who with difficulty controled his anger, as he listened to the decided words of his daughter; "for women seldom know their own minds from one hour to another, and Miss Trevanion is at this moment an illustration of the fact. But we have already had somewhat too much of this folly, and she will do well to act more rationally, and to avow at once that she is both honored and happy in the brilliant prospect which your flattering preference holds out to her.

"A devoted heart, and a splendid position;" said the peer, pompously; "what, my dear madam, can you require more than this?"

"Less, much less, would suffice to my ambition, my lord;" replied Ida; "all I ask is the first, and you must pardon me if I frankly declare that it is a gift which you have not to bestow. Let us deal honestly with each other, Lord Downmere: I am not deceived as to my own position in life and am quite aware that, despite all the indulgences which have been lavished upon me, I am still only the daughter of a merchant, who, however wealthy and however honored he may be, is still merely a merchant; and that thus I am no fitting wife for the Earl of Downmere. Pardon me, father," she added, as she marked the displeasure of Mr. Trevanion; "but this is no moment for idle pretense or frivolous vanity; we must all look the truth steadily in the face, and not seek to deceive ourselves or each other by flimsy fallacies. I would not that Lord Downmere should suspect that the merchant, whose reputation is as untarnished, and whose blood is as ancient as his own, is now courting his alliance from any mean pandering to his rank and to the ennobling of his child, from a mere paltry love of title and aggrandizement, for I well know that it is not so—nor would I that my father, when urging me to plight my faith to a man whom I do not love, should so far delude himself as to imagine that the proud peer who condescends to sue for an affection which he can never gain, is influenced by any affection for myself. I see and bitterly feel the truth of my position. On one hand, I am to be made a medium of vengeance, and on the other—"

"Enough, Miss Trevanion, enough!" exclaimed the merchant, vehemently; "this insolence is intolerable and unprecedented. So far I have listened patiently, but my forbearance, great as it has been, has nevertheless a limit."

"I can not, of course, presume to decide the motive which you were about to attribute to my addresses, my dear madam," said the earl, waving his hand deprecatingly toward his exalted host; "but of this I can conscientiously assure you, that if you believe them to have been prompted by any other than my profound and ardent admiration of your many perfections, you not only do me a grievous wrong, but are unjust to yourself. As to the disparity of rank to which you have alluded, it is a mere chimera, when you do not require to be reminded that your grace and loveliness would do honor to a throne. And remember, madam, remember;" he pursued emphatically; "that as my bride—as my wife—as Countess of Downmere—you will stand near the steps of one among the noblest and proudest of the realm. A rumor has reached me that I have a rival, younger no doubt, and more likely to captivate the eye of one so lovely as yourself, than I can hope to do; and although I had been assured the report was false, your own declaration that you have no longer a heart to bestow leads me to believe that such may nevertheless be the case; but let me entreat you to reflect, my dear young lady, before you consign attractions so brilliant as your own to comparative obscurity. You can be little aware of the extent of the sacrifice which you contemplate. You were made for the world, and you owe it to the world to fulfill your destiny. As my wife—as Countess of Downmere—it would be brilliant. For your own sake—for mine—"

"A thousand thanks, my good lord, a thousand thanks," said the merchant; "for a concession of which my willful child is apparently so unworthy; but I entreat of you to urge her no further. She can not be insensible to the generosity of your arguments, and she will not—to this I pledge myself. She has now exhausted her romance, and must be prepared to listen to reason. Once more I must request of you to leave the affair in my hands."

"Another word and I have done," said the earl, who gathered courage from the fear that the coveted wealth of the merchant might yet escape him, and who was anxious to compel the lady to something at least bordering upon concession; "I have endeavored, my dear Miss Trevanion, to place before you the mere worldly advantages of an union which would make me supremely blessed; but I would also press upon you the sincerity and ardor of my attachment, of which I am deeply grieved to be compelled to admit that you have expressed a doubt; do me more justice; and forgive me if I add that I was wholly unprepared for such mistrust and repugnance on your part, after the encouragement which I received from your estimable father, upon whose good faith I placed the firmest and most complete reliance."

"I know not, my lord," said the wearied and persecuted girl, sadly, "what assurance my father may have given you—it is not for me to comment on his actions, or to criticize his motives. He has doubtlessly acted according to his own idea of propriety and right; but I at least am guiltless of having misled you for a moment; and harassing and painful as this subject can not fail to have been to all parties, I trust that you will do me the justice to exonerate me from having willfully prolonged it."

"I can indeed most conscientiously acquit you of any attempt to do so, Miss Trevanion;" was the ironical rejoinder of the earl; "but I have nevertheless an undoubted right to complain of the careless and uncompromising manner in which you have rejected my addresses, conceiving, as I do, that they might have met with more consideration."

"This persistence, my lord," said Ida, haughtily, "is rapidly degenerating into persecution; and is wholly deficient in both dignity and generosity. I can not for a moment bring myself to believe that our very slight acquaintance can have inspired with an attachment to myself personally which could alone afford an excuse for your extraordinary pertinacity; and I have consequently endeavored to discover its true and adequate motive. On mature reflection, I have only been able to imagine one, and that one so utterly incompatible with the exalted rank to which you evidently attach no mean value, that for the sake of your own dignity, I can only trust that I do you an injustice. I have already so far overstepped the reserve of my sex as to admit to your lordship that my affections are bestowed elsewhere; and bestowed, I am proud to say, where my heart was the treasure sought, and not my wealth. What, then, my lord, do you seek in thus urging me to become your wife? I feel humbled by the reply forced upon me by my reason."

"Really, my dear madam, you are incomprehensible," said the peer, uneasily.

"Rather say, my lord, that she is unworthy of the honor which you propose to do her," exclaimed Mr. Trevanion, as he rose angrily from his seat; "but I am myself to blame for her wrong-headedness; she has been so long her own mistress that she appears to have forgotten her duty as a daughter, and her courtesy as a woman. Trust me, this shall be remedied. And now, Miss Trevanion, hear me. You do not leave this room, or his lordship's presence, save as his affianced wife."

"Should Lord Downmere have no other engagement, sir," said Ida, firmly, as the deep blush of outraged pride spread over her cheek and brow, "my morning is also disengaged; and since such is your will, I can pass it here as patiently, although perhaps not so pleasantly, as in my own apartment."

"My lord," said the merchant, struggling to subdue his irritation; "I am mortified beyond all expression that a child of mine should expose herself as Miss Trevanion has done; mortified and pained to find that my authority is thus set at naught; but I entreat you to believe that my plighted word shall not be forfeited. Prouder spirits than that of the young lady before you have been bent, and she shall learn ere long that a father's will is not to be braved with impunity. She may, as she insanely affects to believe, have given her heart to a beggar, but her hand must be my gift, and shall not follow it."

"Compose yourself, my good sir, compose yourself," said the peer, with an indulgent smile; "I am aware that young ladies are apt to be romantic, and to form magnificent ideas of 'love in a cottage;' but it is equally certain that on mature consideration they bring themselves to prefer a diamond tiara to a wreath of daisies, and to estimate the respectful attachment of a rational suitor beyond the wild and ephemeral passion of a mere boyish love."

Miss Trevanion started, and the blood burnt still more painfully upon her already crimsoned cheek.

"I can not," pursued the earl; "I really have not moral courage enough to say to your lovely and fascinating daughter, that I consent to resign her to a rival, for by so doing I should resign my own hopes of happiness; and the pertinacity of which she complains must sufficiently prove to her the value which I attach to her possession. You, at least, will not blame me for clinging to the last to the brightest dream of happiness in which I have ever indulged. The 'slight acquaintance,' upon which Miss Trevanion lays such stress as regards her own feelings, has been a period so full of hope and anxiety to myself, that it appears to have absorbed the best portion of my existence; and rather than forego an anticipation which has made that existence doubly dear to me, I am content still to wait, if such be her pleasure, until she does me more justice."

"I thank you, my lord, deeply and earnestly thank you for your forbearance," said Mr. Trevanion; and in reply to so much generosity, can only assure you that your patience shall not be too severely taxed."

"I rely upon your promise," said the earl, as he rose from the sofa upon which he had been seated, and bowed low to the lady, who acknowledged his parting courtesy in silence, "and the devotion of a life shall prove to your charming daughter that I am worthy of the prize for which I have so resolutely striven."

In another moment Ida was alone.

CHAPTER XV.

A DINNER PARTY.

Ida was alone with her own thoughts, and for awhile they were full of angry bitterness. Toward the earl they were compounded of contempt and disgust. "No, no, it is not to me that he has bowed his paltry pride," she murmured to herself; "it is not for me that he has condescended to submit to insult, and to smile upon inferences which he could not have mistaken. He seeks me for my wealth; he would enrich himself, and make me the victim of his selfish cupidity. And I am without a friend—flattered and fooled by the world, there does not beat one heart upon which I can lay down my weary head, and ask for rest.

"And yet I have dreamed such dreams of happiness—indulged such hopes of peace and of affection—peace!—affection!—what has a persecuted woman to do with blessings such as those. My estimate of life has been a false one, and now I begin to appreciate the frightful truth; perhaps I am wrong to struggle against my destiny—perhaps I should do well to give myself to this titled coward, who is just brave enough to make war upon the sacred feelings of a woman's heart—I should find my reward in the world, my recompense in its smooth wisdom. I should make a brilliant marriage—be fooled and flattered still—wear the shame of a perjured spirit proudly, and find in the crowded saloons of fashion, the home which I should have forfeited forever elsewhere. It may be that such a fate might preserve me from deeper and more fatal suffering—it may be; for in this case, I could live on without a fear or a hope; the one would be annihilated by the other; giving no love, I could never be subject to the pang of feeling it thrown back upon me, and the fire-flood of my passion indurated into lava, and crushing out my existence. And what if I become the wife of Sydney? Who shall tell me what may be my fate? What may be his? Poverty and Time—those are the gaunt and fearful adversaries with which I shall have to contend; and what will be their effect on him? It is easy to talk of tempests under a summer sky, and of wrecks beside a summer sea, but beneath the lightning flash, and on the roaring billows, we can alone estimate the extent of the evil. Should I marry Sydney, and become the bane of his existence, where, then, could I turn for help or comfort? and that I should do this were he to arouse the slumbering demon within me, I have a firm and fatal conviction. I can not deceive myself; to him in whom I trust, to whom I give myself, I must either be a blessing or a curse—every thing, or worse, far worse than nothing. A firm and faithful friend, or a bitter and unrelenting enemy. And knowing this, should I not do well and bravely to sacrifice my own happiness at once—to resist the pleadings of my own heart—and to refuse to become his wife? Could I not drown my own wretchedness and isolation in what the world calls pleasure—silence the importunities of my own rebellious spirit in the turmoil of dissipation, and console myself with the reflection that I was the only sufferer? Surely there would be heroism in this! But have I strength for such a sacrifice? Can I consent to make it, while one hope is left that Sydney's love might prove as lasting as my own? No; it is vain to strive against myself: and if I can not read the future I must be content to risk its fruits. This womanish weakness is unworthy of me; I must trust, and abide by the issue of my faith. I can not live loveless and alone, devouring my own heart, and feeling that I have been the passive tool of avarice and ambition. My path is plain before me, and rugged as it now is, it may lead to happiness at last."

It is a trite but true remark, that when sorrow or even death is in a house, still the routine of domestic duties must be pursued, and in the former case, society still maintains its claim. Thus it was on the present occasion; with one absorbing subject of interest pressing heavily upon her heart and mind, Miss Trevanion found herself compelled to obey the suggestion of her maid, by whom she was reminded that it was time to prepare herself to receive the guests who were, as she had in her excitement totally forgotten, expected that day at dinner. Every one has experienced at some moment of his or her life, the weariness of such an appeal to the patience; and this simple circumstance tended still further to reconcile our heroine to the prospect of the 'mere competence' which must, at least, have a tendency to relieve her from sacrifices so irksome during her married life.

"Now," she mused, "I do not even belong to myself; the chains of the world are round me; and though they may have hitherto appeared to be wreathed with flowers, the illusion is past, and I feel the galling of their iron links."

Alas! wreathe them as we may, none of us escape the pressure to our dying hour; the careless may wear them loosely, but even they can never throw them off. We have visions of moral freedom in the future—we delude ourselves day by day with the hope that some change of scene or circumstance may emancipate us—but is it ever realized?

Several of the guests had already arrived when Miss Trevanion descended to the drawing-room. There were three or four steady men of demure age—the personal friends, or rather associates of her father, for the self-sufficient merchant made no friends in the strict acceptance of the term; a titled dowager or two belonging to the clique of Lady Mary Brooklands; middle-aged women, who fully appreciate the merits of whist and East India Madeira, and who were not yet totally insensible to the hope of repairing their widowhood by a second marriage, where their rank might prove an equivalent to the wealth of some ambitious commoner.

And perhaps it was a relief to Ida that the party was thus constituted—although in the lightness of her heart she had been accustomed to regard such assemblages as a wearisome infliction—for thus there was little demand upon her own exertions; she had but to listen and to endure; and as she looked very lovely while doing so, her silence was unnoticed amid the animated chatter of the dowagers, the sententious declamation of the politicians, and the languid ejaculations of her mother.

One circumstance only tended to annoy and discompose her, and that one was the extraordinarily-significant glances which were turned on her from time to time, the little smiling nods, and patronizing smiles of the ladies, and the less demonstrative but still equally peculiar looks of the gentlemen. She appeared to herself to have suddenly become the object of some occult interest to every one about her; nor did she fail to remark that the usually expressionless face of her mother exhibited a self-gratulating complacency which it had never before worn. Lady Mary alone was calm and stately as usual, and appeared totally unconscious of any extraneous cause of excitement.

Suddenly, however, the thoughts of Ida were diverted into a fresh channel by the mention of a name which she was aware could never be uttered in the presence of her father without exciting an unpleasant emotion.

"By the by, Trevanion," said Mr. Plumbtree, a county member who was engaged with his host in some important commercial speculations; "are you aware that your uncle is in town? I met him yesterday; and I need scarcely tell you that his first subject was that unlucky farm that forms so ugly an angle into his estate, and which he is so constantly urging me to sell, although I have decidedly refused to part with it for the last ten years. It seems that Lady Trevanion has set her heart upon converting it into a dress-dairy, where she may skim her cream out of glass and porcelain, and play Marie Antoinette at Trianon on a small scale."

"I was not aware that Sir Jasper Trevanion was in town;" was the cold reply; "for, as we hold no communication whatever, I am necessarily ignorant of his movements."

"I wish that your difference, be it what it may, could be adjusted;" said the guest; "and I have reason to suspect that the baronet would gladly meet you half-way. What say you? Will you allow me to negotiate between you?"

"I believe that both parties are well satisfied with things as they are;" was the discouraging rejoinder.

"I must be allowed to differ from you;" persisted Mr. Plumbtree; "for, to my surprise, your stately kinsman made many inquiries concerning yourself and your family, which convinced me that he considered the feuds to have endured long enough; while, to be candid with you, the present moment seems a very propitious one for you to tender or receive the olive branch—the 'coming event' being calculated to ensure you high ground."

As Miss Trevanion raised her eyes to her father in some anxiety to learn the spirit in which he would receive the suggestion, she saw his own fixed upon herself with an uneasy expression which startled her; nor were his next words more intelligible than his look.

"It is extremely probable;" he said, dryly; "that the baronet and his son may be more deeply interested in the event to which you allude than they anticipate. I must decline, however, until it has actually taken place, all overtures to a reconciliation, which, had Sir Jasper been enabled years ago to foresee the future, would never have been necessary. I fully appreciate the kindness of your motive, my dear sir, but we will, if you please, dismiss a subject which can not prove otherwise than uninteresting to the friends by whom we are surrounded."

"Is Lady Trevanion also in town?" eagerly inquired his wife, heedless of the desire which he had expressed that so ungracious a theme should not be thus publicly pursued.

"Yes, madam, both Lady Trevanion and her son; and a very fine and promising young man he is. We are quite proud of him in the county, I assure you, where he is, as you may believe, the object of more than one long-sighted speculation."

"How delightful for his mother;" whined out the weak hostess with a very audible sigh; "I have often regretted that I never had a son."

"Your regrets are uncalled for, my dear madam;" said Sir Giles Euston who sat near her; "when we look across the table—you could not have anticipated perfection in both instances."

"Besides which," followed up a jeweled matron with an encouraging smile to Ida, who became more and more perplexed as the conversation proceeded; "even Mrs. Trevanion, with her usual good sense and judgment, must perceive at once that this is no moment to encourage such a feeling. Few mothers, I should imagine, have greater reason to be both proud and gratified than herself."

"A fact of which my friend Mrs. Trevanion is fully aware, I can assure you, my dear Lady Somers;" said the stately Lady Mary with a deprecatory smile; "but I must really entreat your forbearance for Ida, who is, I can see, uneasy under this avalanche of flattery."

"It is its tone rather than its tenor, by which I am discomposed;" said the young lady smiling in her turn, but with a very different expression; "I am at a loss to understand the mysterious import of the covert congratulations of which I am evidently the object to-day; although I can not but feel deeply touched that such should be lavished on me at the very moment when they were least anticipated."

"How prettily she keeps her secret;" whispered Sir Giles to his supine neighbor, who was about to utter one of her inane and inopportune replies, when her voice was drowned beneath that of Lady Mary, who hastened to inquire with well simulated curiosity of Mr. Plumbtree, "if Lady Trevanion had come to town for the birthday."

"I do not pretend to say that such was the precise errand;" was his reply; "but I understand that it is at all events her intention. Ladies, as you must be aware, madam, who possess a Golconda in their jewel-cases are not sorry to have so brilliant an opportunity of displaying their treasures; and Sir Jasper certainly mentioned that both he and his wife had determined to attend the drawing-room."

"That will be charming!" exclaimed the hostess, thoroughly roused out of her apathy; "Do you hear, Ida? You will at last see your grand-aunt—for Ida is also to be at the Drawing-room, Sir Giles; and—"

"Mrs. Trevanion, will you be good enough to send Lady Somers some pine?"—broke in the merchant in a tone by which she was at once silenced, and which rendered her hand so unsteady that she gratefully accepted the proffered aid of the officious Sir Giles, who hastened to relieve her from the duty which thus suddenly devolved upon her; while, as if warned that she had in some way or other, for which she could not account, excited the displeasure of her husband, the cowed and cowering woman, after casting one timid glance of inquiry toward the family friend, who replied by a gracious gesture of assent, bowed silently to Lady Somers, and rose to leave the table.

Her example was immediately followed; and in a few moments the ladies of the party were assembled in the drawing-room, cosily established upon sofas and lounges, to spend over coffee and gossip the hour which must intervene before the re-appearance of their lords. This was an interval which Mrs. Trevanion habitually passed, if not quite in sleep, at least in silence; so little was expected from her that she had no motive for exertion; and accordingly, she had no sooner plunged into the depths of her cushions, leaving her daughter and Lady Mary to do the honors of the house, than she sank into total eclipse, to the great relief of the latter, who tolerated with difficulty the harmless but wearisome vanities of the woman, whom she had supplanted in all her privileges alike of hostess, wife, and mother.

"You will, no doubt, chaperon Miss Trevanion to court as usual, Lady Mary;" observed Mrs. Darlington with a sarcastic smile, as she poised the gold spoon upon the surface of her coffee-cup; "it must really be a great fatigue to you to be so persevering in your attendance! Once a year the thing is bearable enough at our age; essential in fact to our position in society; but, like all other duties, it degenerates into a bore from frequent recurrence; and entre nous, unless one has a place in the household, I am inclined to think that—"

"It is a heavy expense; and so it is, no doubt;" interposed Lady Somers, as she scattered the chips of a wafer which she had been steeping in her Mocha over the rich carpet; "but, fortunately for Miss Trevanion, expense is no consideration with her; and it is only women situated as I was, and as you are, the wives of younger sons, whose bills are inconveniently increased by these court-ceremonies; but even were it otherwise, our fair friend could scarcely remain absent from the birthday, situated as she is at this moment."

"May I venture to inquire why my attendance is so essential on this particular occasion, Lady Somers?" inquired the young lady; "and what peculiarity there is in my present position which appears to enfore it?"

"Upon my honor, my dear Miss Trevanion, you do indeed bear your faculties meekly," said her interlocutor gayly; "it is not every young lady on the eve of marriage with a peer of the realm who would ask such a question."

"I do not understand you, madam," was the cold rejoinder.

"Come, come, you may trust us, my dear," persisted the lady, significantly; "we are in the secret; and I can assure you that both Mrs. Darlington and myself sincerely rejoice in your good fortune, and congratulate both Lady Mary and your father upon the successful issue of all their care; you will do them honor, my dear Miss Trevanion, and make a charming addition to the peerage. It is, indeed, quite a triumph, both for yourself and your family, and will be a sad blow to poor dear Lady Wallscourt, who, after all her scheming, has just been compelled, to her extreme mortification, to marry her three daughters to commoners, and yet they were really nice girls, very nice girls, and even tolerably good-looking; but then they had no money; and really society is now in such a factitious state that men of all stations look for fortune with their wives, especially men of rank, who are quite aware of the value of what they have to bestow."

"You labor under some strange mistake as regards myself, madam," said Ida, quietly; "as I do not anticipate becoming the recipient of the honor to which you allude."

"Now don't be obstinate, Ida;" drawled her mother, suddenly leaning forward in her chair; "Lady Somers knows that you are to marry Lord Downmere. Your father mentioned that it was all settled, before you came into the drawing-room, to-night."

"Impossible!" exclaimed Miss Trevanion, indignantly.

"Quite the contrary, my love," laughed Mrs. Darlington; "we have been assured that it is an affaire finie, and very well finished too, take my word for it. You see papas will betray secrets; it is their privilege; so do not look so terribly aggrieved, but receive our congratulations with a good grace."

"Did my father—did Mr. Trevanion, really state this to be the case?" asked the agitated girl, as her proud eye flashed, and her cheek crimsoned.

"Yes, yes; you are fairly committed;" said Lady Somers; "and will make your courtesy to her majesty as a bride-elect."

"I think that she ought to wear white and pearls; that is my opinion," droned Mrs. Trevanion; "if they wish to know it."

No answer was vouchsafed by any of the party, but every eye was riveted upon Ida, who stood with parted lips and heaving bosom, alternately looking from one to the other. She was stung to the very heart, smitten to the depths of her spirit; she could not misunderstand the ungenerous advantage which had been taken of her; she felt that she was in the toils; but her whole nature rose in rebellion against the moral wrong of which her father had been guilty; the sacredness of her affections had been violated, and a feeling of resentment arose within her which at once restored her to composure.

From that moment she listened like one who had no interest in the subject under discussion. She scorned to utter a disclaimer—what to her, with her bruised and wounded pride, was the trifling gossipry of a couple of idle women—straws floating upon the current; while the wound inflicted by her father sank down into the deep waters of her soul, and rested there.

"The last tie is dissolved which bound us;" she murmured to herself as she retired for the night; "every human being, breathing the air of heaven, is gifted with the privilege of free will where the happiness of a whole existence is at stake. Mine has been denied to me, I have been degraded into a subject of idle twaddle and sarcastic gossip. Be it so. Henceforward it must be ruse for ruse."

CHAPTER XVI.

"AN EVENT IN HIGH LIFE, ETC."

When the father and daughter met on the morrow, their meeting was cold and constrained, and neither alluded to the subject by which they were severally engrossed; Mrs. Trevanion, as was her habit after receiving company, breakfasted in her dressing-room, considering it incumbent upon her to be overcome by fatigue; the merchant buried himself in the columns of the Times, and Lady Mary skimmed the pages of the Morning Post. The meal was a dreary one; and at its close Mr. Trevanion ceremoniously presented to his daughter a folded paper which was lying beside him, with the intimation that he desired to give a ball on the evening of the birthday, and that she would find in that list the names of the guests whom he personally desired to invite, leaving the necessary additions to the discretion of Lady Mary Brooklands and herself.

"You will see, Miss Trevanion," he said, coldly; "that the one who heads the list is that of the Earl of Downmere; you will know who should, and who should not be invited to meet his lordship; and I need scarcely tell you for your guidance that you are committed."

"To what, sir?" inquired Ida, with a kindling cheek.

"To the world, and to your own dignity and propriety of feeling. By sunset this evening, thanks to a knot of marvel-loving and marvel-disseminating women, all London will be aware that you are pledged to the earl, and that this ball is given in honor of your betrothal. You will therefore act accordingly. Not a word, if you please; the subject has been already sufficiently discussed between us, and I beg to be spared all further verbiage upon a topic which has become distasteful to me. Will you do me the favor to send out the cards by to-morrow night?"

"Certainly," was the calm reply.

"Do not, Lady Mary, if you please, exceed three hundred;" pursued the merchant; "I need not say that, with one solitary exception, all your friends will be as ever, both welcome and acceptable. I will make the necessary arrangements with Gunter; and perhaps you will oblige me by issuing your own orders o Taplow. I am sorry to tax your kindness o heavily, but I am selfish enough to be unvilling to forego the advantage of your taste nd experience."

"I should like at least to understand the xtent of your intentions, my dear sir," said he lady.

"Your judgment will be their best limit, nadam;" was the courteous reply, I would equest of you to bear in mind the intention f the festival, and to render it worthy of its otive."

I will endeavor to fulfill your wishes to the tter;" smiled the family friend, careless that r nearest relative was officially excluded om the contemplated fête; as with a stately ow, Mr. Trevanion bade her 'good morning,' id stepped into his carriage.

"Surely, my dear Ida, you are not about to andon me with this herculean task upon my nds!" exclaimed Lady Mary, as her young mpanion was about to leave the room.

"I must beg to be excused all participation your labor;" said Miss Trevanion, with a tter smile; "Simmonds shall furnish you th the visiting-book, from which I will direct n to erase the name of Mr. Sydney Elphinone, and you will then have no difficulty save ut of selection."

"Do you wish to visit upon me the annoyce caused by your father?" asked the lady, precatingly.

"By no means; but I disclaim all further ht of interference under this roof."

"Nay, nay; is not such a disclaimer either mature or childish?"

"I think not."

"Upon what then do you base it?"

"Upon the very simple fact that the exclun of the individual who would have been t most welcome to myself, renders the whole air indifferent to me."

Remember, Ida, that I might equally have dined the task on the pretext that my own new was put hors-de-combat."

"You might, madam; but you did not."

As a matter of course! I can have no right tdictate to Mr. Trevanion what guests he sl receive under his own roof."

Certainly not; nor have I on my part attepted to do so; but I may at least exert my unbuted privilege of resenting the insult ofred to one who is excluded."

I do really wish, my dear girl, that I could ince you to listen to reason. Much as you rent your father's opposition to your wishes," sa Lady Mary; "I can assure you that he is tuated only by a desire to insure your hiness."

"Did you always think so, madam?" asked hcompanion, coldly.

"Yes, certainly—that is, after I found—"

That your nephew in becoming the husbd of Ida Trevanion would not secure the hd of Mr. Trevanion's heiress. Oh, trust mdmadam, we do not deceive each other. Bu we need not waste words upon this subjec—my father is right; it has indeed been sufficiently discussed; let us dismiss it, and ead perform our promise. Invite your own guts—I will take care that the cards shall be ly delivered; and, if it should chance by accident that my poor mother should possess some unsuspected friend whom it might pleasure her to see at her side among the crowd by which she will be overlooked, perhaps you will do me the favor to insert that name where, in my selfishness, I might have sought to inscribe another."

Before Lady Mary could reply, Miss Trevanion had disappeared.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE LETTER.

IDA did not, as on former occasions, retreat to her room to give way to feelings of doubt and wretchedness. The first, after the declaration made by her father, was at an end; and from the last she steadily resolved to escape through her own agency. An emotion of indignant resentment swelled at her heart; she saw her affections and free-will set at naught, and her name compromised without hesitation or apology; and a proud consciousness of her power over her future destiny invested her with a strength to which, despite her bold seeming, she had not previously attained. She walked composedly to the hall-table, effaced the name of Mr. Elphinstone from the visiting-book, and desired a servant to carry it without delay to the breakfast-room, after which she proceeded to her own apartment to meditate upon her future line of conduct. Convinced as she was of the sincerity of Elphinstone's affection, it irked her proud nature to condescend, after her resolute refusal to quit her father's roof with him as a fugitive, to volunteer even under the present circumstances a retractation of her denial. She painfully felt that so extreme a step could be rendered endurable to her own sense of delicacy and self-respect only by the earnest pleadings of the man for whom she was about to sacrifice all her long-cherished dreams of prosperity and filial duty; and although while smarting under the first sting of wounded pride, she had resolved to emancipate herself at once by uniting her fate with that of Mr. Elphinstone, she had no sooner seated herself at her desk than the difficulty of declaring her determination rushed upon her in its full force, and dyed her cheek and brow with crimson. A thousand possibilities swept across her imagination, and almost maddened her. What if his prudence, and the representations of his calculating relatives, should have produced a change in his sentiments—what would then be her position? Would she not be an object of scorn to the world, and degraded forever in her own eyes? The thought was a bitter one; she flung down her pen: she felt as though she had not courage to brave such a contingency; and she was still wavering between love and pride, when Mademoiselle Seraphine entered the room, and with a significant smile laid a note beside her, saying, as she did so:

"I trust that madame will not be displeased, but I have promised to convey an answer to monsieur."

"From whom did you receive this?" inquired Miss Trevanion, who had instantly recognized the handwriting of her lover.

"From a gentleman who is now waiting in his boat upon the river;" was the reply of the soubrette; "I had gone down to the hermitage for some clematis for the jardinière of madame; of course I asked no questions—je suis trop discrète, although I comprehended at once that he was a messenger from milord."

"I will return an answer an hour hence, mademoiselle," said her mistress; "I presume that the gentleman, be he who he may, is not in haste."

"He said that he would wait madame's pleasure."

"Such being the case, you had better complete the task upon which you are engaged; I will summon you when my letter is written, should it be necessary to send a reply," said Ida, controling her agitation; "although it appears to me a very extraordinary method of communication, for which I can only account by supposing, that the circumstance of seeing you upon the spot must have induced the bearer of the note before me to spare himself the trouble of landing, and coming up to the house."

"Peut-être;" said the soubrette with a peculiar accent.

"What can you possibly mean by that very significant 'perhaps,' mademoiselle?" demanded Miss Trevanion, haughtily. "Do you mean to infer that you suspect me of being engaged in a clandestine correspondence?"

"I am sorry to have displeased madame," replied the wily French woman with well-acted humility; "but as I learned from the maitre-d'hôtel that monsieur had desired that all letters addressed to madame should be delivered only to himself, and that two had already been received which had not been given to me to carry to madame, I thought that perhaps milord—"

"Enough, enough, mademoiselle," said her mistress, with difficulty repressing her indignation at this new outrage. "Be good enough to form no conjectures which may, and in all probability must, turn out to be erroneous. Do as I have directed, and when I again require your presence I will summon you."

As the soubrette disappeared, Ida tore open the letter.

"What am I to understand?" wrote Mr. Elphinstone; "why have you so suddenly and so cruelly discarded me? Oh, Ida, beloved of my soul, you little know the heart which you are torturing. Not one word in reply to my letters—no token of your continued affection to sustain me during the bitter interval of suspense and trial to which you have yourself condemned me. How have I deserved this? Is not your love the very principle of my existence? and will you not, by assuring me of its continuance, enable me to bear our painful separation? Oh, did you only know—could you only suspect—all that I endure, surely you would not sacrifice me to the vain prejudices of the world which you have been taught to worship, but which can never render even to you the homage of a true and loyal heart like that which you are so coldly casting from you. Once more I ask—can you, and will you resign it for my sake? Have you sufficient faith in my honor and in my affection to trust your destiny in my hands? Forgive me for thus urging you, but I am maddened by doubts and fears, which not even the consciousness of your pure and truthful nature suffices to dispel. Banished from your presence—deprived of the solace of feasting my eyes upon the characters traced by your hand, life itself has become odious to me. It will cost me a severe effort to approach your father's house like a criminal dreading detection; to skulk about his premises, and to bribe one of his menials—but I have resolved to do even this, much as it revolts my sense of right, in order to assure myself that this appeal at least will reach you. Do not refuse me a reply—let me know my fate, whatever you have decreed. It is for you to decide whether we are to be separated forever, with that bitter gulf, the world, between us; or if, despising the vain gauds of that same hollow world, you will make a home of peace and love in my affection.

SYDNEY."

There was no hesitation now in the demeanor of Miss Trevanion; with a firm and rapid hand she traced line after line, until she had revealed to her expectant lover every circumstance which had occurred since their last meeting, and assured him of the full and perfect confidence with which she should unite her destiny to his. She told him, too, her projects for the future, and bade him trust to her firmness for their accomplishment. "Fear not that I shall hesitate or quail before the difficulties which may present themselves," she said, in conclusion; "the bad faith and treachery of those by whom I am surrounded exonerate me in my own eyes. I shall go to you poor alike in wealth and friends, but the riches of your love will more than compensate for all other privations. But remember, Sydney, how solemnly you have sworn that the love, which when once I shall have become your wife, will absorb my whole being, shall never fail me—remember how solemnly I have on my part assured you that misery and ruin beyond you wildest fears would, and must be, the result of your falsehood; and if you feel the faith in the stability of your affection which I am willing to place in it, wait undoubtingly until the moment I shall have appointed for our final meeting, and I will become yours forever."

"Deliver this letter to the person who awaits it, mademoiselle," she said, as the Frenchwoman appeared in obedience to her summons. "I have taken care that you shall not be subjected to the same trouble for the future; and am sorry to have detained the messenger so long on this occasion."

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE JEWEL CASKET.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Trevanion had, as we have shown, coldly discouraged all allusion to his estranged relatives when the subject of a re-onciliation was mooted by the warm-hearted Mr. Plumbtree, yet the knowledge that his uncle was not only in town, but that he had acknowledged himself interested in the welfare of those of whom he had during so many years affected to have forgotten the existence, flattered his self-love, and occupied his thoughts. He was well aware that had he been worsted in his struggle with the world, neither Sir Jasper, nor his haughty wife, would have deigned to have made a single inquiry into his fate; and it was consequently with a feeling of natural and pardonable exultation that he dwelt upon the social advantages by which he was surrounded, and remembered that he owed them all to his own indomitable energy and perseverance.

"Ay," he murmured to himself, with a proud smile; "he has learned, at last, that the boy whom he thrust forth, and to whom he would fain have denied even the name which was his birthright, no longer needs the support that he so ruthlessly withheld: he has heard too, as it would seem, that I have a daughter, whose hand is sought by some of the proudest of the land; and, who knows? he may perhaps covet it for his son—for the boy who stands between me and the fond hopes which I once indulged; but he has still to learn that I have a new triumph in store, and it is now his turn to feel the pang of disappointment; or it may be that long ere this, the gossip of the town has taught him that the child of the neglected Hubert Trevanion is about to become a peeress! Well may he seek for his parvenue wife the honor of such an alliance; but let him not imagine that I have either forgotten or forgiven the wrong which I experienced at her hands. It rankles yet, and it shall be avenged. It is well that they are here; just so would I that it should be. As the betrothed bride of an earl, Ida will excite even more than her usual meed of admiration at court, and it is there that they will meet for the first time. Accident has favored me in this, at least; and the obscure country dame will be taught to feel her insignificance beside the fashion and favor of my high-bred daughter."

Carried away by his soaring fancies, Mr. Trevanion lost sight for a time of the difficulties which yet presented themselves to his darling project in the resolute attitude assumed by the young lady herself; satisfied that by giving a premature publicity to Lord Downinere's addresses, he should compel his daughter to obedience, and cause her to sacrifice her affections to her regard for the opinion of the world, he almost succeeded in divesting himself of all anxiety upon the subject. He had carefully intercepted the letters of Elphinstone, and he trusted that the mere suspicion of his neglect would excite her indignation, and mold her to his own will. Of any further interference on the part of Lady Mary Brooklands he had no fear, as he had not been for so many years domesticated with that very self-seeking individual without appreciating at their just value the qualities of her heart and mind. That she would have encouraged by every means in her power a marriage between her needy nephew and his heiress, he well knew; but he was also quite aware that the threat which he had held out of discarding Ida forever in the event of disobedience, had worked a decided change in her ladyship's sentiments and views. Thus, then, he believed himself secure; and, disregarding the undisguised repugnance of Ida, he insisted that her preparations for the birthday presentation should be of the most costly and expensive kind.

Hitherto, guided by her own judicious and unerring taste, Miss Trevanion had on such occasions studiously avoided all affectation of display; nor had her father sought to change her resolution, although his pride would not permit him to acquiesce in her reasons for a simplicity of attire, which he considered misplaced; on this occasion, however, he forbade all opposition; and, heedless of her entreaties, he sternly commanded that his will should be obeyed.

Sick at heart, and burdened by a painful consciousness of the bitter disappointment which she was about to inflict upon his pride, Ida was dragged by her officious chaperone from one emporium of vanity to another, and daily compelled to listen for hours to discussions in which, although she was herself their object, she could not even affect an interest; and thus the time wore wearily on until the day drew near which was to be the turning-point of her whole after-existence.

The house was full of upholsterers and florists preparing for the fête, and scarcely an apartment remained uninvaded; even in her own room the wretched girl could with difficulty succeed in securing herself from intrusion; and yet what fearful need she had of solitude! As she gazed wildly about her, her breath came quick and short, and the hot blood throbbed like a lava-tide in her aching temples. Scattered over the chairs and sofas lay the rich satins and tissues which seemed to mock at her misery, and to deepen the sinfulness of the act to which she had pledged herself. At times she clinched her hands fiercely together, as though she would have clutched and rent them; and at others the large tears coursed slow and cold down her pallid cheeks, and a faintness as of death appeared to paralyze her spirit, as she sat with her gaze riveted upon the ground, buried in her own miserable thoughts. Yet still she did not waver; her heart was firm even while she acknowledged to herself that the pang was a more bitter one than she had feared; "My mother—my poor mother!" was the voiceless cry of that smitten heart; "who will she have to love her when I am gone?" Could she have detected one look of affection, one symptom of sympathy on the stern countenance of her father, as pale and sad she met him day by day when the family assembled at their hurried meals, she felt that she could have flung herself on her knees before him, and once more urge him not to drive her to an act of desperation unworthy of herself; but Mr. Trevanion continued calm and cold, and vouchsafed no comment on her altered appearance.

The conversation at table turned wholly on the arrangements for the ball, and was interspersed with the querulous complaints of her mother, whose comfort had been invaded, and whose suggestions had been treated with disregard. Like all weak people, Mrs. Trevanion visited her annoyance upon those whom she could blame without fear of reprisal; and thus, not daring to reproach either her husband or Lady Mary, she poured forth the diluted vials of her wrath upon her daughter, to whom she found it expedient to attribute her privations and mortification. Ida, who had every thing her own way, might have contrived to leave her morning-room undisturbed, but Ida had been spoiled by overindulgence, and thought only of her own convenience. Ida had no consideration for her, and was so engrossed by her anticipated pleasures that she quite overlooked the fact that her mother had some right to consideration and respect; but perhaps she was wrong to expect it under the circumstances, when the head of Ida was half-turned by the prospect before her.

Those only who have been subjected to such an ordeal as this, when their hearts were bursting with a hidden grief, can appreciate the feelings with which her victim listened to her senseless upbraidings, and sought to appease her anger; how truly could she have assured her that her petty sorrows, irksome as they might be to bear, were but as atoms beside the one great misery by which she was herself borne down; but her lips were sealed, and when she could have cried aloud for mercy, even from the very depths of her spirit, she bowed her head, and suffered in silence.

At length the eventful day arrived, and great was the exultation of Mademoiselle Seraphine when, on presenting herself to dress her young lady for court, she placed upon the toilet a casket which had just arrived as an offering from the Earle of Downmere, and which contained a magnificent parure of opals and pearls.

"Mais c'est vraiment superbe!" she exclaimed, holding the costly gems against the light, "Madame sera ravissante! En voilà pour au moins mille livres—et d'un goût!—d'un goût!"

Ida shuddered, and turned away. "Arrange my hair as simply as circumstances will permit," she said, languidly; "I shall be weighed down by finery, which your good taste must subdue as far as may be possible. That tinsel trumpery upon my dress annoys me; remove it, mademoiselle, and replace it by something less obtrusive."

"Mais, madame—"

"You will oblige me by obeying my directions," interposed Miss Trevanion, in a tone of decision which her attendant well knew that it was vain to dispute.

"Madame must then choose between white roses and pomegranate blossoms," was the sullen reply; "it will be impossible to loop this silver blonde with any other color."

"You are right," said Ida with a faint smile, "the white roses are precisely suited to the occasion."

"But madame will of course permit me to arrange this guirlande in her hair," persisted the femme-de-chambre, as she pointed to a diadem contained in the jewel-case of the earl, "to match the ornaments upon her robe?"

"I shall not wear them," was the indifferent reply, as Miss Trevanion closed the casket and thrust it from her; "my mother has been kind enough to offer me the loan of her diamonds, and I could not pay her so poor a compliment as to appear in any others."

"A la bonne heure!" ejaculated the Frenchwoman, whose personal vanity was involved in the appearance of her mistress; and without further opposition, the toilet of the young lady was completed.

And very lovely were the face and figure reflected in the cheval glass, when the task of the accomplished Mademoiselle Seraphine was brought to a close. It is true that the cheek of Ida was very pale, and her whole appearance languid and subdued, but this circumstance rather tended to enhance than to diminish the peculiar style of her beauty. With her dark hair parted smoothly across her brow, circtured by a bandeau of brilliants, from which the white plumes fell back like a shower of mist; the girdle of her costly robe fastened by a single diamond of great size and price, and her snowy train looped by hedge-roses, she was indeed the very perfection of queen-like loveliness; and for a moment even her voluble attendant gazed upon her in silent admiration.

"Sont-elles belles, ces Anglaises?" was her mental ejaculation, as she handed to her mistress her gloves and bouquet on the announcement of the carriage; when Miss Trevanion proceeded to the apartment of her mother, as was her usual custom, to give and receive a parting kiss.

"Well, Ida," exclaimed Mrs. Trevanion with unusual animation, as she saw her approach; "You are come at last to show me Lord Downmere's present. How do the opals suit your dress? But, bless me, child, you have not put them on! And you have ruined both your skirt and train by removing the silver ribbons. What can you mean by wasting so much money? And why did you not wear your opals?"

"Because, mother," replied the young lady with a sad smile, "I felt happier in these jewels which belong to you."

"Nonsense," said Mrs. Trevanion, querulously, "I wanted to see what his lordship had sent to you, and you seem to take a pleasure in disappointing me."

"So far from it," was the rejoinder of Ida, as she pressed her lips upon the brow of her mother, "that you have only to desire Seraphine to bring them to you, when you can inspect them at your leisure. Indeed, you will do me a favor if you will allow me to leave them in your custody."

"Well, then, ring the bell, and give your orders, only let me see them at once," was the impatient reply, "and now go, for you must be keeping Lady Mary waiting."

With a weary sigh, Miss Trevanion obeyed. No kind wish, no exulting assurance from her mother's lips went with her; no comment had been elicited by her heavy eye and pallid cheek; no return of her endearment had been offered; and as she descended the staircase which was already garlanded with flowers, and starred with minute lampions in preparation for the festival of the night, her heart swelled almost to bursting, and it was only by a violent effor that she drove back the tears which fain would have forced a passage.

"Not one memory of affection to bear away with me;" she murmured to herself; "not one! But perhaps it is better so; I shall not break one loving heart; I shall not betray one trusting spirit. A few glittering baubles will suffice to supply my place—I shall be soon discarded and forgotten!"

And the radiant being who felt and reflected thus, was decked in diamonds and wreathed with roses!

In the hall, Miss Trevanion encountered her chaperone, stately in purple velvet and antique point. As her beautiful charge approached her, Lady Mary gave one rapid glance over her person, by which she instantly detected the failure of all her laborious arrangements, but she vouchsafed no remark upon the subject; and ere long the well-appointed equipage with its occupants whirled through the gates upon its courtly errand.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE BIRTHDAY.

Mr. Trevanion had calculated correctly. The intelligence of his daughter's betrothal to Lord Downmere had circulated throughout all the circles likely to take an interest in the event; and great, consequently, was the curiosity excited by her appearance. As is usual in cases of the kind there were many who pitied her, or affected to do so, for her folly in obviously sacrificing her happiness to rank; while there were not wanting others who laughed at the short-sightedness of the old earl, and prophesied for him a future little flattering to either party.

"A wretched mésalliance, to say the least of it;" sneered a dowager duchess with three unmarried daughters; "the girl was well enough as an acquaintance, although it can not be denied that Lady Mary Brooklands has overacted her part by thrusting her into the society where one has met her; but for a man of Lord Downmere's station to marry her is really too bad. This leveling system is hateful, and I quite expect that if it is not soon put a stop to, we shall have our sons looking for wives among our dairy-maids."

"My dear duchess;" said a gaunt and titled spinster, with the blood of the Bruce in her swollen veins; "I am glad to hear you so hotly denounce these frightful innovations. I have always discountenanced them, and I always shall."

"But you will at least admit, Lady Margaret," interposed a young guardsman, upon whose arm she leant; "that the bride elect is very beautiful."

"I will admit nothing of the kind, Captain Flavering; said his companion, tartly; "she is as pale as a corpse."

"And her diamonds!" exclaimed the duchess in an accent of affected disgust; "can you imagine such presumption! She plays the peeress a little prematurely but I suppose they are intended, like the sign before a way-side inn, to give notice of her quality."

"Do not quarrel with her diamonds;" laughed Sir Marmaduke Pennefather, who was supposed to be paying his court to one of the three rather mature Ladies Oglander, and who was, consequently, a privileged person; "let her air them while she can, for before long, if I am not greatly mistaken, they will help to cancel one of the long standing and inconvenient 'obligations' of her noble spouse."

"Oh, is it so?" said her grace, evidently relieved by the inference. "I was not aware that the poor old earl was so deeply involved, I see—I see; well, perhaps he might have done worse under the circumstances. Time will show."

"I wonder," said Lady Margaret Bruce, "if her Majesty has heard of the intended marriage, and if so, whether she will condescend to congratulate her. I sincerely hope not, for such a demonstration on the part of royalty would be a dangerous sanction to these unequal, and I must say, unnatural marriages."

"Her father is well connected, you must remember;" again broke in Sir Marmaduke; "the Trevanions are of a good old family, and Mr. Trevanion's mother was the daughter of an Irish earl."

"The man himself is in trade," said the duchess, disdainfully, as she drew her train closer over her arm; "and I shall always be of opinion that such people have no business here."

"Your grace must remember that a very high authority declared us to be 'a nation of shopkeepers,'" gayly remarked the baronet.

"You don't say so!" exclaimed the Scotch spinster, shrugging her thin shoulders; "does her father really keep a shop?"

Sir Marmaduke laughed, and brushed away a grain of snuff from his embroidered waistcoat, as he replied: "Il y a boutique et boutique, my dear madam, and I really must beg that I may not be quoted as your authority for so uncomfortable a blunder. I know nothing of Mr. Trevanion save by report, and I confess that no rumor has yet reached me of the shop."

"All this is very ridiculous," said the duchess, impatiently; "and I do not know why we should waste so many words upon so insignificant a subject; all that I regret in the business is the fact that as Lord Downmere is an old acquaintance of the duke's, and that their estates lie in the same county, I shall be in some sort compelled to be civil to this parvenue peeress, which will, I fear, be a very up-hill and ungracious task."

While this conversation, of which she was the unconscious subject, was progressing in the great saloon, Miss Trevanion had passed into the royal presence, and made her courtesy to the sovereign, by whom her reverence was acknowledged by a silent but gracious smile, and where her extraordinary beauty and graceful self-possession had compelled the admiration even of those to whom she was an object of covert envy or of assumed contempt.

As she re-appeared in the other drawing-room, leaning on the arm of Lady Mary Brooklands, the first person by whom she was approached was Mr. Plumbtree, at whose side stood a tall, and stern, but noble-looking man, somewhat advanced in years, who bore, as she instantly remarked, a strong likeness to her father. There was the same cold and keen expression in the eye, the same rigidity about the lips, and above all, the same lowering expression of the brow; and her heart beat quicker as a suspicion crossed her mind that she now looked for the first time upon the long-estranged relative of whom she had heard so much.

"My dear young friend," said Mr. Plumbtree, still holding her hand after the first greetings were over, "this is a pleasant moment for me, a very pleasant moment, as I have now the opportunity of making you known to your uncle—or great-uncle, I should rather say—Sir Jasper Trevanion, who is anxious, like the rest of us, to offer to you our greetings and congratulations. I may transfer this little hand to him, may I not?"

"As freely as I gladly yield it;" smiled Ida, with a bright blush of genuine pleasure, as she placed her slender fingers upon the palm which was open to receive them; "I feel honored and happy that Sir Jasper should desire my acquaintance."

"Who could do otherwise;" was the cordial rejoinder of the baronet; "who could be otherwise than proud of so fair and beautiful a kinswoman? and I trust, moreover, Miss Trevanion, that you may prove in deed as well as look, the dove which is to bear the olive-branch between me and your worthy father. You can not be ignorant that circumstances, which it would avail little to recapitulate, have rendered us for years strangers to each other; there may have been, and doubtlessly there was, blame on both sides; he was young, impetuous, and reckless, while I was uncompromising and exacting; but long years have passed over us since we last met; I am an old man now, and anxious to be at peace with all the world, doubly desirous, therefore, to live in amity and friendship with those of my own name and blood. Surely, then, Hubert Trevanion will not be more obdurate than myself—but I can not apprehend that such can be the case with so charming a mediator as the one before me to speak peace between us."

"Believe me, Sir Jasper"—commenced his niece, but she was interrupted in her intended rejoinder by the voice of Mr. Plumbtree, who had been engaged in a conversation with her companion, and who at that moment exclaimed impetuously; "You will excuse me, madam, but I am reluctant to believe such a thing possible—so nearly related—the last members of a fine old family, who should hang together like ivy-tendrils, and mutually support the proud edifice which it has taken centuries to rear—no, no; I have a better opinion of the good feeling and judgment of my friend Trevanion; and, by the by, madam, allow me the honor of presenting you to Sir Jasper Trevanion, the uncle of your host."

The baronet bowed coldly, and his salutation was as coldly returned; when a group of ladies near them having vacated their seats, the little party took possession of them, Sir Jasper still retaining his place beside his niece, and pursuing a conversation which was only interrupted at intervals by the greetings exchanged between Miss Trevanion and her numerous acquaintance.

"I have but one regret at the present moment;" said the gentleman, courteously; "and that is that I am deprived of the gratification of making you known to Lady Trevanion, who was prevented by indisposition from paying her respects to her Majesty to-day; my son, however, is here, and I trust I shall be fortunate enough to present him to his fair cousin, whose favor he is most anxious to propitiate, and whose friendship he would be proud to acquire; not, believe me, my dear Miss Trevanion, because the busy tongue of rumor has informed him that she will be ere long enrolled among the noblest ladies of the land, but because he has, like myself, for years deplored the feud in our family which has deprived him of the society and regard of so charming a relative."

"I am delighted beyond measure, Sir Jasper," replied Ida, with a glowing cheek. "that the rumor to which you allude had no influence over his wish for a reconciliation, which I should most warmly welcome, as I assure you, and I rejoice that you have afforded to me the opportunity of so doing, that the report in question—for you refer, no doubt, to my supposed engagement to Lord Downmere—has no foundation whatever in truth. The earl is a mere acquaintance, of whom I have hitherto seen but little, and who it is extremely probable that, after to-day, I shall never see again."

"You astonish me, Miss Trevanion, as I had been positively assured in several quarters that your father gave an entertainment this evening in honor of your betrothal."

"There will, indeed, be a ball at our house to-night;" replied Ida with a quivering lip, and her eyes sank and her breast heaved; "but excuse me, Sir Jasper—the subject is a painful one."

"Not another word, my fair neice, not another word;" hastily interposed the baronet; "I sincerely grieve that I should have distressed you by any allusion to the subject, nor should I have ventured to do so, had I not heard the marriage publicly mentioned as a thing absolutely and avowedly arranged. But now you will perhaps permit me to seek my son, who would scarcely pardon me were I to deprive him of so favorable an opportunity of becoming known to you. May I ask you to do me the favor to retain your seat while I thread the labyrinth of plumes and trains? I will endeavor not to detain you long."

Miss Trevanion bowed her assent in silence, for happy as she felt in the hope that the meeting with her relatives might lead to a renewal of friendly intercourse between the long estranged members of the family, she experienced a sensation of relief at the discontinuance of a conversation which agitated and oppressed her.

As the stately baronet rose and moved away, Lady Mary Brooklands, whose attention had been so systematically engaged by the pertinacious Mr. Plumbtree, that she had failed to catch the purport of the dialogue which was going on beside her, and who was consequently unaware of the important disclaimer which her fair charge had just uttered, turned toward her with a supercilious smile, and said ironically: "You see, Ida, the magic of a coronet. Who may you not hope to have at your feet, when the unbending master of Trevanion Hall, can not resist its spell."

"You are mistaken, madam," said Mr. Plumbtree, emphatically; "and you do Sir Jasper wrong. He is influenced by no consideration of the kind, I can most positively assure you. My friend, the baronet is a greater personage in his own county, than any mere titled individual can ever be in this huge metropolis; and whatever may have been the faults or errors of his earlier life, there does not at the present moment exist on earth a kinder or a warmer-hearted man."

"Are you acquainted with Lady Trevanion?" demanded Ida.

"As intimately as plain Mr. Plumbtree can be," said the country gentleman good-humoredly; "and more so, in all probability, than I should have been, had I not fortunately written M.P. after my name. In short, for I may as well confess to you at once what with your discrimination you will be at no loss to discover when you see husband and wife together, my friend Sir Jasper is not a happy man at his own fireside. Luckily his son is a fine fellow who does justice to his worth; but a cold hearth, as I trust you will never know by experience, my dear young lady, does not make a cheerful home."

"And this said home-chill has caused an outward expansion of the gentleman's sympathies. Is not that what you would infer?" asked Lady Mary in the same accent as she had previously spoken.

"I infer nothing, madam;" said Mr. Plumbtree, perfectly unmoved by the offensive manner of her supercilious ladyship; "I simply state what is the truth, that my friend, probably feeling that as he had committed a mistake himself, it was quite possible that others might have been equally misled, and that although his own was irremediable, a remedy might be found for that which was not so, is sincerely desirous to repair the evil in so far as it depends on him to do it; and that it is with perfect good faith he now seeks a reconciliation with his nephew. It is probable enough that had he been a happier man, his affections might have centered in his home, and made him less dependent upon the regard and good will of those beyond it; but remember, madam, that disappointment too often tends to sour and embitter its victim; and that he who seeks to exercise his better feelings beyond the pale within which they have been chilled and blighted, deserves some credit for not degenerating into an egotist or a tyrant."

"Here comes my uncle," said Ida, glad of a pretext to terminate the dialogue.

"Ay, and his son with him, I am happy to say," replied his kind-hearted advocate.

"It is time that we prepared to depart" exclaimed Lady Mary, rising; "our carriage must be up, and if we are not on the spot when it is cried, we shall be detained for another hour."

"One moment, madam;" said Ida, firmly; "Sir Jasper has been kind enough to seek my cousin in order to present him, and I can not be guilty of such an impropriety as to render his trouble unavailing."

"As you please, Miss Trevanion;" was the ungracious reply; "but you must have the goodness to remember that if, by volunteering to form a score of new acquaintance without my sanction, you incur the displeasure of your father, you do it deliberately."

"I have no apprehension of the kind, madam;" said the young lady, indignantly: "and shall certainly not leave the room until I have been introduced to my cousin."

The noble matron tossed her plumed and turbaned head with the air of one deeply aggrieved, and resumed her seat in silence, as the baronet, followed by his son, succeeded in approaching the party. Ida half rose as they drew near, and extended her hand with graceful cordiality to her young kinsman, who bent low as he received it; while even Lady Mary, angry as she was, could not restrain a feeling of admiration at his superb beauty. Seldom, indeed had a more faultless form or figure met her aristocratic and fastidious eye. Of more than average height, nobly proportioned, and gifted with an ease and grace of manner rarely equaled, Sir Jasper's heir had scarcely a rival even in that courtly circle. In face he resembled his father, but his brow was more lofty, and his eye more open and cloudless; while the smile which played about his lip was at once frank and winning. There was a charm, too, in his low and manly voice which accorded well with the peculiar character of his whole appearance; and as Ida met his bright and earnest gaze, her heart swelled with exultation in the firm conviction that her father must gladly and proudly acknowledge his relationship to one so richly gifted by nature as her peerless cousin.

That he had long been the object of Mr. Trevanion's especial aversion, she well knew, but as yet they had never met, nor did she for a moment permit herself to doubt that when their meeting should take place, all feeling of animosity would end at once.

She did not pause to consider that the noble young man before her stood between her father and the baronetcy to which he had for years aspired.

"I presume, Miss Trevanion," said Lady Mary, at the expiration of a few moments, "that we may now endeavor to leave the palace. The company are rapidly dispersing, and we have already remained too long. We are becoming conspicuous, which is what every high-bred young lady should be careful to avoid."

"I am at your orders, madam," replied Ida, as she passed her arm under the offered arm of her cousin, while her chaperone, still only half-appeased, affected not to remark the courteous gesture of the baronet, and possessed herself of that of Mr. Plumbtree; "I am really grieved that I should have detained you so long."

The patience of the noble matron, was, however, destined to be still further tested, as on arriving in the stone hall, they discovered that their carriage was not yet up, and she was consequently compelled to while away the time in conversation with a score of other titled and fashionable détenues, who were in the same dilemma as herself; while Ida, to whom this meeting with her relations offered a resource from her own painful thoughts, devoted her whole attention to her gratified companions, on whom her grace and beauty had produced a strong and lasting impression.

That his son was the idol of Sir Jasper's heart, she soon discovered, and a sigh escaped her as she remarked the perfect confidence and affection which existed between them. Had she been so loved, so trusted, how different a fate might hers have been! Scarcely could she realize the description which had been given to her of the stern, unbending, domestic tyrant of Trevanion Hall, in the urbane and courtly old gentleman, whose eyes rested upon the face of his child with a depth of love that could not be mistaken, and as they stood together, amid that brilliant and busy crowd, she forgot the past in bright and hopeful visions of the future—that future which was even then yawning dark and threatening before her. It was a radiant dream, from which she was only awakened by the hoarse and strained voice of the callman, who announced the carriage, but she had no sooner parted from her newly-found relatives, and passed the palace gates, than the vision faded, and she was once more flung back upon the sad reality of her position.

By the desire of Lady Mary they were driven home with great rapidity, and on their arrival, her ladyship merely removing her train, proceeded to inspect the apartments which had been decorated for the fête. In the principal saloon, which had been converted into a ball-room, she encountered Mr. Trevanion, with whom she at once retired to the deep bay of the centre window.

"Were they there?" was the first question of the host.

"Yes and no," replied his companion; "the gentleman, father and son were present, but the lady was absent from indisposition—at least, such was the pretext for her non-appearance."

"And were they presented to Ida, madam."

"They were, and the meeting appeared to afford equal gratification to all parties."

"What is the boy like, may I ask?"

"Magnificently handsome. I have seldom seen a finer young man, and had you not, my good sir, conducted matters so ably, I should have advised you to discourage all overtures to a reconciliation, unless you desire to render the family relationship closer than it is at present."

"I require no such inducement to decline it, madam," was the cold rejoinder of the merchant; "but did Sir Jasper hint at any thing of the kind."

"He did more than hint, Mr. Trevanion, he plainly and unhesitatingly expressed his desire to bury the past in oblivion, and to extend the olive-branch, as he practically expressed it, whenever you were prepared to accept it."

"Doubtless; but it is likely to wither by the way. In former years it answered his purpose to expel me from his house—from the home of my ancestors—when I was young and friendless, and required his aid; now that I need it no longer, but am in a position to pay back a hundred-fold the indignities to which I was then subjected, it equally meets his views to court my friendship. He will find, however, that I am a true Trevanion, and made of sterner stuff than he yet seems to comprehend. We have lived more than half a life, strangers to each other, and I, at least, can well afford to make the estrangement permanent."

"That declaration on your part," said Lady Mary; "reminds me of Mr. Plumbtree—who, par parenthèse, fastened himself upon us like a burr—admitted that Sir Jasper was paying the penalty of an ill-judged marriage, and that the discomfort of a cheerless home had rendered him anxious to terminate the feud between you."

Mr. Trevanion smiled an ambiguous, joyless smile, and remained for a moment silent; after which he asked: "Were you satisfied with Ida's appearance?"

"Perfectly."

"And her engagement!"

"Was the theme of every tongue."

"Did she wear the jewels sent to her by Lord Downmere?"

"She did not."

"Upon what pretext?"

"I asked no questions, as I was not supposed to be aware of their arrival, and she made no remark upon the subject."

"Rebellious still," said the merchant, harshly; "but it will avail her nothing. I have her in the toils."

Lady Mary smiled significantly in her turn, but she made no reply.

"I thank you, madam," said her companion, after a pause; "you have, by your frankness, and friendly sympathy in my interests, rendered me a service for which I shall never cease to be grateful. All things are, I trust and believe, progressing successfully as regards my views for my daughter; while I am at ease on the subject of Sir Jasper. My triumph there is complete, for I can grasp the whole tendency and spirit of his sudden change of feeling. Hen-pecked by his wife, and checkmated by his nephew, he will do well to return to his county before he makes his discomfiture a theme of gossipry for the clubs, and has his insignificance forced upon him by the former victim of his brutality. Once more, my dear Lady Mary, I offer you my best thanks."

CHAPTER XX.

AN ELOPEMENT.

SELDOM had upholsterers and decorators done their spiriting more effectually than in the villa of Mr. Trevanion; and it was with a feeling of irrepressible exultation that Lady Mary, at the close of her conference with the master of the house, traversed the noble apartments which were already prepared for the reception of the expected guests. The vast hall of entrance was lined with orange and lemon-trees, interspersed with minute lamps which, when lighted, gleamed like fire-flies among their rich foliage; while behind and above them rose a thick tangle of vines and other parasitical plants, whose pendant branches were drawn aside at intervals, and formed into a frame-work for the large mirrors which reflected on every side the fairy scene around them. In the center of the tesselated floor, a fountain of perfumed water threw a sparkling column of liquid light high in the air, which fell back like a shower of silver stars into its porphyry basin, with a soft and soothing sound; and half-a-dozen fine marble statues, partially vailed by flowering shrubs, gleamed out in their pure and classic beauty beneath the overhanging chandeliers, like the guardian spirits of the place. In the ball-room every niche and recess was filled with the most rare and fragrant exoties, whose parti-colored blossoms looked like living gems as they glowed beneath the effulgence of the myriad wax-lights which were scattered among them; and the walls were paneled with plate-glass draperied by pale green silk. The conservatory, which opened from this apartment was richly carpeted, and supplied with divans and couches of crimson velvet; while on pedestals of scagliola and Egyptian marble stood vases of gold fish, and the gilt cages of innumerable foreign birds of bright plumage and graceful form, over which the shaded lamps threw a soft moon-lighted gleam.

The whole scene was an enchantment. The magic power of wealth, and the wonder-weaving finger of taste were visible on every side; the eye ached with brightness; and it was almost a relief to pass into the dim and spacious library, with its carved bookeases of dark oak, its precious specimens of the old masters, its cabinets of gems, and its magnificent bronzes. The morning-room of Mrs. Trevanion, from which she had been so reluctantly expelled, and in which she received her guests, was, however, the triumph of the artiste; draperied throughout with amber satin, the angles were occupied by pyramids of white lilies, with which the chandelier was also wreathed; but no other ornament was suffered to intrude itself, and the effect was at once simple and striking.

It was with an aching heart that, before she commenced her evening toilet, Miss Trevanion, in compliance with her father's expressed desire, traversed these treasure-laden rooms. She would fain have delayed her entrance there, until the brilliant crowd by which they would in a few hours be filled could distract her attention from the strangeness of their aspect; she would fain have remembered them in after years in their accustomed and familiar seeming; but this happiness was denied to her, and she passed on, amid strange workmen, and hurrying servants, with a languid step and a joyless spirit. Coarse voices sounded in her ears, ungainly forms crossed her path, coatless men were busy on every side, removing ladders, steps, and stools, while others were engaged in lighting lamps, and re-arranging groups of flowers. She gave one long, sad look around her as she stood in her mother's favorite room—that room in which she had first wept, and then dozed away so many hours of her cheerless life. Should she ever again see it as it was? Should she ever again look upon it as it had been when she sat upon her low stool beside her mother's knee, and learned to lisp out her first prayer? As she asked herself the question, a flood of fond and childish memories burst upon her; in her eyes, the spot which had so long been sacred appeared desecrated, and the gulf, which was soon to separate her from all that she had once loved with the whole fervor of her girlish affection, seemed to have been widened and deepened by this last mockery of her anguish.

After awhile she turned and left the apartment; nor was it until she had heard the wheels of more than one carriage grate over the gravel beneath her window that she was prepared to quit her dressing-room. As she paused for an instant before the glass, she was startled at her own appearance; she had been weeping unconsciously, and her eyes were swollen and heavy, and her face ghastly pale. "And is it indeed thus that I am to leave my home, perhaps forever?" she murmured sadly; "I would, have gone forth rich in a father's blessing, in a mother's love—I would have received their parting kiss in the silence and sacredness of home; but even that luxury is denied to me. The very roof that was familiar to my infancy, and dear to my youth, even that seems to mock at my misery, and to welcome in my stead the idle votaries of pleasure, many of whom pass beneath it only to fill its echoes with the false words of flattery, and others perchance to scoff. Oh, I am very, very wretched!"

And once more the large unbidden tears fell cold and slow, and she cast herself into a seat, with her face buried in her hands. How long she remained thus motionless, and weighed down by the bitter grief to which she had involuntarily yielded, she knew not, when a burst of music caused her to start suddenly from her chair.

"One more effort," she exclaimed wildly; "and I shall have done with this false, hollow world forever."

As she spoke her eye fell upon the caskets which were strewn over her toilet, and which, in accordance with her instructions, Mademoiselle Seraphine had placed there before she dismissed her. With a stern and unnatural composure she opened each in turn, to assure herself that every gem was in its place, and then she added to the heap every ring which she had hitherto worn save one which contained her father's hair, and every ornament of daily use save a small locket containing a miniature of her mother, attached to a slight chain of gold, which she clasped about her neck and concealed beneath the trimming of her dress.

"I can not part with these," she whispered hoarsely; "not with these, for none could value them as I have done."

She swallowed a draught of water, and leaned for a moment from the window to calm her throbbing brow; and then slowly but firmly, she descended the flower-wreathed stair-case, and prepared to join the guests.

In the hall she encountered Lady Mary Brooklands, who was about to send a servant to summon her, and who exclaimed in angry amazement: "Are you mad, Ida? Can you really intend to present yourself in such a state as that? Have you no respect for your father's taste and wishes that you make your appearance like a school-girl, in a dress unornamented even by a few paltry flowers? You can not be serious!"

"Do I look like one who is inclined to jest, madam?" was the bitter rejoinder; "or do you consider that I have cause for mirth, when I see my happiness disregarded, and myself valued only as a puppet to afford sport for others? If you can indeed do so, I envy you alike your philosophy and your strength of mind."

"This is no moment, Miss Trevanion, for so uncalled-for a burst of temper, nor have I time either to analyze or to resent it; while you have already absented yourself too long from your father's guests. Your extraordinary conduct has excited remarks and comments which you would have done well to avoid, but which your new and strange caprice of simplicity can not fail to increase. However, I have done, since I perceive that my influence over your actions has ceased."

"Lady Mary," said Ida, with sudden agitation, as she extended her hand to her companion; "let no angry feeling come between us to-night. I believe that we should both regret it."

"Be it so," replied the lady, coldly, as she led the way to the reception-room.

Ida nerved herself for the trial which awaited her, but her courage had nearly failed when she observed Lord Downmere in close and confidential discourse with her mother, whose smiles and diamonds appeared to have as completely metamorphosed her as the hands of hirelings had done her house. Mrs. Trevanion was indeed radiant with triumphant vanity. The congratulations which had been poured in upon her on the brilliant prospects of her daughter, the compliments which had been lavished upon the splendor of her fête, the movement about her, the lights, the music, the glitter of jewels, the rustling of silks and velvets, and the high-sounding titles which echoed in her ears, had thrown her into a state of excitement which gave a glow to her usually pale cheek, and lent an unnatural sparkle to her eye.

Striking was the contrast presented by the daughter to whom she owed that brief and passing enjoyment; and even the earl, who stood in a stately attitude beside his hostess, his jeweled star flashing in the light, started as she approached. The appearance of Miss Trevanion was rather indeed that of a victim prepared for sacrifice than the heroine of a festival. The rich masses of her dark and lustrous hair rendered the brow beneath them of a death-like pallor, and were unrelieved by a single ornament, while her dress of snowy muslin was equally unadorned; her firmly-set lips were white and rigid, and she moved rather like an automaton than a being gifted with sense and life. As she reached her mother's side, she smiled, and many who were watching her closely, never forgot that smile.

Her recognition of the earl was cold and even haughty, and he was evidently disconcerted by so public a demonstration of her indifference; but with considerable self-possession he endeavored to render it less conspicuous by addressing to her a murmured compliment, coupled with a reproach that she had not honored him by wearing the jewels which he had been permitted by her father to offer to her acceptance. Then the statue woke into life, and the modern Pygmalion shrank before the effect of his own presumption. The eyes of Ida flamed, and the hot blood rushed over her brow and bosom.

"Have you yet to learn, my lord?" she asked; "that no slave willingly assumes his fetters? What has been forced upon me I have borne; do not compel me to any other declaration. Is not this enough?" and she glanced around her hurriedly as she spoke; "do not try me beyond my strength, or it must fail."

"Madam"—stammered the earl. Ida waved her hand with an impatient gesture, and moved away, leaving her bewildered auditors breathless with consternation.

Gayly sped the moments with the reckless votaries of pleasure who were assembled in honor of Miss Trevanion's betrothal, while the wretched girl herself flitted from one apartment to another like a wandering spirit; a cold and constrained smile upon her lips, and anguish in her heart; she heard not the witching strains of Strauss, she scarcely saw the whirling, figures, that enveloped her in light clouds of gauze or gleaming volumes of satin as she made her way among them; to those who sought her hand she pleaded fatigue and indisposition; and while by some the plea, supported by her pale cheeks and drooping eyelids, was readily admitted, there were not wanting many who attributed the singularity of her manner and the simplicity of her attire, to an affectation of importance at which they sneered, as premature and unbecoming in a mere merchant's daughter.

Very different, however, was the effect which they produced upon Mr. Trevanion when his eye first fell upon her. For a moment he doubted the evidence of his senses; but no, there could be no mistake; the noble head, adorned only by its redundant masses of rich dark hair; the exquisite form plainly draped in simple muslin, were indeed those of his daughter, upon whose attire his vanity had lavished ungrudgingly sums that would have sufficed to clothe her like an empress; and, worse than all, evidently shrinking from the observation and homage which on such an occasion she should have courted. The brow of the merchant lowered with mortification and disappointment as he made his way toward her, and there was a concentrated bitterness in the tone with which he said in a subdued voice when he reached her side: "This is the crowning insult, Miss Trevanion, and one which I am never likely to forget. Do you owe nothing to the father who has made you the first and highest object of his ambition? Do you hope that I am to be disgraced with impunity by my own child in the eyes of half London? Are you insane? or can you really be unaware that you require but a few blades of straw and half a dozen withered posies added to your costume, to be a fitting representative of Ophelia?"

"Father," faltered Ida; "I have done you no wrong: I could not add deceit to my other errors. Have you dealt fairly with me? All about me is brilliant falsehood, but I at least will take no part in it. You can not ask me to trample upon my own heart."

"Beware, Miss Trevanion;" was the threatening rejoinder, as the merchant turned angrily away; "it may now be too late to change your dress, but I advise you to change your countenance, if you would wish me to remember when we next meet that I am still your father."

"When we next meet;" murmured Ida, to herself, as he left her side. "How and where shall we indeed meet again!"

Escaping from the heat and hurry of the ball-room, she passed into the dim and deserted library, and threw herself into a seat. The glad sounds of revelry, and silvery voices of music came mingled upon her ear; the odors of a thousand flowers floated upon the air; and still she sat there, motionless as if hewn in stone.

After a time, moreover, the distant tumult contrasted with the deep silence immediately about her produced a bewildering effect upon her over-strained nerves, and suddenly the vast and somber apartment rang with a peal of wild unnatural laughter; she pressed her hands upon her brow until it ached beneath their tension; and then hurriedly starting to her feet, she exclaimed in a voice which sounded strange and unfamiliar even to her own ear.

"My father is right; this is my bridal fete, and I should do it honor. I wrong Sydney—and wrong myself—by this ill-timed and ill-omened sadness. I will be gay. There will be many a heart besides my own in the crowd whose mirth will be rendered only the more audible from the hollowness within."

Touched by deep passion as by the wand of a magician, Miss Trevanion stood for one moment trembling with fierce and overwhelming excitement; her cheek burned, and her eye flashed with fever; never had she looked so imperial in her proud beauty. Frenzied alike by what she had already undergone, and by what she still contemplated, her pulses throbbed, and her bosom heaved tumultuously. At that moment she could have braved the tortures of the inquisition, for she was reckless.

As if fearing to trust herself with further thought, she left the library; and when ere long she again entered the great saloon, leaning upon the arm of a casual acquaintance whom she had encountered on her way; the change in her appearance was very striking. Every shade of despondency, every symptom of languor had disappeared; and so brilliant was her whole expression that a murmur of astonished admiration met her on every side. Her low graceful laughter, her perfect self-possession, and her eager, animated look excited the astonishment of all around her; and there were not wanting many in that brilliant throng who envied her for the matchless beauty which made her independent of the adventitious aids of ornament, and who were compelled to acknowledge their own attractions eclipsed and overborne by the unassisted loveliness of the woman whose pale cheek and subdued deportment had been the theme of malicious comment and ungenerous criticism only an hour previously.

"The quasi-countess has wearied of her sentimental fancy," said a passée beauty to her partner, as Ida, radiant with false excitement, took her place in the dance.

"She is right," was the reply; "for she is gloriously lovely now. She scarcely looks like the same person who appeared so languid and listless only an hour since."

"Terribly like temper," retorted the lady, arranging a bouquet upon her dress; "his lordship will find matrimony no sinecure, I fear."

And meanwhile the dance went on, and the grace and eleganee of the heroine of the fête were the universal theme of admiration. Lord Downmere, by no means satisfied in his own mind that matters were progressing so satisfactorily as his host had represented, received the compliments which were addressed to him with a constraint that he vainly endeavored to overcome; and Mr. Trevanion on his side, felt perplexed by an inconsistency of conduct on the part of his daughter of which he had never previously thought her capable. Could his warning have indeed operated thus powerfully upon her? He scarcely ventured to indulge the hope; but it was at all events gratifying to his pride to find how far, even in her present simple attire, she eclipsed the brightest and noblest beauties about her. His brow grew smooth, and his manner bland, as he moved among his guests, drinking in with satisfied vanity the murmurs of pleasure and delight which met his ear on all sides. Nor was Lady Mary less enchanted than himself as she witnessed the effect produced upon her own five hundred friends, with whom she had, as a matter of course, peopled the brilliant saloons of her host, by the splendor of the entertainment.

"No, no; believe me, when I assure you, my dear marchioness," she exclaimed, with ready tact, to a rouged and ringleted dowager who had indulged in a bitter sarcasm on the appearance of the young hostess; "that even your perspicuity is at fault in this instance as regards my little friend. It is from no feeling of covert presumption that she has eschewed the advantages of dress on this occasion, but from a widely different impulse. As Countess of Downmere, she will ere long avail herself, as you will see, of all the splendor of her rank, but to-night she is aware that she is still only Ida Trevanion, and she has acted accordingly."

Did the family friend believe, as she smilingly gave this explanation, that she had discovered the real solution of the enigma? Far from it; but she felt that her own credit was at stake, and she had too much worldly wisdom to confess herself mystified.

It was far otherwise, however, with Mrs. Trevanion, who was, and did not scruple to confess herself, both angry and astonished at the apparent capriee of her daughter. Like all weak people she attached an undue weight to the opinion and customs of fashionable society, and her mortification was consequently intense when she discovered how absolutely both had been set at defiance by Ida.

"Who would believe, my lord," she said pettishly to the earl, who, on this occasion, considered it expedient to attach himself to his future mother-in-law; "that she was the same person who looked so queen-like at the drawing-room this morning? It is really too bad."

"Miss Trevanion knows the power of her charms, madam," said the antiquated lover, with an uneasy smile; "and you see that her triumph is complete."

"I wish," pursued the lady, who had an unfortunate talent for saying awkward things at the wrong moment; "I do so wish, my lord, she had danced with you instead of Captain Villiers; I am sure that it ought to have been so."

Her noble companion winced, and glanced involuntarily at his gouty foot, which, imprisoned in a shoe that had already more than once reminded him of his infirmity, gave to the absurd lamentation of his hostess all the point of an epigram; and, as he did so, he murmured a reply which was unintelligible.

On sped the hours garlanded with flowers, loud with revelry, and winged by pleasure. The day dawned; the birds twittered among the branches, the lark burst into song as it darted toward heaven with its morning thanksgiving; the gray light streaked the river-ripple; and honest labor once more girded itself to battle with the toils of the coming day; and as the world of the artizan and the mechanic woke into life, the rooms of Mr. Trevanion began to thin; and the last languid efforts of the weary musicians were overpowered by the rolling of carriages, the loud voices of servants, and the turmoil of the departing guests; but even these ceased at last, and Mr. Trevanion stood for a moment alone, in the midst of expiring tapers, drooping garlands, and disordered draperies.

"Tell Miss Trevanion," he said, suddenly, to a servant who was hurrying past him, "that I wish to see her in the library before she retires."

The man hastened to obey his commands, but they were not destined to be fulfilled; in vain did he appeal to her mother, to Lady Mary, and to Mademoiselle Seraphine; not one of them had seen Miss Trevanion for the last hour; in vain did he traverse the conservatory, and the saloons; wander out into the grounds, and urge others of the domestics to assist him in the search; the result was disappointment; and he was at length compelled to return to his impatient master with the unlooked-for tidings that Miss Trevanion was nowhere to be found.

CHAPTER XXI.

MARRIED LOVERS.

On the southern banks of the Thames, not many miles from London, may be seen from the river, a pretty and retired village, backed by a well wooded hill, at whose summit, as the boat glides on, glimpses may be caught among the dense foliage, of a noble mansion, at one extremity of the park—for such is the purpose to which the height has been applied—and at the other that of an observatory which overtops the forest timber. Thence the land descends gently to the river, the low-lying grass fields being dotted over their whole surface with browsing cattle; while only a short distance from the shore, stands a picturesque little church, half embowered in ivy, and surrounded by its quiet burial-ground. This modest edifice, upon which an artist-eye can not fail to linger with delight, is also an object of interest to the antiquary from the historical tradition which is attached to it; and which, from its regal associations, contrasts strangely and startlingly with the simple and unpretending appearance of the building. At the distance of a hundred yards from the church, commences the village street, which stretches along the bank of the stream, in a long line of fishermen's cottages, where their home-keeping wives drive a small trade in the cheaper produce of their husband's nets, and where many a window arrests the steps of the school-going urchin, by its rich stores of sugar-stick, gingerbread and marbles. Further inland, however, partially, and in some instances, totally hidden from the passer-by upon the river, are to be found in the neighborhood of which we write, some of these small but pretty residences which are peculiar to 'merrie England;' those sunny pleasant homes where elegance and comfort compensate for space and splendor, and where the refined and gently-nurtured, who are debarred the luxuries of wealth, may, nevertheless, nurse their graceful fancies, undisturbed by these squalid and depressing associations which genteel poverty has to endure in other lands.

It was a lovely evening in autumn; and the glass doors of a small but exquisitely furnished drawing-room, facing the river, were flung back to admit the various odors of the blossoms with which the flower-pots dotted over the lawn were plentifully filled. The sun was westering, and the sky was rich with fleecy clouds that had caught a roseate hue from the glow of crimson by which he was environed, and which was also reflected upon the calm ripple of the noble stream. From the wooded height, the song of the nightingale had already commenced, while yet more distant, might be heard the lowing of cattle from their pastures, mingled with the far-off hum which rose from the peopled river. The scene from that open window was one of constantly recurring interest; at one moment the tall spars of a stately ship, her sails furled, and her crew idly clustering together at the prow, might be seen, gliding along like a spirit, the tiny steamer by which the huge fabric was impelled looking like a mere dark speck upon the water, totally unconnected with the mighty mass by which it was apparently pursued; at another, the dark volume of smoke emitted by the funnel of some arrowy steamship, rose into the air like a pillar of metal, then wreathed itself into a thousand fantastic shapes, and finally became scattered into a thin gray mist, and lost in the surrounding atmosphere. Flag and pennant, the national insignia of every nation upon earth, and those less conspicuous but equally honorable banners borne at the mast-head of the lordly merchant ships, whose owners are the sovereigns of European commerce, each passed by in its turn, freighted with the wealth of every land, and destined to plow the waves of every sea.

Within the apartment, and half shaded by the muslin drapery which had been drawn back to permit her eye to wander unimpeded over the scene which we have endeavored to describe, half-sitting and half-reclining upon a sofa, a chance passer-by might have discovered a lady of surpassing beauty, and at her feet a fair-haired and handsome man, who was gazing up to her with a look of passionate and almost reverential fondness.

The little group consisted of Mrs. Elphinstone and her husband. One happy month had already flitted by since she had given her hand to the man for whom she had abandoned home, and wealth, and parents; and if she sometimes heaved a sigh at the remembrance of the past, it arose from no feeling of regret at the step which she had taken, but was induced only by the resolute estrangement of her father. Safe in their own happiness, Sydney Elphinstone and his bride had made merry over the marvelous comments of the public prints, which, with that total want of respect for the sacredness of private life that occasionally characterizes them, had detailed, more or less faithfully, according to their means of information, the particulars of her elopement. It was, as they well knew, a mere nine days' wonder, which would soon be superseded in the public mind by some other marvel; but the relentless silence of those to whom she had been for long years an object of affection, weighed heavily upon her spirit.

"My poor mother," she murmured to herself; "dare not, even if she would, assure me that I am not forgotten and lamented; but my father—can it be that he does indeed find it so easy to abandon me? And Lady Mary—she is, at least, a free agent, and might well have remembered how assiduously she once strove to nurse the passion which she subsequently affected to disavow—and yet all—all have failed me."

"You are sad, dearest;" said the young husband after a silence of several minutes; "speak to me, my love, and assure me that you do not already regret the sacrifice that you have made for my sake."

"Regret, Sydney;" whispered Ida as she bent forward with a smile, and buried one of her small white hands in the clustering masses of his fair hair: "Do I look like one who regrets the past? Have I cause to do so? Fie on you for the question! But even were it otherwise—even were I less entirely happy than I am,—know me better. I never act without reflection, dearest; and having acted, I never repent."

Elphinstone laughed gayly. "That is a bold assertion, my sweet wife;" he said, as he made captive the slender fingers that were toying with his curls; "and one that will render me less anxious when I detect a shadow upon your brow; for I confess that there have been moments when I could not conceal from myself that I had asked, and you had granted, too much."

"So soon!" murmured Ida, beneath her breath.

"But what could I do?" pursued her light-hearted companion, unconscious of her interruption; "I loved you to adoration—I could not live without you—and so, like all men under similar circumstances I suppose, I consulted only my own selfishness, and dragged you down from your 'high estate' to share my poverty."

"Do you ever repent, Sydney?" asked his wife with a forced smile.

"I may have done so once or twice in the course of my life;" was the cheerful joinder; "but henceforth I shall have nothing to repent, for you will be my guiding star; and led by such a light I can scarcely fail to walk in the right path."

"Dear Sydney"—murmured his wife, as the cloud passed from her spirit; "you need no other monitor than your own noble nature."

"After all, dear one;" pursued the young husband; "you must confess that this 'love in a cottage' is very charming; and that a garland of jasmin is lighter to wear than a gilded coronet."

"And the song of that unseen nightingale, Sydney—is it not far sweeter than the warbling of the most gifted prima donna who ever threw an audience into raptures? Hark! There was a glorious gush of melody; how the air seems to throb beneath its weight."

"I would rather hear your voice than that of the finest nightingale that ever flew."

"Vandal!"

And once more there was silence.

The sun had set, and the moon which had nearly reached its full, was slowly sailing up the heavens; the breeze had fallen, and a long line of light lay upon the water, while countless stars flickered and quivered in the deep blue of the cloudless sky.

It was a glorious evening, redolent of harmony and peace; and very full of intense and absorbing happiness were the two married lovers, who sat with their hands locked in each other gazing almost unconsciously on the scene before them. They had entered their earthly Eden, into which as yet no serpent had glided to blight the flowers upon their path with its venom. Deep and earnest was the affection which filled the breast of each, but far opposed was the nature of that affection; with Sydney, it was full and perfect, without a doubt or a misgiving; he had won the idol of his heart, and he was proud at once of her, and of his own triumph. Content to dwell among the blessedness of the present, he cared not to look beyond; and when occasionally his thoughts would stray into the future, they were filled with bold and manly determination to wrestle with the world, and to win fame and affluence for the wife who was henceforth to share his fortunes. He never doubted her, he never doubted himself; he possessed, as he had said, youth, talent, and energy, and secure of these he felt strong enough to struggle and to conquer. The radiant being whom he had made his own, must not be deceived in him; ere long he would commence the battle of life with a stout heart and an unflinching resolution: and thus his dreams were all bright and glowing, without one cloud to overshadow them. It was, however, far different with Ida; the very excess of her happiness awoke a feeling of terror in her bosom; she thought not of Sydney toiling to secure for her an affluence of which he would have been careless for himself; she thought only of Sydney estranged by time, and by closer contact with that world in which he would soon be called to play a more active part; of Sydney, young, gay, and flattered, who might learn to feel that he had sacrificed the brightest portion of his life to a fancy of which he might one day weary; and as these painful misgivings forced themselves upon her, the tears which she would not suffer to fall, flooded her heart, and swelled it almost to bursting. The very quality of her love differed essentially from his; there was not the same calm even flow of tenderness, of almost womanly trust and clinging, which was engendered by his frank and open nature; she could not, as he did, live in the present, and yield herself up unresistingly to its charm; deeper and more passionate were the feelings which were hidden within her breast, and by which her whole being was imbued. There were indeed moments when, terrified by the impetuosity of her emotions, she resolutely combated their violence, but the languor which supervened was not repose; and she shrank appalled by the visions of her own imagination as she pictured to herself the possibility that a change might come over her destiny, and the effect which that change might produce upon herself.

On the evening we have described, however, the calm and soothing aspect of all around and about her, the cloudless sky, the rippling river, the silent stars, the mysterious whispering of the leaves, the clear soft moonlight, and, more than all, the fair and placid brow of her young husband, had hushed her spirit into profound and gentle peace; and as he sat at her feet with the silvery light gleaming upon his noble countenance, she gazed upon him with a still rapture that laid every other feeling to rest. Like him she was for a time lost in the present; and the very silence around her was eloquent of happiness.

And other days as bright and as beautiful succeeded that soft autumnal night: days throughout which Sydney Elphinstone lived on his unbroken existence of devotion and delight, and in which Ida was also supremely blessed, although a thousand vapors drifted across the haven of her enjoyment which it required all the sunlight of his love to scatter and disperse; but the young husband never dreamed that any cloud had darkened the calm and glorious brow of her he worshiped; neither tone nor look betrayed the inner workings of the troubled spirit which marred its own brightness, and blighted its own peace.

The favorite walk of Ida was a bowery lane, which, gently ascending the hill, formed one of the private roads to the extensive park that occupied its height; where, the owner being absent, Elphinstone had without difficulty obtained permission for his wife and himself to wander at will, a privilege of which they largely availed themselves. The road terminated in a gothic lodge of unusual size, and considerable architectural beauty, which had at one period been inhabited by a relative of the noble family to whom the estate belonged, and which was, during the residence of the Elphinstones in the neighborhood tenanted by a venerable couple, ancient retainers of the lords of the soil, whose old age was made happy by a residence upon the spot endeared to them by long habit and cheerful memories. The worthy dame whose quaint attire and old-world courtesy were a constant source of interest and amusement to Ida, was on her side delighted with the graceful and elegant young couple for whom she was so frequently summoned to open the jealously-guarded gate; while the reckless generosity of Sydney had made an equally favorable impression upon her infirm and somewhat morose husband.

It was on a fair fresh morning, a week or ten days subsequent to the period at which we have introduced the newly-married pair to our readers, that they strolled forth, and after a moment of irresolution, finally took once more the way to the gothic lodge. The woods were beginning to betray symptoms of the changing season. A golden gleam had settled upon the beech-trees, which glittered in the sunshine like flakes of gold; the weeping willows, those spendthrifts of the shrubbery, were already scattering their leaves to every idle breeze that wandered near them; while the elms, as though they knew that the time for summer tints had gone by, had assumed a russet hue, as they swayed their branches soberly in the wind. Many of the trees were, however, still gay in their vivid greenery, the short crisp turf was as fresh and bright as ever; and the birds as full of song. Gayly the married lovers pursued their way, Sydney at times laughing delightedly as the breeze caught the long ringlets which fell low upon the cheeks of Ida, and spread them forth beyond the edge of her small bonnet like silken banners; startled occasionally as a rabbit or a hare, which their light footsteps had disturbed, darted past them, or a pheasant rose with a loud whirring sound, and escaped into the depth of the woods; they at length reached the lodge, where they were smilingly welcomed by the venerable gate-keeper.

"I said that you would come to-day, my lady," exclaimed the old woman, exultingly; "I told my Jonathan that you would be here this blessed morning; and sure enough here you are; but keep to the open turf, for the wood-paths are damp after last night's rain; and such shoes as yours, ma'am, won't keep out the wet, I take it."

"You are right, good Mrs. Dorcas," said Elphinstone; "my wife—" how he loved the sound of those words, and how proud he looked as he uttered them—"my wife's shoes are not indeed quite adapted for miry paths; but as she is only just learning to walk, we can scarcely expect her to be very profound on such subjects."

"Ay, ay," replied the old woman with a significant nod: "I understand all about it, I believe, sir. Well, well; we can't put old heads upon young shoulders, as the saying goes; and if she is only half as good as she is handsome—and I for one don't doubt it—"

"You are right, Mrs. Doreas, you are quite right," said Sydney, seizing her hand, and shaking it heartily; "quite as good as she is handsome, and that ought to satisfy any man."

"To be sure it ought, sir; and at all events it satisfies you; there can be no mistake about that; and your lady may own the same on her side; for as my old man and I often say, that you are the handsomest couple we ever set our eyes on, and we've seen a many of the quality too, in our time."

"Better and better!" laughed Elphinstone; "why, Mistress Doreas, you are a perfect courtier, and ought not to be buried alive here."

"Well, it has been dull enough all this summer, I do confess, sir;" said the garrulous old gate-keeper; "but just now I am in luck, and may hope for a better time."

"Ha, indeed; then I suppose your lord is coming back to England?"

"Oh, dear no, sir; my lord and my lady intend to winter in Rome, and even if they were to change their minds, they'd stay in London I take it; or go down to their other place westward, for they never fancy this in the cold weather, being so near the river. No, but I have let all the best rooms in the lodge for the next six months, so that we shan't be so lonesome-like as we were last year."

"A strange season, I should say," observed Sydney, "for a family to select so secluded a residence."

"Why, it ain't altogether a family," said the old woman, gravely. "It's only a widow-lady and her daughter: a grand lady, too, I rather think, sir, to tell you the truth, but I fancy they are not over rich, for all that."

"Few people are, my good friend;" remarked Ida with a smile, as she prepared to walk on, fearful of intruding upon the secrets of a stranger.

"True, ma'am, true," acquiesced the pertinacious old woman; "but some's richer than others; and I've a notion that this lady that's coming to lodge with me is poorer than she has been."

"In that case, Mistress Doreas, you had better take care of yourself," said Sydney, archly.

"Oh, I've no fear for myself, sir," replied the gate-keeper, eagerly, "no fear for myself; for the lady behaved like a lady as she is, and offered to pay me three months in advance."

"But surely," objected Ida, interested in spite of herself by the animation of her humble acquaintance, "you can scarcely have such accommodations as would be required by so superior a person as you describe, in your present residence."

"I don't wonder that you should think so, ma'am," said Mrs. Doreas; "because, of course, you can't be aware that a maiden aunt of my lord's lodged and died here, and the rooms have never been touched since, except to be dusted. My lord would have it so; and handsome enough they are, I can assure you, ma'am, for any lady in the land."

"Well, at all events I congratulate you, my good Mrs. Doreas," said Elphinstone, as he drew the arm of his wife within his own; "and now we will continue our rambles. But, by the by, when do you expect these new inmates of yours?"

"Oh, they have already been here these three days, sir," was the reply, "or I would have asked your lady to look at Lady Margaret's rooms. They are out somewhere in the park; they are very little in the house this fine weather."

"They are right," was the gay rejoinder; "and now we will go into the park in our turn. We are not likely to interfere with each other, as in all probability we shall not even meet."

"Likely enough, sir; but if you should, there will be no harm done."

"I trust not, my worthy dame; so we will wish you good morning for the present."

"Good morning, sir, and a pleasant walk to you," was the reply of the old woman as she turned the key in the gate, and re-entered the lodge, while Mr. and Mrs. Elphinstone resumed their walk.

CHAPTER XXII.

A RENCONTER.

For awhile the two pedestrians followed the advice of Mrs. Doreas, and kept in the open ground; but after a time they began to wish for the calm seclusion of the woods, and plunged into their welcome shade. Fond and happy hearts make society and fellowship with all around them; the sunshine within gives warmth and gladness to every external object; and thus the moments flew by with lightning speed, until Ida, who was not yet sufficiently inured to this species of exercise to set fatigue at defiance, began to betray evident symptoms of over-exertion.

"We have walked too far and too fast for you, my love," said Sydney, as he felt her weight grow heavy on his arm; "and we must make our way back in the open park where you may rest for a time without danger of damp, which you can not unfortunately do under this dense foliage; and see, most opportunely, here is a path cleared through the trees which evidently leads to the Observatory. What say you? Can you make the effort?"

Ida willingly assented, and in a few moments they discovered by the bright gleam of light which appeared at some distance before them that they should ere long be in the open grounds once more. Cheered by the prospect of repose, Ida moved more rapidly forward, and they soon stood at the edge of the belt through which they had ascended the height. The prospect before them was enchanting, and weary as she was, Mrs. Elphinstone remained for a few instants looking far out over the busy river and the opposite shore ere she had taken possession of the grassy knoll upon which her anxious husband had hastily thrown the shawl which she had cast off during their ramble. She had scarcely seated herself, however, ere she became aware that the scene had fascinated other eyes beside her own, for beneath the shadow of the tower where she was protected from the glare of the sun, sat a young girl, so assiduously engaged upon a sketch which she was making, that she was evidently unconscious of the vicinity of the strangers.

"Look, Sydney," whispered his wife; "you were a false prophet, for most assuredly we have stumbled upon the young lady of the lodge."

Elphinstone's eyes followed the direction of her finger, for hitherto he had been so absorbed in his care for her, that he had not once glanced around him, and he immediately acquiesced in the probability of her inference.

"Judging from her figure at this distance," he whispered in reply; "she must indeed be very young, scarcely, I should say, escaped from childhood, with all its glorious associations of back-boards and milk and water. Who can they be?"

"Nay, love;" said Ida, with the uneasy feeling which the subject of age never failed to produce upon her, and who was morbidly anxious to conceal it; "you must, at least, acknowledge, whoever they may be, that the figure before us is extremely graceful—remark the pliant bend of her neck, and the firm but easy attitude of her small head. She is really a very picturesque object as she sits there enveloped in those profuse folds of white drapery, with her long golden ringlets heaving in the wind."

"I will acknowledge any thing you please, dearest," said Sydney, as he wound his arm affectionately about her waist; "if you will only lean on me, and endeavor to overcome the fatigue to which I have subjected you through my selfish want of thought, and really now you mention it, the fair damsel before us here, does make a very pretty object in the landscape. It is a pity that she can not put herself into her sketch."

"How strange that she should be alone at such a distance from the lodge," pursued Mrs. Elphinstone.

"You forget," said her husband "that this is charmed ground, upon which only the privileged can enter; and that she doubtlessly imagined herself as free from our intrusion, as we believed ourselves secure from meeting her."

And still the subject of their conversation pursued her task without once suffering herself to be diverted from her occupation, while at intervals, a few snatches of song burst from her lips, in a clear, wild, thrilling voice of exquisite volume and sweetness.

"Another nightingale, Ida," smiled Sydney; "upon my word, the neighborhood improves; who would have thought of encountering such a little prodigy as this, in a country village?"

"Hush," murmured his wife; "she is not alone, for I see another figure advancing toward her from behind the Observatory."

As Mrs. Elphinstone spoke, a lady habited in mourning, moved forward into the sunshine for a moment, and then closing a book which she held in her hand, slowly approached the young artist.

"Let us go," said Ida, springing to her feet, "let us go at once, Sydney, for we can not fail to be observed ere long, and I would not for the world that we should be suspected of the indelicacy of listening to their conversation."

"But can you indeed venture on further exertion so soon, my beloved?" asked her husband, anxiously; "you have scarcely had time to overcome your previous fatigue."

"Fear nothing for me," smiled Ida; "I really feel quite strong again, and I know not why, but I shall be glad to escape unseen by these strangers."

"Unfortunately, that is impossible," said Sydney; "unless we return through the wood, which would lengthen our walk very considerably, and you are unequal to any gratuitous exertion of that kind. Pass them we must, and therefore, if you are really desirous to reach home without delay, let us lose no more time."

With a reluctance for which she could not account to herself, and which she was consequently unwilling to confess, Mrs. Elphinstone took the arm of her husband, and prepared to retrace her steps to the village.

Had she entertained a hope of being enabled to sustain the fatigue of the more circuitous woodland path, she would assuredly have found courage to make the attempt, but she felt her utter inability to accomplish such an undertaking, and she shrank from the possibility of failure, should she persist in a caprice which could not but appear childish and undignified to Sydney.

Slowly, therefore, they advanced toward the two strangers, who were so thoroughly engrossed in discussing the merits of the drawing upon which the younger had been engaged, that the muffled sound of the intrusive footsteps upon the grass were unheard, nor was it until Elphinstone, in order to announce their approach, addressed a few words to his companion, that they became aware of this invasion of their solitude, when the effect which it produced was electrical.

The young lady started like a frightened fawn, and suffered her sketch-book to fall to the ground, while the elder lady hastily drew down her vail.

The first impulse of Sydney was to drop the arm of his wife, to raise his hat with a murmured apology, and to restore the sketch-book to its fair owner, after which he turned away, and, holding the hand of Ida, was about to pursue his homeward path, when he was arrested by the exclamation:

"I can not be deceived—that must be Mr. Elphinstone."

"It is indeed Mr. Elphinstone," was his astonished reply, as he once more advanced toward the tower accompanied by Ida; "and the voice of the person by whom I am recognized is perfectly familiar to me, although I am unable so identify it."

"My dear boy," said the lady, throwing back her vail, and revealing a careworn but still handsome face; "this is indeed an unexpected meeting;" and she extended her hand cordially as she spoke.

"My dear Lady Malcolm," exclaimed Sydney in his turn, "what an unlooked-for pleasure! What happy chance has brought you to this ultima Thule?"

Lady Malcolm pointed in silence to her mourning dress, and then, for the first time, the eye of Elphinstone fell on her widow's cap.

"Forgive me," he said in a tone of deep feeling, "I did not know—I was not aware—"

"Yes, Sydney," replied the lady after a pause, "he is gone, and the world would have been to me a desert, had I not still possessed my child. Come hither, Edith," she pursued, beckoning the timid girl to her side, "give your hand to Mr. Elphinstone, whose mother was, as you have often heard me say, my best and dearest friend."

"Can it be possible?" asked Sydney, as he took the offered hand, and retained it within his own, "can this really be my little Edith? my little golden-haired pet and plaything? Time does indeed work wonders—and very charming ones at times," he added, glancing toward her mother.

"But—this lady—" said Lady Malcolm with a courteous bow to Ida, who had hitherto remained a mute spectator of the scene before her.

"That lady," said Sydney with a proud and beaming smile, "is my wife, my dear Lady Malcolm, for whom I would ask a portion of the regard with which you honored my poor mother."

"Your wife!" exclaimed the widow, in repressible amazement, "are you serious, Sydney?"

"Perfectly so," replied the young husband with sudden gravity, "you may well wonder at my happiness, Lady Malcolm, for it is indeed far beyond my deserts; but, nevertheless, this lady is indeed my wife."

"Yours is in truth an enviable destiny, Sydney," said his friend, subduing with ready art the feeling of surprise which had for a moment betrayed her into a want of caution peculiarly ill-timed, "but you were ever a creature of the sunshine. Remember, that not a word of this had reached me; and you are still so young that you needed the all-sufficient excuse of such a face as that before me to reconcile me to the fact of your marriage. Pardon me, Mrs. Elphinstone," she continued with a winning smile, "I have for so many years been accustomed to look upon your husband in the light of a son, that I was weak enough for an instant to feel aggrieved that he had taken such a step without honoring me with his confidence."

Ida replied only by a cold and haughty inclination of the head. She was stung to the very heart.

"Had I only been aware that you were in England, my kind friend," exclaimed Sydney, "how many painful moments would have been spared to Ida; but the tale which I have to tell is too long to be commenced here, and now; and my wife is already exhausted by her walk."

"Let us then return to the lodge together," said Lady Malcolm, "for you will be surprised, Sydney, to hear that the two stray birds you have discovered on the wing, have made their humble nest for a time on the confines of a great man's park. Such is, however, the case; but I must not forget that my sorrows and struggles can afford but sorry entertainment to Mr. Elphinstone, and I will, therefore, defer all further allusion to them until we are alone together; and in the interval, endeavor to make her husband's friend her own. May I not hope to do so, my dear madam? Such a face as yours gives promise of a heart in which I should be proud indeed to occupy a place. I am no longer young, but I can still feel with those who are so."

The voice and manner of Lady Malcolm, were so resistless, that Ida turned toward her with a smile, and ere long she found herself conversing unrestrainedly, and with a sensation of positive pleasure, with the stranger from whom she had only an hour before so unaccountably shrunk. She even ceased to remember her first ill-omened expression of surprise on discovering that she was the wife of Sydney; or rather she brought herself to interpret it according to the explanation which Lady Malcolm volunteered.

Elphinstone was, meanwhile, radiant with delight, and was astonished to discover that, although in the society of his idolized wife, he had never for a moment experienced the want of other companionship, his happiness was sensibly enhanced by this unexpected meeting with an old and valued friend.

The shy and beautiful Edith, also interested him greatly. It seemed to him so marvelous, that the laughing child in whose sports he had shared, should, in the four brief years which had elapsed since they last met, have grown into a graceful and lovely girl, full of the blushing beauty of her sixteen summers; but, above all, he felt exalted in his own esteem as he remembered, that it was his proud privilege to introduce to one whom his mother had loved as a sister, so radiant a being as Ida in the character of his wife.

"And when she knows all," he resumed, "when she learns all that she has sacrificed for my sake, how will she honor her for her noble self-abnegation: how perfect a faith will she feel in her deep and pure affection for the man, to secure whose happiness she has abandoned all besides."

On the arrival of the party at the lodge, the astonishment of Mrs. Dorcas exceeded all bounds, and it was with an unsteady hand that she applied the key, which was to give egress to Elphinstone and his bride; she became more tranquil, however, as the parting salutations fell upon her ear.

"Farewell, then, Lady Malcolm, until to-morrow; good-by, Edith; remember that you have promised that I shall see the sketch, and that we shall between us introduce Ida into the foreground."

"Good morning, my dear boy;—good morning, Mrs. Elphinstone. We shall meet again to-morrow."

The gate closed upon Sydney and his bride; but Lady Malcolm paused for a moment ere she entered the lodge, and watched them as they slowly made their way along the bowery road.

"Married!" she mentally ejaculated; "married at twenty years of age; poor boy!—and to a woman evidently older than himself. Who was she, I wonder. She is beautiful—very beautiful—high-bred, and highly educated—but what brings them here? This may indeed be a refuge for the struggling and the sorrowful, but it is no fit resting-place for the prosperous and the happy. There is a mystery which I must strive to fathom for both their sakes. And so the hope of long years has failed! I loved his mother so tenderly that I could not but believe that he, in his turn, must love my child when he again met her—beautiful and gifted as she now is. However, I will think no more of this, but endeavor to convince myself that the more brilliant destiny which is offered to her may equally insure her happiness; and, meanwhile, for the sake of the friend who was so dear to me, I will strive to feel the affection of a mother for the woman who now bears her name."

At this point of her reverie, Lady Malcolm was interrupted by the sweetest sound to her ear of any which could be heard on earth—the voice of her child caroling forth a simple song with all the gushing careless freedom of a wild-bird; and with a sigh and a smile strongly blended together she retired into the house.

CHAPTER XXIII.

EXPLANATIONS.

"And now, pray tell me, Sydney," said his wife, as they slowly proceeded homeward, "who is this Lady Malcolm?"

"In the first place, dearest, as you must have gathered from our conversation, she was the most intimate and best loved friend of my mother, by whom she was at once esteemed for her many noble qualities, and admired for her extraordinary attainments. She is in truth an excellent and large-hearted woman, of strong purposes and feelings, and singularly accomplished; one of the last persons in the world, I should have thought, to bury herself alive as she is about to do here, under any circumstances, even the melancholy one which must have induced the sacrifice."

"But she must have been a widow for some time," remarked Ida; "for you saw that, with the exception of a black ribbon about her waist, Miss Malcolm wore no mourning."

"True," said Sydney; "and that fact renders her present absolute seclusion still more unaccountable. However, in reply to your inquiry, I must further tell you, that Lady Malcolm was the only daughter and heiress of Mr. Mark Conyngham, a man of very considerable fortune and large landed property."

"It can not then be that straitened means have decided her to take so singular a step," interposed Mrs. Elphinstone.

"Certainly not, I should imagine; or if so, something very peculiar must have occurred. Be this as it may, however, Miss Conyngham, the beauty and the heiress, bestowed her hand upon the colonel of a dragoon regiment which chanced to be quartered in the county-town adjacent to her father's estate; who, in process of time, became Sir Archibald Malcolm; a man of high family connections and considerale military reputation. It was what is called a 'love match' on both sides; but I have heard my poor mother say that the gallant colonel won new laurels by this fresh conquest in the county, where there had been many pretenders to the hand of his fair and well-dowried bride, who could not conceal their discomfiture at her being carried off by a stranger, even although that stranger was the brilliant and gallant Colonel Malcolm"

"And were they happy?" demanded Ida, earnestly.

"So I have heard; in fact, they had every reason to anticipate happiness, they were so well-matched in every respect—both wealthy, both highly endowed by nature, and both young and full of hope."

"You are right," said Ida, with an ill-suppressed sigh; "in that case, indeed, they might well anticipate happiness, for in that instance, there could be nothing to reproach on the one hand, nor to regret on the other, in after years."

"And I would pledge myself that neither regret nor reproach ever came between them," replied Sydney, emphatically; "why should it? Had they not chosen each other from the whole world, even as we have done, my best beloved? No, no; from all that I have heard, Sir Archibald and Lady Malcolm were just such a model couple as we shall be; realizing the sweetest words ever written by one of the sweetest poets who ever wrote; and I will be bound that more than once he has said and sung to her what I will say and sing to you;" and as he bent down and looked into the eyes of his wife, Elphinstone breathed out in a subdued but exquisitely melodious voice:

"Thou wilt still be adored as this moment thou art,
Let thy loveliness fade as it will;
While around the dear ruin each wish of my heart Shall entwine itself verdantly still"

"Are you already looking forward to that period, Sydney, and preparing yourself to meet it with philosophy?" asked Ida, with a shade of impatient bitterness

"What a question!" exclaimed Elphinstone, gayly; "am I looking for a gouty shoe, and a bowl of water-gruel? No, no; my philosophy is of quite another description, and consists of enjoying the present to the fullest extent of which it is susceptible, and of looking into the future only to foretaste all the happiness that I have reason to expect from it. So now that we have settled that important point, which you must have mooted in the mere insolence of a beauty that will remain for a century to come unchanged and unchangeable in my eyes, let us return to our text.

"Lady Malcolm accompanied her husband abroad, and did not return to England until she had become a mother. Edith was at the period of their arrival a mere infant, and I, a boy of four years of age, became her first playfellow; after a time we both grew a few inches, she found the use of her feet, and we drew carts and made cowslip necklaces together, until I was banished to school, and thence to college, and entirely lost sight of my little companion, who was, in the mean while undergoing the same process with some slight variations. You may, therefore, understand my astonishment to-day on discovering in the lovely girl who had excited so much interest in us both, the fairy thing that I only remembered as a wee toddling, laughter-loving child."

"Yes, time works strange changes," said Ida, gravely; "and she is certainly very beautiful."

"And what a voice!" pursued Sydney; "those recreant rooks ought to have been ashamed to caw in her hearing; and did you remark the sketch, dearest? As an artist, you must have considered it masterly for so young a girl."

"It was very creditable, indeed," said Mrs. Elphinstone, who began to weary of the praise bestowed by her husband upon another, but who was too right-minded to utter one word of depreciation. "Miss Maleolm will make a charming wife for the man who is fortunate enough to win her."

"A wife!" echoed Sydney, with a laugh; "what! that shy child! My dear Ida, what an absurd idea!"

"I do not see its absurdity, I confess," persisted his companion; "if I do not err in my calculation, Miss Maleolm must be sixteen years of age."

"Well, I suppose she is," was the calm rejoinder; "but it really sounds so strangely to hear you call her Miss Maleolm, though I suppose it will be proper to do so myself in future, in order to show all fitting honor to the 'little Deethy' of old times, who, as you say, has now reached the ripe and respect-compelling age of sixteen."

"After all," murmured Ida; "I must confess that, charming and accomplished as these strangers are, I would much rather that our solitude had continued uninvaded."

"I, at least, have never felt it to be solitude," said Sydney, fondly; "my world is always amply peopled when you are by my side; but, nevertheless, a thousand pleasant memories have rendered their presence welcome to me; green, fresh memories, which bring back the happy years of my boyhood, and make me feel as though I had still a mother and a home."

Mrs. Elphinstone was silent; and for a time her husband remained buried in thought; while at intervals a smile played about his lips, and at others a deep shade of sadness settled upon his brow. Suddenly, however, he started from his reverie.

"But why should I look into the past," he said; "when I have only cause to exult over the present."

"Yet, a mother—a home—" faltered the self-tormenting Ida, who was jealous even of his back-glancing thoughts.

"True, they are both very dear to me," was his reply; "but have I not a loved and lovely wife to replace the first, and the wide world before me in which to renew the last? Where the heart lingers, there is our true home; it is only separation from the beloved one which makes man an exile and a wanderer."

"And would it not be prudent to make that home ere long, dear Sydney?" asked his wife, once more appeased. "We must not forget that we are poor; the Midsummer-day's dream in which we have hitherto indulged can not last forever; and we should do well to prepare for the inevitable awakening."

"My dear girl!" exclaimed Elphinstone, deprecatingly; "who is looking gloomily into the future now? I am actually inclined to scold you. Are you already weary of our miniature paradise in this quiet little nook? I shall, indeed, begin to fear that you have truly discovered it to be a solitude."

"Then you will do me an injustice, Sydney; my only dread is, that you may yourself soon learn to feel it one. It is necessary, even amid such happiness as our own that, like the mother of Aladdin in the Eastern story, we should rub up the old lamps of our fancies, at times, in order to exchange them for new ones. Toujours perdrix, however savory the diet may at first prove, runs a sad risk of becoming wearisome at last, particularly to one so young as you are."

"That is scarcely fair, Ida, either to yourself or me."

"And wherefore? The fact may be unpalatable, but can you deny its truth?"

"Gastronomically, no; but morally, yes—certainly, in so far as I am personally involved in the question."

"Well, then," persisted Mrs. Elphinstone; "we will, for the sake of argument, suppose that you really could be content to dream away your life with no companion but your wife, and no pursuit but that of making the days succeed each other in a species of listless enjoyment—"

"Ida, I can not understand you."

"And yet, love, I speak plainly; even could you, I repeat, be satisfied with such an existence as that which I have attempted to describe, I must not suffer you to forget that I came to you almost penniless, and—"

"Ida," interposed her husband vehemently; "that you became mine under any circumstances was an amount of happiness of which I feel myself to have been unworthy; too well do I comprehend the extent of the sacrifice to which your affection prompted you; but only give me time, and you shall see how jealously and perseveringly I will struggle to repay the debt. Surely, however, you are premature in seeking thus early to commence our combat with the world. We are so happy here, shut out from all the cark and care by which we shall be surrounded when we have once made the plunge."

Elphinstone was another proof, had any such been needed, that men have infinitely less practical philosophy than women. The sudden necessity for exertion, after years of ease and self-indulgence, shakes a man to the very center of his soul; he has to break through all his old and cherished habits, to immolate his fastidious refinement at the shrine of mammon, and to jostle his way to the feet of the idol among the coarser worshipers in whom the crowd excites emulation rather than disgust; his sensitive nature revolts at the trial before him, and he becomes helpless under the failure of his moral courage; while a woman, however delicately nurtured and constitutionally timid, no sooner becomes aware that the struggle must be made than she is aroused into strength and action; she may weep and repine under slight sorrows, but she contends resolutely with a great trial.

Man looks gloomily upon the storm-cloud, but woman gazes out into space to discover the rainbow beyond it. Man is cowed by the positive, woman sustained by the possible. He cowers beneath the actual infliction, while she, even though it be amid tears and travail, persists in struggling for its remedy.

The sudden energy displayed by Mrs. Elphinstone had, however, as we are compelled to confess, been elicited by a mixed motive of which she herself was scarcely conscious. It is true that the reflections to which she had given utterance during that homeward walk had frequently arisen in her mind in her happiest hours, but it is equally certain that not even on the previous day had she entertained the most remote intention of forcing them so abruptly on her husband; one short hour had, however, sufficed to create a revolution in her whole being; the apparition of Lady Malcolm and her daughter; the expressed admiration of Mr. Elphinstone for the graceful girl who had been the playmate of his childhood, the unguarded expression used by the elder lady, and her evident influence over the feelings of Sydney, all conspired to render his wife anxious to avoid any further intercourse with the intruders.

A new interest had been awakened in the heart over which she sought to reign supreme; mutual confidences must be exchanged upon subjects with which she was wholly unconnected; her privacy was invaded; the sensation of blissful security in which she had indulged was gone; the besetting sin of her nature was once more aroused; and the fatal jealousy to which she yielded herself up a passive victim, was busy with its prey Ida was very wretched, but she did not ask for rest, she only pined for change.

And who among us can ever foresee what the next change may bring?

CHAPTER XXIV.

A VISIT.

On the following morning while Mr. Elphinstone was occupied, according to his usual custom, in selecting a bouquet for his bride on her appearance in the breakfast-room, Ida lingered over her simple but elegant toilet. The expression of her features was calm but sad, and it was evident that her thought were far from the scene and objects by which she was surrounded.

She had dismissed her maid, and sat opposite the large mirror, wrapped in a loose dress of pale blue cachemere, over which her magnificent hair fell in luxuriant profusion almost to the floor. Her head rested upon her hand, and her eyes were fixed upon the ground.

"Yes—I see, I feel, that my trial is now about to commence," she murmured to herself; "and yet, of what have I a right to complain? I was not forced to the brink of the precipice upon which I stand; I chose my own path, and must endure the consequences of my own rashness. There will be no pity for me, none, should I become the victim of my vain and selfish imprudence; and it is better so, for I do not seek for pity, and could not brook it. And yet I love him so deeply—I do love him so entirely and so intensely, that surely I deserve to be loved in my turn with more than mere evanescent passion. For the moment I am his world, for months I have been the one dream of his existence; but is not life one perpetual series of change and chance?"

How many women have been worshiped with equal devotion for a brief period; then slighted, and ultimately forgotten! There are a hundred deaths comprised in those two fearful words. And he is so young, so very young! Who shall say that the fancy of his youth will continue to be the passion of his manhood? Who shall say that the poverty and the stern contact of the world may not do their hideous work, and wrench from me the heart whose every struggle for freedom will cost me tears of blood? And he is so beautiful in his boyish strength and grace; must not others look upon him with the same tenderness and admiration that I have done? Others younger, and before many years shall have gone by, fairer and brighter than myself. Oh, Sydney, should this ever come to pass—"

Her bosom heaved convulsively, and her lips trembled, as for an instant she dwelt upon the image evoked by her jealous fears; but she was suddenly awakened to the realities of her present existence by the full rich voice of her husband which came to her through the open casement, as he accompanied his graceful task by singing beneath her window—

> "Oh! there 's nothing half so sweet in life
> As Love's young dream."

She raised her head, a smile stole over her features, and concealing herself behind the window-draperies, she watched him as he wandered from flower-bed to flower-bed, selecting with a fastidiousness which sent a glow even to her heart, the fairest and richest blossoms that they could boast.

After indulging for a time in this contemplation, she hastily rang for her woman, betraying an unusual interest in the arrangement of her dress, gazed long and anxiously into the mirror, and finally joined her husband radiant with beauty and happiness.

"At last!" exclaimed Sydney, springing impetuously to meet her; "but, laggard as you have been, my best beloved, I have not the heart to chide you; the time has been well bestowed, for never did I see you look more lovely. What will Edith say to-day, when she whispered to me yesterday that you were the most beautiful creature she had ever seen! What will Lady Malcolm think of my presumption if she could scarcely credit it when she saw you warm and weary with a fatiguing walk, and could scarcely, even then, believe that you were really mine?"

And as he spoke Elphinstone wound his arm tenderly about the waist of his wife. The question was, however, an unhappy one, as we have seen, Ida had at once attributed the incredulity of Lady Malcolm to a far different cause; and a shadow passed across her face which even the constrained smile upon her lips could not conceal, and she asked with an attempt at playfulness—

"And why should you attach any importance to the effect which I may, or may not produce upon your friend and her daughter?"

"Why!" echoed Sydney. "Can you ask me why, when you know the exultation that I feel when I know you to be admired and appreciated by all who approach you, and remember that you are mine, that I have won you to my heart, and may hold you there forever?"

"Foolish boy!" murmured his wife, tenderly; "but I suppose that I must not quarrel with such a feeling, although it is one in which I can not sympathize."

"Ida, my love, what mean you?"

"Simply, dear Sydney, that my love for you is so utterly independent of all extraneous excitement, nay, I will even say, so self-engrossed, that I would rather that no one should look upon you with the same eyes that I do."

Elphinstone answered with a peal of his own joyous laughter.

"Believe me when I assure you that I do not jest," said Ida, gravely.

"And believe me, Mrs. Elphinstone, when I assure you that you need be under no apprehension of the kind," replied her husband, as he wreathed a white camellia in the braids of her hair; "depend upon it that your sun is scarcely a star to any other eye than your own. There, now you are perfection; and you will leave that flower where I have placed it; will you not, dearest?"

"Certainly, if you wish it, Sydney; but remember that your friends proposed to pay us an early visit, and that we have not yet breakfasted."

"Ah, true; so we will only indulge in one more stroll through the flowers, and then abandon them for a time. I do so hope that you will like Lady Malcolm, Ida."

"You know that I am slow in attaching myself, Sydney."

"You are right;" said her husband, bending down to look into her face; "I know it well; hours and hours of torture did I suffer, before you allowed me to believe that you cared more for me than for the most indifferent of your acquaintance."

"And do you blame me, Sydney?"

"Blame you! I can not accomplish impossibilities. I should not know how to blame you if I desired to do so."

"In that case at least you would have done wrong;" said Ida, with a faint smile; "I saw and felt—" she paused.

"What?" asked Sydney, eagerly.

"Nay, do not urge me;" was her reply; "suffice it that you learned the truth at last. And now let us return to the house."

"Charming!" exclaimed Mrs. Elphinstone, as she possessed herself of the bouquet which lay beside her plate, and presented her cheek to receive the kiss of her husband; "I really begin to imagine, Sydney, that the flowers reproduce themselves every night, in order to be gathered and blended so gracefully every morning. Why, this is a fit offering for an eastern queen."

"It is far better bestowed;" said her gratified husband, as he seated himself near her; "for now it adorns my wife; and I repeat, Ida, that I never saw you look so radiantly beautiful."

"Flatterer!" said Mrs. Elphinstone; "you will almost make me vain; but in truth, dear Sydney, I would not exchange these glorious blossoms, which you have so skillfully arranged, for the most costly gems that you could offer me."

The sun was shining brilliantly, and all nature was redolent of beauty and brightness. Ida was perfectly, supremely happy; she had even forgotten for the time the gnawing doubts and bitter anticipations in which she was so prone to indulge.

With her eyes fondly and tenderly fixed on the glowing and manly face of her young bridegroom, whose luxuriant curls were raised at intervals from his brow by the breeze that came through the open glass doors by which they had entered from the garden—while his large luminous eyes danced in the light of the heart's happiness, her whole being was flooded with a quiet and absorbing joy—when suddenly steps were heard on the graveled sweep that led up to the house, and Lady Malcolm and her daughter emerged from behind the belt of flowering shrubs, which had hitherto concealed their approach.

"So soon!" murmured Ida, roused from her happy reverie.

"Welcome! a thousand times welcome!" exclaimed Sydney, as he bounded across the veranda to receive the coming guests; and as his wife rose slowly from her seat, she saw him grasp in his extended hands those of the mother and daughter with a warmth which to her appeared exaggerated and uncalled for.

No trace of this feeling was however perceptible as she greeted with calm and high-bred grace the friends of her husband; and the heart of Elphinstone beat high as he detected the gaze of unequivocal admiration which Lady Malcolm fastened upon the lovely woman who stood before her.

"We are sad intruders, I fear, my dear Mrs. Elphinstone:" she said, courteously; "and visit you at a most untimely hour, but my affection for your husband would not permit me to use any thing like ceremony toward his wife, whose regard and friendship I am sincerely eager to secure. You will therefore pardon, will you not? and accept this breach of conventionality as a proof of the feeling which I am anxious to establish between us."

"I can but feel flattered, madam—"

"Nay, nay; do me the credit to believe that I am a mere egotist, unwilling to forego, even for an hour, the enjoyment of your society; and yet not quite so, as I coveted it even more for little Edith than for myself; and I feel quite sure that the selfishness of a mother will readily find its excuse in your eyes."

"You do Ida no more than justice, my dear Lady Malcolm, when you believe that you will be welcome to her at all hours;" said Sydney; "indeed she was reproaching me for my idleness this morning, fearful lest we should not have terminated our breakfast before your arrival."

"In that case I will not further apologize, and I fully appreciate her kindness; and now, my dear Mrs. Elphinstone, you must allow me to congratulate you on the little paradise that you have discovered here—I have rarely seen so lovely a spot."

"Is it not a pretty nest?" asked Elphinstone; "and yet, would you believe it? although we have only resided here for a few weeks, that naughty girl is urging me to exchange it for the dirt and din of London."

"Doubtlessly, Mrs. Elphinstone has some good and sufficient reason for so doing;" was the reply.

"You are right, madam, quite right;" said Ida, calmly; "we are poor, and consequently not privileged to pass our lives in a dream, however pleasant it might be to do so."

The brow of Sydney flushed, and he looked mortified and ill at ease. There was a momentary silence, which Ida was too proud to break, but which was soon terminated by the good taste and feeling of Lady Malcolm, who, taking the hand of the young hostess, said in a tone of deep affection—

"I admired you at the moment we first met, Mrs. Elphinstone, as every one must do who looks upon you, but I have now forgotten my admiration in my respect. You possess one of woman's noblest attributes—moral courage, and you are indeed worthy to be the wife of my friend's son. And do you know;" she continued in a lighter strain; "you have relieved my mind of a certain sort of dread. I have a horror of fine ladies who can not afford to divest themselves of 'the purple and fine linen' of the world—I value the picture; I care little for the gilding of the frame. Thus you see that, after after the avowal which you have so frankly and gracefully made, I shall be relieved of a thousand apprehensions, and be enabled to meet you upon equal terms; for despite the wonder which I read in the eyes of that dear boy, I can truly plead poverty, as well as yourself, and after a youth and womanhood of luxury am compelled to look the stern realities of my destiny steadily in the face."

"My dear Lady Malcolm, you astonish me!" exclaimed Elphinstone.

"I can believe it;" was the calm reply; "and yet such indeed is the case. However, as I before remarked, I do not feel privileged to inflict the details of my trials and disappointments upon Mrs. Elphinstone."

"You have at least excited alike my surprise and my curiosity;" persisted Sydney.

"They shall be gratified;" said Lady Malcolm; "when they will not entail weariness on your wife."

"I beg, madam"—commenced Ida—

"Look yonder, beneath that weeping ash;" interposed Sydney; "there is a rustic seat where we may be sheltered from both sun and wind. Shall we adjourn thither, and leave Ida to improve her acquaintance with Miss Malcolm?"

"With Miss Malcolm!" echoed the mother, with a smile. "Can you really have forgotten, Sydney, that your little play-fellow was christened Edith!"

"No, indeed, my dear friend, but —"

"Nay, nay, this is folly;" persisted Lady Malcolm; "Edith is still a child, and as such I should wish her to be considered. Youth passes only with too much rapidity; we need not seek to hasten its departure. Am I not right, Mrs. Elphinstone?"

Ida shrank involuntarily; but fortunately, her visitor unconscious of the new pang which she had inflicted, turned, without pausing, toward Elphinstone, and said sadly:

"Well, as I shall rejoice to have terminated my self-imposed task, and once more to forget my sorrows in the society of your amiable wife, I will, with her permission, avail myself of your suggestion; and the rather as Edith will be so great a gainer by my absence."

CHAPTER XXV.

FRESH MISGIVINGS.

SYDNEY rose and offered his arm to his mother's friend; and when they had quitted the apartment, Ida found herself alone with the fair girl who had already become to her an object of distrust.

Edith, after raising one timid glance to the face of Mrs. Elphinstone, whose eyes were riveted on the retreating figure of her husband, fixed her own upon the floor, as if wholly engrossed by the arabesques of the carpet, and thus Ida, as she wakened to her duties as a hostess, was enabled to gaze her fill for an instant upon the pure and fresh young creature before her.

It was true, as Lady Malcolm had said, that with her eyes thus vailed by their long lashes, Edith did indeed look like a mere girl; but Mrs. Elphinstone soon became aware that when those glorious eyes were raised, and beamed with intellect and emotion, the girl was suddenly transformed into the woman, and that her beauty was of no common order.

"How shall I preserve you from ennui, Miss Malcolm, during the absence of your mother, and—"

She paused, for Edith who had hitherto remained motionless, suddenly lifted her head with a smile of grateful pleasure so bright and ingenuous, that she felt unable to complete the sentence she had framed, or to utter the name of her husband.

"And"—she pursued; "may I hope that I shall succeed?"

"How kind you are, madam; how very kind;" faltered the blushing Edith; "in your society I should think it impossible to feel ennui. It is I, on the contrary—"

"I must echo the words of Lady Malcolm, and forbid all verbal ceremonies:" said Ida forcing a smile; "you are so admirable an artist that perhaps my portfolio may afford you some amusement, or—" she continued, anxious to assure herself of the extent of her companion's acquirements, and consequently of her own imaginary peril; "you are probably also a musician, in which case I will request of you to favor me by trying my piano, which is, I believe, a tolerably good one."

Edith rose unaffectedly, and approached the instrument.

"If it be really your wish, madam;" she said, modestly; "I am ready to obey you; but if you would do me the kindness to permit me in the first instance to be a listener, I should indeed feel grateful to you."

Mrs. Elphinstone complied with ready grace, and executed one of the most complicated of Thalberg's compositions with a brilliancy and taste which caused the cheeks of Edith to glow and her eyes to sparkle with delight and animation.

"What a glorious finger!" she exclaimed involuntarily, as Ida resigned her seat. "Ah, madam, you can never feel alone with such a talent as yours, and such an instrument to give it voice."

"You are an enthusiast, I see;" said her companion; "but now I claim your promise to afford me the gratification of becoming a listener in my turn."

"I do love music, I confess;" was the earnest rejoinder of Miss Malcolm, as in obedience to the bidding of her hostess she swept the keys with a mastery and purity of expression wonderful in one so young; and then glided into those exquisite 'Songs without Words' of Mendelssohn, which are the very triumph of instrumental melody.

Ida listened entranced, less by the talent displayed by this young girl than by the passionate feeling which marked her performance. Her very soul appeared to be poured forth as she played: self was forgotten for the moment; and she evidently existed only in the wondrous harmony which she awakened.

As the sounds ceased, there was silence, for Mrs. Elphinstone, herself deeply susceptible to the charm of music, was too much excited to indulge in the common venality of praise, while Edith restored to self-consciousness, was too timid to move or speak.

"Pardon me;" said Ida at length, struggling against the conflicting feelings by which she had been momentarily overcome: "but I have really been taken by surprise. You must have been a musician, Miss Malcolm, to comprehend all the powers and resources of the science so thoroughly at your age."

"I am wholly indebted to my mother for whatever efficiency I may have acquired;" replied Edith, simply; "she has spared no pains to perfect me in her favorite accomplishment; but I can never hope to rival her, although she had the marvelous self-denial to endure my discordant attempts when I was a mere urchin of four years old, and has persevered in her wearisome task ever since."

"It must long have ceased to weary her;" said Mrs. Elphinstone; "but it is not so much your execution which surprises me, as the expression with which you render passages that I should have conceived could only have been comprehended in their actual depth and significance by a wrung heart and a bruised spirit."

The eyes of Miss Malcolm fell, and a cloud of sorrow passed across her fair young brow.

"Perhaps you are right, Mrs. Elphinstone;" she faltered; "perhaps I never should indeed have understood the true language of music if I never had known suffering."

"You! Miss Malcolm, you!" exclaimed Ida; "at your age—in your sheltered position, constantly under the watchful eye of a mother—what suffering can you have known?"

"You forget, dear madam," replied the fair girl as large tears fell upon her cheeks; "that even the fond and untiring eye of a mother can not always ward off grief, and that I am already fatherless."

"Forgive me—forgive me—" said Ida, distressed at the effect of her remark; "but that was not the sorrow, that was not the struggle, to which I alluded."

"I have known no other," said Edith ingenuously.

Mrs. Elphinstone sighed. She had never known a youth like this. Her struggles and sorrows had commenced even from her girlhood. Luxury and indulgences had been powerless against the influence of passions early awakened and prematurely developed; and it was consequently with a sad curiosity that she contemplated the calm and holy expression of Edith.

Not a storm had passed over that tranquil spirit whose pages angels might have perused—not a germ of evil could be detected in that calm and placid heart which filial love suffered to fill and satisfy.

Unlike Ida herself, who had been reared in the hot-bed of fashion and ambition, forced into unhealthy mental growth, and weakened by those fatal influences by which the votaries of the world are predestined to become its victims, Edith Malcolm had been permitted to live out her childhood and her youth amid the joys and sorrows proper to her years: no idle and ill-timed flatteries, no vain prophecies of future triumphs, had polluted her young ears, and profaned her guileless heart; she had never been taught to regard love as a speculation, and marriage as an investment; her leisure had never been amused by the perusal of puerile romances, or her energies exercised in the attempt to become a heroine.

Mrs. Elphinstone had, as we have shown, been isolated from all companions of her own age, educated for display, and taught that the one great duty of her existence was self-aggrandizement.

Childhood is much more morally impressible than the generality of persons are willing to believe. Because a child rebels against the authority of a parent or a preceptor in the mere wantonness of an undisciplined will, it is often supposed that neither example nor precept has produced its intended effect; this, however, is a vital error; the bending of the twig is not more certain to decide the inclination of the tree than are early impressions to influence and pre-determine the after character.

In infancy and youth the human clay is plastic, and may consequently be molded at will; but when once it has become indurated by time, it is vain to attempt the removal of the false lines of the image; its beauties and defects will endure through life, modified indeed by circumstances, but still visible and distinct.

Strange, and almost incredible did it therefore appear to Ida that the daughter of Lady

Malcolm should have attained the age at which she had herself already listened more than once to the voice of passion, discarded suitors, and regarded herself as fully competent to decide her own destiny, without one dream of the heart-struggles which must inevitably await her; but there was something so earnest yet so calm in the tone in which Edith had said, in reply to her own observation "I have known no other," that she could not refuse to place faith in the assurance.

"So much the worse—so much the worse" —murmured the demon within her; when the stream gushes forth, it will burst its bounds; when her heart tide swells forth, it will swell and boil into a lava-flood; the passionate outgushing of her spirit to which I have just listened was never due to the inspiration of a mother's teaching. A touch, a tone, will suffice to awaken her from her dream of calm —and then—"

"And you, dear madam, you, beautiful, gifted, and beloved as you are, surely you can not have known the sorrows which you deprecate for me;" murmured a low sweet voice beside her, and Ida started as she felt the hand of Miss Malcolm laid softly on her arm; "and yet the sad train of thought into which you have fallen would almost lead me to fear—"

"You are right—quite right;" said Mrs. Elphinstone in an accent which she in vain attempted to render firm: "I have known many and bitter sorrows, but that is nothing—nothing—the past has been endured and may be forgotten—it is the future which makes the heart swell, and the brain giddy."

Edith drew back alarmed.

"Poor child!" said Ida, who remarked the gesture; "do you then never look into the future? never shrink from its probable consequences?"

"Never, madam, I am so happy in the present."

"But that very happiness tends to heighten the terrors of the future. It is soothing to look back upon the sufferings from which we have escaped—but to look back on happiness which we have lost would be too horrible! The burden of Atlas would be but a feather weight beside such a crushing, such an overwhelming agony."

Edith sank almost breathless into a chair; she could not utter a syllable.

"Forgive me," said Mrs. Elphinstone suddenly, with one of her most winning smiles, "I have done wrong to give way to such gloomy ideas, above all, when I may say with you that I am so happy in the present. I suppose that it is the jealousy of that very happiness which makes me fear to lose it. And yet it is very weak, is it not? We must not let my husband suspect that I indulge in such nervous folly.—And now for the portfolio, Miss Malcolm," she continued with forced gayety; "you will recognize some of the scenes of my sketches, for Mr. Elphinstone was anxious that on our departure from the neighborhood we should carry away with us some memorials of our sojourn; and, terrible to avow! a wife's first duty is obedience. See! here is the cottage, with Sydney, still more terrible to admit, smoking his cigar under the veranda. And here—here is the park lodge, your present home, with the glorious old beeches in the background; does it not make a pretty picture?"

With all the light-heartedness of her age, Edith had already conquered her agitation, and, as she recognized the subjects of the several sketches, she uttered repeated exclamations of delight.

"Is not Mr. Elphinstone enchanted with these lovely drawings?" she asked, artlessly; and then, without awaiting a reply, she continued: "How very, very happy you must make him; and how thankful mamma will be to know how kind, and amiable, and gifted a wife he has, for she loves him, Mrs. Elphinstone, as if he were her own son; and you can not conceive how anxious she has been to discover if you were as good as you are beautiful."

As Edith uttered these words, and ere Mrs. Elphinstone had time to reply, Lady Malcolm and her husband entered from the garden. There was a slight shade of sadness on the fine features of the widow, and even Sydney himself had for the moment lost his joyous smile. The animation of her daughter, however, soon sufficed to restore Lady Malcolm to cheerfulness; while the anxious look of his wife cleared away at once the mists which obscured the spirit of the bridegroom.

"I have a thousand thanks to offer you for your indulgence, Mrs. Elphinstone," said her visitor;" and, if I can judge by the countenance of Edith, she owes me quite as many for the delightful hour which my absence has enabled her to pass with you."

"Indeed I do, dear mamma," exclaimed the young girl, enthusiastically; "for while I have had Mrs. Elphinstone all to myself, the time has flown with such rapidity, that you seem scarcely to have been away ten minutes."

"Miss Malcolm has been delighting me, madam, by her exquisite performance on the piano," said Ida, courteously; "she is, indeed, an accomplished musician."

"I am truly gratified by your opinion," said Lady Malcolm; "and the rather as I understand from Sydney that your own proficiency in music is something marvelous. Indeed," she added with a smile which was full of warmth and affection, "if I am to believe even the half of what he has told me, I can not have one wish ungratified for the son of my dearest friend."

Ida blushed deeply.

"Sydney," she replied, "is naturally anxious to justify his choice in your eyes, but you must accept his testimony with considerable reservation."

Elphinstone retorted by passing his hand caressingly over the dark and glossy braids that lay upon her forehead.

"Ha! you have been looking at Ida's drawings," he said, as his eye fell upon the contents of the portfolio which were scattered over the table; "are they not well executed? And this sketch of the cottage is perfect. Did you recognize it, Edith? That is my property, and so jealous am I of my rights, that I ventured to have it framed for my dressing-room."

"It is indeed beautiful, and most faithful," said Miss Malcolm; "and the spot from which it was taken must have been most judiciously chosen."

"Oh, Ida's eye never deceives her," said Sydney, proudly; "but in order that you may do it full justice, will you come as far as the spot where she was seated?"

"Willingly," was the reply of Edith, as she rose with the drawing in her hand; "the pleasure will be twofold, as I shall by so doing be enabled not only to appreciate at its full value the sketch of Mrs. Elphinstone, but also to have a nearer view of your lovely garden, which is indeed a wilderness of sweets. Will you permit me this indulgence, my dear madam?" she asked with an appealing look toward her hostess.

The assent of Ida was instantly but somewhat coldly given, and in the next moment Sydney and his beautiful companion disappeared.

"How happy you have made that amiable young man, my dear Mrs. Elphinstone," said the elder lady, as soon as they were alone; "it is impossible to express the delight with which I listened to his animated description of your many excellences. Upon me, who have latterly been familiar only with the shady side of existence, his glowing and beautiful joy produced the effect of sudden sunshine. Indeed, our meeting, his marriage, and all by which I am so suddenly surrounded, appears like a bright dream. Grateful am I, nevertheless, to feel that it is real and tangible; I loved his mother so deeply."

"Sydney also adores her memory," said Ida; "by his description she must have been beautiful."

"She was, and I need not tell you that her beauty is reflected in her son; but she was more than beautiful, and those who knew her best forgot the charms of her person in the perfection of her heart and mind. Poor Elinor! she deserved a better fate."

"Was she not happy, then?" asked her companion.

"Far from it, my young friend; hers was the mere fleeting happiness of a few brief months. Dazzled by her beauty and fascinated by her many admirable qualities, which made her the idol of her circle, Mr. Elphinstone, at that period a man of considerable wealth, as well as eminently handsome, won her affections, and for a time appeared worthy of his good fortune, but unhappily his tastes and habits were ill-calculated for domestic life. He soon wearied of the monotony of home, and sought for excitement in a world which was but too ready to welcome him back into its vortex. But Elinor never complained; she idolized her husband, and she bore her trials with the fortitude and resignation of an angel. To her he was ever the first and only love of her young heart, and the father of her child."

"And did she long endure such an existence?" inquired Ida, whose cheeks had assumed the hue of Parian marble.

"For years," replied Lady Malcolm, who, in her own emotion overlooked that of her listener; "ay, even when to neglect was added ruin, she was true to herself, and to the faith which she had plighted to one of the most ungrateful and ungenerous of men."

"And yet," murmured Ida, in an unsteady voice; "you think that he did love her once."

"Of that fact there can be no doubt," pursued the speaker; "he loved her madly, but there was no principle, no stability in his love. Essentially selfish, he gradually learned to look upon her as an obstacle in his path of pleasure and dissipation, and he thrust her from it as he would have done any other impediment which might have presented itself."

"Strange!" said Ida, moodily; "that Sydney should never have told me one word of this."

"By no means," observed Lady Malcolm; "for even Sydney himself has but a vague idea of the extent of his mother's sufferings. No, Elinor would rather have endured a thousand deaths than have breathed into the ear of her boy one word of blame connected with her erring husband. Almost a stranger in his own house, it was only at rare intervals that Mr. Elphinstone saw his son, and, fortunately, just as the boy had attained an age when the true position of his mother must have necessarily become evident to him, his wretched father died, and thus, the tears which he mingled with those of his surviving parent, were free from the bitterness which must otherwise have rendered his grief tenfold more poignant. To this moment, therefore, Sydney is able to name his father without a blush, and to regret him without a misgiving, and this is the pious work of his angel mother, whose heart was soothed to the last by the respect which her son bore to the memory of his dead father."

"And yet he slighted her—"

"And ruined her—" added Lady Malcolm.

"Oh, that was nothing, nothing," exclaimed Ida, her eyes flashing with passionate emotion; "when once he had torn down the idol from the shrine at which he had once worshiped, it mattered little that he should send away the jewels in which it had been decked; the trampled fragments of a broken heart could ill have brooked the tinseled mockeries which are suited only to a happy one."

"But you forget that she was a mother."

"I should have forgotten all save my own wrongs," replied Mrs. Elphinstone, in the same excited tone in which she had just spoken; "all—even my child."

"My dear young friend," said Lady Malcolm, with a sad smile, as she pressed the hand of her companion in her own; "you know not the depth and fervor of a mother's love, and see how she has been rewarded for her self-abnegation. See how all her hopes for her idolized boy have been fulfilled. Could she look up from the grave, fondly and proudly as she loved him, she could not wish Sydney other than he is."

At this moment, a peal of clear, ringing, graceful laughter sounded from the garden, and Ida, who had hitherto been so absorbed in the recital of Lady Malcolm, that she had ceased to dwell upon the prolonged absence of her husband, sudddenly raised her head, and gazed earnestly through the open window.

Sydney was in hot pursuit of a late butterfly, and bare-headed, with his chestnut curls dancing in the wind, and his cheeks flushed with eagerness, was bounding over the flower beds with all the elasticity of an antelope, in his attempt to capture the parti-colored fugitive.

As her glance rested on him, the lips of his wife parted with a proud and happy smile, but in the next moment, an expression of pain passed over her head, and she hastily averted her eyes.

"Those young hearts are lighter than ours at this moment, my dear Mrs. Elphinstone," observed Lady Malcolm, as she wiped away a lingering tear; "I am grieved to see that I have infected you with my own melancholy; we will talk no more upon this unhappy subject. It might indeed have been more judicious had I not touched on it at all, but my enduring affection for my poor Elinor renders me selfish; it is such a relief to me to be enabled to dwell upon her memory, and to remember that the death of the pure in heart is less an agony than an ovation; that the chime of each succeeding hour is a call of harmony, a summons of peace and love; that life ebbs away like the sunset billows of a summer evening—like the gradual closing of the perfumed chalice of a flower—or the severe and solemn folding together of the spirit wings, which are so soon to expand into their full and perfect proportions on another and a brighter shore, where they will never again be furled."

"I thank you for the confidence which you have reposed in me, Lady Malcolm," said Ida, as she threw herself back in her seat, and strewed the carpet around it with the scattered leaves of the blossoms which Sydney had so carefully arranged for her, only a few hours previously. "It is, at times, desirable to dwell upon the experiences of others; the past reads a wholesome lesson to the present, and I confess that I, for one, despise the cowardice which shrinks from the effort of looking steadily forward, even upon a forbidding prospect, or backward, upon the struggle of human endurance."

"Happily," said her companion; "trials like those of my dear lost friend are rare indeed. Hers was a life which always appeared to me to convey a great and touching moral, but it was not the less, on that account, an existence of wretchedness."

"Wretchedness, indeed!" echoed Ida, as she swept her hands across her brows; "to be decked by the fingers of love, only for the sacrifice;" and as the hand was withdrawn, the camellia which had hitherto been nestled amid the folds of her hair was crushed within it.

"I have been wrong, very wrong," said Lady Malcolm; "I have quite unstrung your nerves. Only look, you have actually destroyed the magnificent bouquet which I admired so much on my arrival."

"Oh, pray do not grieve over it," said Ida, with a bitter smile; "it was beautiful, yes, very beautiful; I am obliged to admit that fact, but it has pleased and amused me for a time, and consequently has done all that I had a right to demand from it—and it is beautiful even in its ruins, is it not? though it can never again be restored to its first glorious splendor. That, however, matters little, as its charm must sooner or later have decayed with its freshness; so that you see, my dear madam, its destruction was a mere question of time."

"Oh, Ida, such a butterfly we have captured!" exclaimed Sydney, as he sprang into the room; "only look at the brilliancy of its coloring."

But Ida's eyes were not upon the insect, they were riveted upon a bouquet in the hand of Miss Malcolm, the counterpart of that which lay scattered at her feet.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE BOUQUET.

How little can men appreciate the trifles out of which a woman's love is ingenious in creating auguries of good or evil. It was a mere common-place courtesy on the part of Mr. Elphinstone to offer to Miss Malcolm some of the flowers of which she expressed her admiration; and it is probable that had he done so with less attention to their arrangement, even Ida herself might have been careless of the fact; but, unfortunately, Sydney had not yet forgotten the delight evinced by his wife at the graceful grouping of the bouquet which he had combined for her that morning; and, accordingly, as he prepared a second for Edith, he said gayly:

"You have an artist's eye as well as Mrs. Elphinstone, and I dare not, therefore, do otherwise than exert my best skill in order to render my offering acceptable."

"A thousand thanks!" was the artless reply; "nothing could be more perfect than that which you arranged for Mrs. Elphinstone, so do not attempt any variation, but let me have it, flower by flower, and even leaf by leaf, a fac-simile of hers."

"Now for an effort of memory," laughed the light-hearted young man; "your imperious mandate shall be obeyed, and we will then compare the two, in order to judge of my success."

The flowers were, therefore, gathered, and grouped with the same fastidious care as he had evinced on the previous occasion, when they were a heart-offering to his idolized wife; and they had scarcely been transferred to Edith, and received their due meed of admiring approval, than the quick eye of Sydney detected the butterfly which subsequently became the object of his pursuit.

Little, indeed, did he imagine the pang that he had inflicted on her whom he would gladly have shielded from every shade of suffering. To him Ida was the type alike of physical and moral perfection; and he could as soon have doubted the beauty of her person as the strength and purity of her mind. Wholly engrossed by her image, he was utterly in different to the attractions of all the rest of the sex, beyond the natural gratification of looking on a lovely face, as he would have looked on a fine landscape, or a gorgeous sunset; and that she should entertain one doubt of his affection, one mistrust of his devotion, was an idea which had never for an instant crossed his mind.

Unlike Ida herself, their disparity of age was a fact to which his thoughts never reverted; unlike her, he never looked into the future; with the natural buoyancy and confidence of a young fresh spirit, he lived in the engrossing happiness of the present; and if, by chance, he glanced forward beyond the passing hour, it was with a sanguine conviction that his after-life must be as bright as it had hitherto proved.

There was always a golden thread woven into every web of the heart-loom of Sydney Elphinstone, for his was not a nature to dwell upon the dark side of existence; with all his good and endearing qualities he possessed much of his father's reckless temperament; and, as yet, no sorrow had come to chill, no cloud to overcast it. Even the immediate question of his coming struggle with the world in which he must so soon force his way by his own energy and talent, he put from him, as we have shown, as a vague future far and dim in the distance, instead of a stern reality with which he would ere long be called upon to grapple.

He was resolved to accomplish great things: he admitted to himself that he must do so for Ida's sake, and he believed that he was ready for the combat, while in fact he had neglected to gird on his weapon. Any relenting on the part of Mr. Trevanion, he neither anticipated nor desired; he felt proud to think that he should need no extraneous aid in surrounding the idol of his love with the luxuries to which she had been accustomed from her girlhood; but, meanwhile, he satisfied himself with resolutions, and remained inactive.

How many Sydney Elphinstones there are in the world!

After one long searching look, first at the unlucky flowers, and next at the fair owner, Ida turned toward Lady Malcolm, and said with a sarcastic smile:

"Your daughter is, I presume, an entomologist, my dear madam, and consequently will be gratified by this addition to her cabinet."

"I—oh, no," exclaimed Edith, shuddering, "I could never endure to impale insects on pins, and poison them with camphor. What would this poor butterfly be, sacrificed to science—for I believe that is the admitted, or rather I should say, presumed apology for destroying so much that is bright and beautiful—what would it be beside what it was, as it nestled in the heart of the flower, or floated on the sunshiny air, instinct with life and enjoyment?

"No, no; give me birds upon the wing, bees among the blossoms, fish sporting in the clear waters—any thing and every thing that is fulfilling the purposes and profiting by the privileges for which it was created; but I should as soon dream of living among mummies when I could secure the society of my sentient fellow-creatures, as I should of contenting myself with the classified skeletons of moths and beetles when I could see in them all their beauty and variety, unmutilated and unharmed."

"Why, Edith," said Lady Malcolm, with a fond glance at her daughter, whose cheeks were flushed with animation, "you have suddenly become quite eloquent."

"And I have not done yet, mamma," was the reply, "for when Mr. Elphinstone's butterfly has been properly applauded, and that he has once more restored it to liberty, as I trust he will do, I am going to claim Mrs. Elphinstone's admiration for my beautiful bouquet. It is not gorgeous, my dear madam!"

"Extremely so."

"But do you not remark any thing peculiar in its arrangement?"

"I think it very gracefully arranged."

"Does it resemble any other you have ever seen?"

"There is a family likeness in all bouquets, Miss Malcolm."

"Oh, but, my dear Mrs. Elphinstone, this was intended by Mr. Elphinstone to be precisely like your own; and do you not think that he has succeeded perfectly?"

"It is more essential that you should think so, Miss Malcolm."

"Well, then, in that case, the success is complete, for I do not believe that we could, were they once out of our sight, recognize our own property."

"I scarcely agree with you," said Ida, with an ambiguous smile, as she pointed to the flowery ruin at her feet; "yours has as yet all the charm of novelty, and is, consequently, faultless; mine, on the contrary, had ceased to please my eye, so I amused myself, as you perceive, by destroying what little value it had left."

Edith made no reply; there was something in the tone of Mrs. Elphinstone's voice which reminded her of a portion of their interview of the morning, and it was consequently a relief to her when she was summoned to the veranda by Sydney to see him give liberty to his painted captive. She was still watching the languid flight of the benumbed insect, when Lady Malcolm rose to take her leave.

"Farewell, Mrs. Elphinstone," she said affectionately, as she extended her hand: "I see, with great compunction, that I have thoroughly saddened you; but only promise soon to visit the Lodge and I will strive to be a more cheerful companion. You are too susceptible, my dear young friend, and must struggle against a depth of feeling which can not fail, should you encourage it, to cast many a shadow over your path. Dwell rather on the happiness of the present than on the sorrows of the past. You are now commencing life in earnest, and must not exhaust your sensibilities on ideal or irremediable evils. Doubtlessly we have all suffered more or less, but let us now at least be happy.

"Look upon me as a mother, and on Edith as a sister, if you will indeed permit me to make such a request; I already feel that I shall love you, and I am anxious, in my turn, to gain your affection."

"I thank you, Lady Malcolm, for your good opinion, and I am grateful for your kindness," said Ida, with constraint, "nor shall it be my fault if I do not profit by your advice; unfortunately, however, we can not always control our feelings, nor can we compel happiness at will."

"You are right, no doubt, but we can at least accept it when it is placed within our reach; so clear that fair brow, and forget the sorrows of others in your own brighter fortune."

Ida forced a smile as she echoed the parting compliments of her guest, and together they passed into the garden, where Sydney and his young companion were still engaged in watching the crippled insect which had evidently suffered from its temporary imprisonment.

"I will escort you to the entrance of the lane, my dear Lady Malcolm, while Ida puts on her bonnet for our morning ramble," said Sydney, as he offered an arm to each of the departing guests, "I give you five minutes, love," he added, as he turned and nodded gayly to his wife, and then the party was lost to sight behind the leafy screen of the flower-shrubs.

Ida stood for an instant motionless, and then she turned back into the house and cast herself into a seat; she was exhausted by her efforts at self-control. She felt dispirited and almost reckless.

"He could not even suffer her to depart without him—" she murmured; "fool that I was to exult over those worthless flowers because he gathered them! Did he not do the same for her? I might have foreseen this—I might have known that it must have come to this! But so soon—so very soon—shall I be able to endure the existence which I foresee must henceforth be mine? But may I not deceive myself? He is so frank, so guileless—surely love can not die out like an exhausted taper, while it is yet so young—and she, too, she is still a mere child—no, no, the time is not, can not yet be come—Sydney is the slave of beauty, and my beauty is unfaded. I have sacrificed all for him, and the sacrifice is as yet unrequited—Lady Malcolm is right, I must strive to be happy while I may, and when the struggle proves fruitless, then indeed—ay, then! but the future shall be left to work out its own purposes. I am no puling girl to tremble at the task which is allotted to me, it shall be done, done even to the death."

For a moment Mrs. Elphinstone remained motionless, her head buried in her hand, and her eyes closed; but suddenly she rose, walked steadily to the mirror, examined herself earnestly, smoothed the disordered bands of her hair, took a book from the table, and then returned calmly to her chair. It is probable that she neither knew the nature of the volume of which she thus quietly possessed herself, nor the page at which she had opened it, although for a time she appeared absorbed in its contents; for, after the lapse of a few moments, she relinquished her occupation, and carefully collecting the scattered leaves and blossoms with which the floor was strewn, walked with them into the veranda, and flung them, handful by handful, to the wind, until they had totally disappeared, after which she resumed her book and her seat, and awaited with a calm brow and a steady pulse, the return of her husband.

The five minutes had grown into ten; she glanced once toward the French timepiece on the console: Sydney had been gone more than half an hour, and still the proud brow remained unruffled, and the clear eye unclouded. Suddenly his quick step was heard upon the gravel-walk, his elastic bound from the yielding turf, and her husband stood before her.

"What, not ready yet, my love?" he exclaimed in surprise.

"I beg your pardon, my dear Sydney," said Ida, with one of her sweetest smiles; "this terrible book has so engrossed me, and—" she added, glancing at the clock, but still retaining the sunniness of her expression, "you have returned so soon."

"Soon!" echoed Elphinstone, looking in the same direction. "Why, I have a thousand apologies to make to you; I had no idea that I had been away so long."

"Oh, not a word of excuse, dear Sydney, not a word, I entreat you," was the ready rejoinder, "in the society of those we love, time passes like a dream."

"Few are so well aware of that fact as myself," said Elphinstone, "and, above all, when we are talking of those we love; and we have not spared you, Ida, on our way to the lodge."

"Ha! you walked to the lodge?"

"I did indeed, though I had no such intention when I left home, but it was so delightful to me to hear Lady Malcolm and Edith describe the impression which you had made upon them, that I quite forgot how the minutes were going by."

"I am much indebted to them."

"Not a whit. They are sensible women, and estimate you at your proper value. So, what with the memories of the past, and the impressions of the present, I thoroughly enjoyed my walk."

"I am delighted to hear it."

"Do you know," exclaimed Sydney, throwing himself down upon the ottoman on which the foot of his wife rested, "I esteem myself the happiest man on the whole earth. I can scarcely understand, even to this moment, how I ever won the love of such a woman as yourself; and now there comes to me an accession of happiness in the society of my mother's dearest friend, and her gentle unsophisticated daughter."

"Poor Sydney!" said his wife, as she passed her slender fingers carelessly over his clustering curls.

"Poor Sydney! The adjective is misplaced," was the fond retort, as he drew the small hand to his lips; "I am rich, rich beyond my wildest dreams. Are you not my own? Do you not love me?"

"Tenderly."

"I know it—I have had proof of it—and I can feel that you can sympathize in my new-found gratification. My poor mother always coveted for me the regard of Lady Malcolm, for whom she herself felt the affection of a sister."

"I am delighted that you should have secured it."

"And you, Ida, you also; she admires you beyond measure."

"I am honored by her good opinion."

"And that sweet, artless girl—is she not charming?"

"Very charming—and very beautiful."

"Yes," said Sydney, somewhat less impetuously than he had yet spoken; "she certainly is beautiful in a certain style."

"Oh, my love," exclaimed Mrs. Elphinstone, deprecatingly; "let us have no reservations, no criticisms, as regards Miss Malcolm's beauty. There can be but one opinion; Greuze could not have desired a more perfect subject for one of his exquisite pictures."

"Well—perhaps—but, after all, that fair beauty is somewhat fade; it is but the mere twilight of actual loveliness."

"We sometimes weary of glare," said Mrs. Elphinstone, still in the same low, endearing tone.

"Of glare, yes—but that implies something meretricious and heartless; I was not desecrating beauty by such associations."

"And then, Miss Malcolm is so accomplished—so fascinating."

"So she is; she is full of natural talent, and has thoroughly profited by her opportunities. You say that she is an admirable musician, and she is certainly a wonderful artist for her age."

"And we have only seen her twice!—she may yet astonish us by her proficiency in other accomplishments."

"I hope not, for I confess that I should have no sympathy with a female Crichton; and would rather look upon her as a good, amiable little girl, remarkable only for her extraordinary talents for drawing and music."

"So be it, my dear Sydney; and therefore, until our acquaintance becomes more intimate, Miss Edith Malcolm shall be to us only one of the most beautiful and the most talented girls we have ever met, or are likely to meet."

"An arrangement with which she has every reason to be well satisfied, I think," said Elphinstone, gayly; "but one which is nevertheless no more than is her due. And now, what of our walk, Ida?"

"It is too late, dear."

"Too late? Why I have but exceeded my time by twenty minutes."

"But those twenty minutes have rendered it impossible for me to accompany you. I have letters to write, and the post leaves early."

"Can you not postpone them until to-morrow?"

"I regret to say that they must be dispatched to-day."

"How confoundedly provoking!" exclaimed Sydney, rising to his feet; "and what am I to do with myself while you are engaged in writing?"

"Can you not walk to the Lodge, and assist Miss Malcolm with the foreground of her sketch, as you proposed to do?"

"By Jove! not a bad idea; but then, we can not dispense with you, Ida, for you were to be the prominent figure."

"Oh," said Mrs. Elphinstone, forcing a laugh; "you have an excellent memory, and do not need my presence. You will not find it more difficult to sketch a figure with which you are familiar than to combine a bouquet after a given model"

"But I can not bear to be parted from you so long."

"A mere sentimental sophism, my dear Sydney; half an hour soon passes away when we are in the society of those we love."

"Then why strive to make my morning wearisome to me?"

"Sydney!"

"Nay, Ida dear, do not look displeased; but after having hurried back as I did in the hope of a long ramble with you before dinner, I confess that I am terribly disappointed."

"And did you then hurry back so much, my poor Sydney?" said his wife, with another glance at the timepiece; "I had no idea of it."

"It is nevertheless the fact," replied her husband, somewhat impatiently; "for, as we went, Lady Malcolm lingered talking over old times, and I was anxious not to make you wait."

"Nor did you, as you must have seen, my love. A book is always so pleasant a companion when one is alone; and then, when I discontinued reading for a moment, it was so delightful to feel that you were happily engaged with friends who could thoroughly appreciate you, that, believe me, you have nothing to regret. I am not a child, Sydney, I know that I can not expect to engross either your time or your affections; and therefore I can not begin too early to accustom myself to a privation to which I must submit, sooner or later."

"My dear Ida, you freeze me."

"I have neither the wish nor the intention to do so. Am I not arguing rationally?"

"The heart does not reason, and consequently I have no reply to make."

"Well, then, we will be unreasonable, and you shall be rewarded for your kind intentions. In five minutes I will return equipped for our walk, and the unlucky letters shall be postponed till to-morrow."

"There's a good girl; I have such a view to show you."

"But you must also promise me a dry path," said Ida, as she coquettishly extended toward him her small and symmetrical foot, delicately confined in a boot of black silk.

"I will promise you any thing, and every thing."

And the bride and bridegroom started for their stroll.

CHAPTER XXVII.

A NEW HOME.

A FORTNIGHT after the occurrences detailed in our last chapter, Mr. and Mrs. Elphinstone were installed in a small but sheltered and detached cottage near Brompton, face to face with the realities of their worldly position.

The velvet and satin draperies to which Ida had been accustomed from her infancy, were exchanged for modest chintz; showy luxuries for unobtrusive comforts, and a train of powdered and liveried domestics for three female servants. Even with one of these, her own personal attendant, she had been anxious to dispense, but the proposal had proved so unpalatable to her husband, that she had for-borne to urge the point; although, ignorant as she was of the actual value of money, she could not help suspecting that the three hundred a year, which while under her father's roof had barely sufficed for the expenses of her toilet, must be very inadequate for the support of five individuals, two of whom were unaccustomed to practice economy in any shape.

Sydney, however, assured her so confidently, that when he had once established himself in chambers, he should not be long before he obtained a brief, that she willingly lent herself to the illusion; and declared that she had nothing to regret save the prospect of his absence.

"And even at that I will not repine," she said; "I should indeed be selfish, did I permit myself to do so, while you are toiling to secure my comfort. Have I not my music, my painting, and my books to occupy me? and, more than all, shall I not be occupied for hours in listening for your tread and anticipating your return? How wise it was of your excellent mother, my dear Sydney, to educate you for a profession, and thus render you independent of the world; and how little did I suspect, who regarded you as a mere idle young man of fashion, that you were indeed 'one learned in law.'"

"Ida," exclaimed her delighted husband; "you are an admirable creature to content yourself with such a home as this. Could you only guess the misgiving with which I brought you here! I will not say that I apprehended reproaches, or even remonstrances; I never for a moment did you so much injustice; but had you looked sad or disappointed, it would have made me wretched."

"Sad! disappointed!" echoed Mrs. Elphinstone, as she looked round the simple apartment with a glance of exultation; "I declare to you, Sydney, that for weeks past I have not felt so happy or so light of heart."

And she told the truth, for she was alone with her husband: Lady Malcolm and her daughter being still resident at the Lodge. Mr. Elphinstone expected shortly to be called to the bar; his connections were powerful, his person attractive, and his address eminently prepossessing; he was, therefore, in every respect calculated to shine in the profession to which he was about to devote himself; and not one dread of failure oppressed his spirit. He had been welcomed back with enthusiasm at his club, and warmly congratulated on his good fortune in securing the hand of the beautiful Miss Trevanion.

"Never mind, Syd., though the old fellow should sulk for a time," had one of his intimate friends said confidentially: "he must come round at last, for he has no other child, and he hates his family with a good honest hatred that will prove substantial enough to last his life; so you need have no fears for the future. I only wish that I had as fair a chance of coming in for a princely fortune."

"Let him keep his money," was the proud reply; "I ask nothing of him. My career is plain before me, and I am ready to hew out my own path to affluence. What has been done, may be done again."

"Ha! what, you have come back to us once more, truant," was his greeting from a fashionable countess, in whose morning-room he lounged away a spare half hour before his return to Brompton, as she placed two of her jeweled fingers in his hand; "but do you know that you have been a very naughty boy! And now I see you distinctly, do you know that you have a very married look! How is Mrs. Elphinstone? By the by, I shall want you at my concert on Tuesday next. No disclaimers! You can surely be spared for an hour or two by this time. We must have no monopolies, and, besides, at your age it would really be too absurd were you to degenerate into a mere married man. You must keep up your connections; you must, indeed, for remember that if you neglect the world, the world will soon return the compliment."

"My world is home," said Sydney, courageously.

"Ha, yes; no doubt; very proper; you have not long been a husband, but that kind of thing can't last. Is Mrs. Elphinstone as handsome as ever?"

"Even more so—in my eyes."

"That is very nice. I am glad of it—sincerely glad of it. I hope that she will wear well, although your dark beauties seldom do; but in her case I hope it will be otherwise; it would be unpleasant for you, and mortifying for her, should she fall off while you are in the very prime of life."

"I see no prospect of such a catastrophe;" said Sydney, with an uneasy smile.

"Nevertheless, it is certain," persisted the lady, as she swept back a ringlet of a very doubtful shade of auburn; "that fair women retain their youth and freshness much longer than brunettes."

Elphinstone bit his lips to control his indignation.

"Poor Lord Downmere!" resumed the countess, suddenly breaking into a laugh; "what a ridiculous figure you caused him to make at that memorable fête at Richmond, where you enacted the rôle of Lochinvar, and ran off with his bride. I shall never forget it. It was decidedly the best thing of the season; not to mention that the poor man was a martyr to the gout for the whole period of your honeymoon. He will never forgive you, Mr. Elphinstone, never, never. Do you know I am quite delighted that you happened to call when I was alone, for you were always a favorite of mine, and I quite enjoy our little confidential conversation. Of course Mr. Trevanion has forgiven you, and all has ended like a French Vaudeville. By the by, will you come to my box to-morrow night, and see Dejazet? She is inimitable this season; a perfect evergreen."

At this moment the groom of the chambers announced some other guests, and Elphinstone bowed himself out. As he slowly made his way through the square, however his face had lost its usual sunny expression; he had winced more than once under the sting of the Countess's ill-judged remarks, and the smart still remained.

That his idolized Ida should be made the theme of affected condolence—she whose grace and beauty had thrown a host of titled triflers into the shade—was a mortification which he could ill brook. The world had always treated him so gently that he was unprepared for comments like those to which he had been compelled to listen. What right had others to speculate upon contingencies on which he himself had never bestowed a thought!

Poor Sydney! He had yet to learn that no individual who ventures to disregard the conventionalities of society ever escapes its censure or its ridicule, and that it is far easier to resent than to despise them.

"Why, Elphinstone, can that be you?" exclaimed a familiar voice, as he turned into Grosvenor Place, and an exquisitely gloved hand was passed through his arm; "tired of 'love's delights' and the 'turtle-nest' in the country, hey? I'm rejoiced to know it. We've missed you sadly, you adventurous Benedict. What an escapade! On my honor it was too bad stealing a march upon your friends in that way, and leaving pretty Mary Maitland to wear the willow."

"Nonsense, Lord Charles, Lady Mary was no more to me than a very agreeable acquaintance."

"Be that as it may, my dear fellow, I tell you that she has worn the willow, and worn it very gracefully too. That idiot Banfield of the Blues having, I suppose, heard that it is easy to catch a heart on the rebound, was imbecile enough to offer himself before you had evaporated a fortnight, and was dismissed for his pains. Suspicious, hey?"

"Of what?" asked Sydney, pettishly.

"Of what? why of your influence over the affections of your 'very agreeable acquaintance.' Young ladies of seventeen do not usually dismiss the heir-presumptive to a peerage quite so cavalierly, unless they have either a hope or a regret to indulge."

"You are really not justified in making so free a use of a lady's name;" said Elphinstone with indignation; "I must beg—"

"Pho, pho;" laughed his companion; "I may surely canvass the capriees of my own cousin, without your looking pistols and broad-swords at me. Why, my dear fellow, you could do no more if I had been whispering pretty things to your wife. There! there! keep your temper—first you want to quarrel with me because I talk of a possibility, and now you are chaffing like a caged panther because I hint at an impossibility."

"Understand, Lord Charles—"

"Yes, yes; I know. No one admired Miss Trevanion more than I did, and no one is more disposed to admire Mrs. Sydney Elphinstone—'soberly,' as Lady Betty says; but you are well aware that I am the most harmless fellow in the world; besides I quite comprehend that your position is a peculiar one, a very peculiar one; a fact which I shall be careful never to lose sight of. Still the disparity is not so very great, and will appear even less for the next eight or ten years, after which you may, without exercising any very great amount of philosophy, say with the French king, 'Après moi, le deluge.'"

"Lord Charles Glenhurst, I wish you good morning;" said Sydney, suddenly stopping, and resolutely shaking off the arm of his companion.

"There again!" exclaimed his obtuse lordship; "what a tetchy fellow you are. But I am determined not to quarrel with you. Come, I am on my way to the club."

"And I have business in the opposite direction," was the curt rejoinder.

"Well, good-morning then, since you will have it so. We shall soon meet again; and meanwhile, do me the favor to offer my best respects to Mrs. Elphinstone."

"Poor Syd!" was the mental apostrophe of the young nobleman as he pursued his walk; "judging from the change in his temper, I suspect that he has caught a tartar. He would have done better to marry little Mary."

"Driveling idiot!" was the muttered comment of Elphinstone; "he to talk of whispering pretty nothings to Ida!—He who is not worthy to pronounce her name!—and that is a man who calls himself my friend—my friend!—what a bitter mockery of the term. And then I, fool that I was! suffered him to see that he had ruffled me. A pleasant morning I have passed, truly."

Sydney was enlarging his experience of mankind. Often, in the intoxication of his happiness and triumph, had he felt himself to be the object of universal envy; he had yet to learn that for one subtle perfume which is burnt upon the altar of the world by its votaries, for a fellow-man, a thousand fetid odors are cast into the flame to poison the surrounding atmosphere.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

FRIENDS.

The Elphinstones had not taken possession of their suburban retreat above a month before it became quite the fashion with a "certain set," to make a pilgrimage to the cottage which was now their home.

A few were prompted by good-will, or at least by kindness of heart; but the principal number were led there by idleness and curiosity, which they excused to themselves during their drive by sundry pithy apothegms, such as, "Well, willful woman must have her way," "As the tree falls, it lies," etc., relieved by expressions of wonder as to how the pampered heiress would contrive to exist with her penniless husband; on the ridiculous nature of her position, tied for life to a mere boy; and on rather lax speculations as to the probable result of so unnatural a match.

"But, my dear marchioness," said a rouged and ringleted dowager to her equally faded companion, as they rolled in a well-padded chariot toward Brompton; "if she should really repent and leave him, it is easy to judge that she will not inflict upon herself the tedium of the Arches Court; and she is handsome enough to avoid that infliction whenever she pleases; would it not be disagreeable to be involved in an affair of the kind?"

"Why should it?" asked her companion, without unclosing her eyes, as she lay back behind the rose-colored blind of the carriage-window; "we are not the keepers of her conscience; and, meanwhile, until the catastrophe takes place, we must not forget that she will be quite an acquisition. The men will be all curiosity—I need say nothing of the women; and what with her beauty and her musical talents, she will amply reward the risk; besides, poor thing! she will feel grateful, no doubt, that she is not overlooked in her poverty."

"You are right, quite right," was the equally careless rejoinder; "and Sydney Elphinstone, although he has made such a fool of himself, may also prove a very accommodating resource; and will be glad enough, I dare say, to accept an ivory for the opera, or a stray concert ticket, which he can no longer afford to purchase, when his escort may be desirable; so that, after all, we are perhaps acting judiciously in lending our countenance to this very absurd couple."

"For my part," said the Marchioness of Crichdale; "I confess that I shall be curious to see the haughty beauty who dismissed my cousin, Sir Mark Merivale, with a smile and a courtesy, doing the honors of a cottage in the purlieus of London; it must be quite a comedy."

"Comédie larmoyante, I should think," sneered Lady Martha Swaincote, as the equipage drew up at the door of a leaf-embowered and verandaed dwelling, overgrown by honeysuckle and creeping roses. "Bless me! why surely we have made a mistake, and have intruded on the back-scene of an opera ballet."

But no; their tagged and powdered footman was duly informed by the neat waiting-woman who answered the gate-bell that this was, indeed, the residence of Mrs. Elphinstone, and moreover that her mistress was at home.

After a rapid glance over the exterior of the cottage, and a hope, expressed considerably above a whisper, that they should not suffer from damp feet, as they measured with their eyes the length of the gravel-walk over which they were compelled to advance in order to reach the house, the two great ladies at length made up their minds to alight; and, preceded by the female servant, and followed by their own parti-colored attendant, they overcame the difficulty, and found themselves in the small entrance-hall, whence a door, carefully sheltered by a battant of crimson baize, gave ingress to the drawing-room.

As they were announced, Mrs. Elphinstone rose quietly from the dormeuse in which she had been reclining, engaged upon a new work which Sydney had brought from town on the previous day, and advanced a step or two to meet them.

Nothing could be more simple, and, at the same time, more elegant, than her morning costume; for, free for a time from all doubt and all mistrust, Ida took a secret pride in adorning herself, and thus eliciting the admiration of her husband.

Nor had she neglected to extend the fascination of good taste and refinement to all about her. Even Sydney himself could scarcely recognize his home after she had become its inmate.

A few pounds, judiciously expended, had done wonders. Snowy draperies tempering the bright colors of the chintz hangings; graceful toys scattered over the tables, jardinières filled with exotics, whose perfume filled the apartment, gave a summer aspect to the small but pretty room, which rendered the absence of more costly ornaments overlooked, or at least disregarded.

"My dear Mrs. Elphinstone," said the marchioness, as she extended her hand, and then languidly threw herself upon a sofa; "you have not forgotten me, I trust; and see, I have brought Lady Martha Swaincote, who was as anxious as myself to renew her acquaintance with you; what an age it is since we have met! Never, you know, since the eventful evening when you concluded one of the most charming fêtes of the season by a coup de théâtre— But we will not revert to a subject which may be painful to you."

"By no means," said Ida, with a calm smile; "why should it be so, when I am one of the happiest women upon earth?"

"In that case I have committed no indiscretion," replied her noble friend; "and am delighted to be able to congratulate you; for really marriage is such a lottery at the best, that when persons really run a risk as you did, it is quite comforting to know that they have no reason to repent."

"I am not aware that I ran any risk, madam;" retorted Ida, haughtily; "I knew Mr. Elphinstone to be a man of honor."

"Of course, my dear, of course;" interposed Lady Martha with affected gravity; "our friend was not intending to infer any doubt of your husband's honor, but of his stability. He was so very young, that she dreaded lest he should have mistaken a mere transitory fancy for a solid attachment."

"Just so;" acquiesced the marchioness, raising her glass to her eye, and glancing leisurely about her; "Lady Martha has expressed my true meaning; and I really was apprehensive that things might not turn out well; for, setting aside the extreme youth of Mr. Elphinstone, you must be aware that you could both of you have done much better. That, however, is of course your own affair."

"I am rejoiced that your ladyship concedes so much," said her hostess with the air of an empress.

"I am, I assure you, quite delighted;" pursued the lady; "and really you have a very pretty little house; is it not, Lady Martha? I am actually glad to have seen it, for the marquis has a widowed aunt who was silly enough to make an imprudent marriage, and who being now compelled to live upon a very limited jointure, is looking out for a residence suited to her means. I will mention this cottage to her, as she may perhaps find a similar one in the neighborhood, and she would be a charming companion for Mrs. Elphinstone."

"Are we not to have the pleasure of seeing your husband?" inquired Lady Martha, who, less self-engrossed than her friend, had remarked the indignation of their hostess.

"Mr. Elphinstone is in town;" replied Ida; "he has just been called to the bar, and is consequently compelled to pass the greater portion of the day at his chambers."

"Called to the bar!" exclaimed the marchioness; "are you really serious? why, what a dreary life you must lead! It must be quite a relief to you to receive your friends; and you must also be in a constant state of anxiety; London is such a horrid place for young men, and those odious clubs render them so terribly independent of their homes."

"Mr. Elphinstone has not, I am happy to say, evinced any disposition to avail himself of his independence;" was the quiet reply.

"He would be very ungrateful had he done so;" remarked Lady Martha, in a conciliating tone; "with such a home, and such a wife, he need scarcely seek for enjoyment elsewhere."

"Still," said the marchioness, sententiously; "I can not understand his volunteering the drudgery of a profession. We all know that he was poor, but you Mrs. Elphinstone, are an only child, and your father is very wealthy."

"Quite true, madam."

"So you see, my dear—you will excuse the liberty which I am taking, and remember that I am older than you, and have had more experience of the world—I consider that you have been ill-advised to indulge him in so silly a caprice—for of course he must look to you for advice; at his age and with his habits, he can know nothing of business; and had you induced him to abandon this extraordinary idea, you might have had him constantly under your own eye, which would have been very desirable.

"I tell you this advisedly, and I have some right to do so, for although the marquis was ten years my senior when I became his wife, I can assure you that I had many a heartache. It is quite ridiculous to suppose that because a man is married he undergoes a moral apotheosis; oh, no; the French proverb is a true one: 'the cowl does not make the monk;' and, until we can reform human nature, men will be men."

With this sublime climax her ladyship slowly rose, selected a magnificent magnolia from the bouquet on the center table, which she transferred to her girdle, shook out the folds of her violet-colored satin, and prepared to depart.

"I shall see you soon and often, I hope, Mrs. Elphinstone;" she said; "I retain a delightful memory of your musical talents. In short, you must always be an acquisition; and, as you know, the marquis is one of your most devoted admirers."

"Your ladyship's kindness is very flattering;" said Ida, with dignity; "but I regret I can not avail myself of it, as we have no carriage. I am, however, much gratified that you have honored me with a visit, since you were so good as to feel an interest in my happiness, as you must have convinced yourself that I am perfectly satisfied with my destiny, that I have no ambition beyond that which my marriage has fulfilled, and that I can, without a misgiving, trust Mr. Elphinstone even at his club."

"Ha, my dear;" sighed her ladyship, as she swept out of the room; "no doubt you feel all you say: we women are such confiding creatures, and you are still certainly very beautiful."

Lady Martha followed her friend; and as the door closed behind them, Ida buried her face in the soft-pillows, and fell into a painful train of thought. The iron hand had, indeed, been gloved in velvet, but the grasp was not the less deadly.

CHAPTER XXIX.

HOME.

ELPHINSTONE had, as stated by his wife, been called to the Bar; his chambers were, if not sumptuously, at least comfortably and sufficiently furnished; he had provided himself with a confidential clerk; laid in a magnificent stock of stationery; fitted up his bookcase with the most valuable works of reference to be obtained for money; secured a gown and wig of unexceptionable cut and quality, in which, as Ida laughingly declared, he looked like a quasi lord-chancellor; made up his mind to study for at least six hours in the day; and, in short, required nothing beyond the opportunity of putting his legal talents to the test.

Nothing, therefore, remained to be done; save, indeed, that he considered it necessary to curtail the hours of study, in order to secure clients; but he had so many friends, that he entertained little doubt of his success in that respect. Day by day, too, he had reason to believe that all apprehension on the subject would be superfluous; but somehow or other it constantly happened that the very individuals who assured him of their support, as a matter of course, should they be accidently involved in litigation, were sure to be intimate with Sir Frederick Thesiger, or Sir Fitzroy Kelly, and, consequently, felt themselves compelled to place the business in the hands of an old professional friend, while they could not, equally as a matter of course, take the liberty of suggesting to men of such eminence the choice of junior counsel.

For a time Elphinstone listened and believed; and even amid his disappointment and mortification, endeavored by hard study to render himself worthy of the confidence which would, as he fondly hoped, ere long be placed in him.

But as month after month went by, and winter succeeded to autumn; as, after a Christmas of isolation from all his former friends, he saw himself passing the threshold of a new year, and still found himself without a brief, the excitement of hope wore off; and, abandoning his chambers to the care of his clerk, who contrived by the aid of the morning paper and a new novel to get through the tedious hours of his monotonous existence, he sauntered down to his club, and even as time wore on, accidentally joined a water-party to Hampton Court or Richmond.

A feeling of false shame prevented him, however, from communicating to his wife these lapses from professional duty; he could not bear to damp her sanguine anticipations; and since the tide of fashionable visitors had ebbed, she lived so retired a life, that she was never likely to hear of his movements from any other lips than his own.

The spring was a glorious one; the London season had just commenced; and one engagement grew out of another so naturally, that Sydney soon ceased to reflect upon the whirl of dissipation in which he had involved himself. Careful never to overstay the hour at which he was aware that his wife would be anticipating his return, he looked upon the deception which he was practicing as a pious fraud.

Ida was happy in the belief that in the absence of active and practical improvement, he was spending his time in a course of study which could not fail ultimately to secure his professional success; while he, on his part, ill-constituted, as we have shown him to be, for either mental or moral exertion, easily convinced himself that he had already done all that was requisite, until the moment should arrive when his powers would be called into action.

And it was wonderful how well the world seconded his opinion; and how many sweet smiles and hearty plaudits contributed to convince him that he was walking in the broad path of social duty.

Mr. Elphinstone waltzed so well, and acted charades so beautifully:—Sydney was such an excellent oarsman, and got up a pic-nic so admirably—he was married, to be sure, but then, he had married a woman older than himself, and was consequently more to be pitied than blamed, for it was so easy to understand how matches of that description were arranged; so that, after all, it was perfectly natural that he should resume his position in society, and that his wife should reconcile herself to what, under the circumstances, was inevitable.

The world, however, in its short-sighted egotism, argued too rapidly. With all the heedlessness of his age, Elphinstone was, indeed, led into a career of folly and selfish indulgence, but he nevertheless fondly loved his wife; and it was not without much remorseful feeling that he occasionally reflected on his abuse of her confidence.

While he was engaged in archery or boating, billiards or dancing, the woman who had intrusted to him alike her happiness and her existence, was spending her hours in solitude and ennui, anxiously awaiting his return to a home far more humble than that of which she should have been the mistress: but, alas! Pleasure is a syren whose voice is seldom unheeded by the young—good intentions, as we all know, are the ill-impressed mosaics which serve to floor a region that must be illimitable, if we consider the amount of paving which it absorbs—and thus, day after day, Sydney yielded to the spell; and evening after evening he repented of his weakness only to sin again.

He was not happy; on that point he never deceived himself; for while he fluttered and flirted through the throng of fashion, he saw and felt that Ida, his own loved and loving wife, was fairer and dearer than any with whom he came in contact; and when he contrasted the lax and frivolous discourse to which he listened at his club with her pure and fascinating conversation, he despised himself for a weakness to which on the morrow he nevertheless again yielded without an effort.

Not even the flushing cheek and averted eye of Lady Mary Maitland when they occasionally met, disturbed his equanimity; with all his faults, and they were rather the follies of youth than actual defects of character, Sydney Elphinstone was no coxcomb; and he consequently attributed these evidences of emotion to any cause rather than the true one.

In becoming the husband of Ida Trevanion he had given himself to her wholly, and he was fully conscious of her claim upon his undivided affection.

Still, he could not but know and feel that his position was a false one: and that, should Ida one day discover how she had been misled by his silence, all confidence must be forever at an end between them. He was, however, aware that their income could by no means suffice to their present style of living; for while he frittered away the very limited amount which was exclusively his own, his wife unaccustomed to economy in any shape, and totally ignorant of the real value of money, was equally expensive in her own habits, while, with perfect satisfaction, she believed that by dispensing with a carriage and even a male domestic, and living in a mere cottage, all further retrenchment was unnecessary.

Never indeed, perhaps, were two individuals more thoroughly self-deluded than were Mr. and Mrs. Elphinstone at this precise period. She, calmly, and patiently happy in the fullest confidence that she was more than ever necessary to her husband, who, after long and weary hours of monotonous occupation, could look only to her for companionship in her hours of periods of leisure; and he in the equally baseless conviction that his friends could not help him as they had hitherto done; and that his first brief would at once induct him into all the duties and habits of a man of business.

And meanwhile all things went on smoothly; and even, if Ida did occasionally feel that rouge, paint, and practice as she might, the time would hang heavily upon her hands, she struggled against the weakness, resolved that Sydney should never suspect her of so puerile and selfish a folly; and thus it was, that she constantly welcomed him to his home with a bright smile and a cheerful voice.

As her husband's day, according to the world's notion of diurnal existence, ended, hers own began; for Sydney's society was now the only dissipation and excitement to which she could look forward; while he, on the contrary, anticipated the matrimonial tête-a-tête with a sense of actual enjoyment and repose that acted like a precious balm upon his conscious and worn spirit.

Not even the necessity of concealing any unusual fatigue under which he might occasionally be laboring was entailed upon Ida; for he was not compelled either to avow or to explain it, for Ida was so convinced, when she saw him return to her with a pale cheek and an exhausted frame, that she possessed the true word of the enigma, that while an un-not to crush his moral energies by a word of pity, or a look of care which would inevitably have brought him to her feet, with a full avowal upon his lips, she only redoubled her efforts to restore his cheerfulness and become gay herself, as she remarked the unfailing effect of her endeavor.

There was much that was great in the character of Mrs. Elphinstone, too much, indeed, for her own peace, when the powers of her mind and will were called into action by imagined wrong—but which was eminently admirable when exerted for the happiness of another.

In those she loved, self was forgotten; there was no trial too bitter to be borne, no sacrifice too painful to be made, for him in whom she had garnered up her heart, while she felt that her affection was returned, freely and fully, as it had been bestowed, and without stint or limit. Thus, even her intervals of mental weariness never degenerated into moral suffering—she was happy because Sydney loved her: because he was toiling for her: because they were all in all to each other; and when she sometimes reflected how any invasion on her present solitude might involve her in doubts and suspicions, which to her jealous nature amounted to actual torture, she reproached herself for every regretful thought.

Thus wore away an entire year: and then again came spring, sweet, blossom-scented spring; and already the young leaves might be seen swelling and brightening amid the delicate tracery of the trees; once more a resurrection of life and gladness had come upon the earth; and even the most worldly-hearted experienced a sensation of glad relief as they escaped from the gross vapors of the over-peopled city, where man, and the works of man, seemed to be all in all, and emerged into the broad, pure and sun-lighted landscape, where the songs of the birds, the lowing of the cattle upon the hills, and the soft murmuring of the streams through the pleasant valleys, spoke of a nobler origin, and a wider purpose.

This was a season of delight to Ida, for once more she could surround herself with flowers, and scarcely a week elapsed that she did not find upon her work-table, some brilliant exotic, placed there to await her waking by the hand of her idolized husband; while, day by day, she found occupation for her pencil in the less costly blossoms of her own well-tendered flower-beds.

For some months, however, she had enjoyed more of Sydney's society; there was, as he very truthfully declared "nothing doing," although it was probable that they did not both attach the same meaning to the phrase; then, his chambers were dark, gloomy, and deserted, and he felt that he could read and study alike with more profit and with more pleasure under the same roof, and in the presence of his wife; an argument of which he required no logic to convince his delighted listener.

So the confidential clerk was, officially as well as actually, invested in his government at the Temple, with the full privilege of luxuriating peacefully in both news and novels, and a portion of Mr. Elphinstone's professional library was transported to the cottage, where he actually did spend an hour or two each day in turning over their pages. That he was not more assiduous in his learned labors did not, however, excite one regret in his exulting wife, who occupied every other instant of his time.

When the sunshine tempted her to walk—and, be it known to those who know it not, there are some charming walks in that pleasant neighborhood—he was her constant companion; and as she hung upon his arm, the first bright days of her married life, ere the necessities of the world had torn him from her side, seemed to have come back upon her. When she was occupied at her embroidery-frame, he watched the movement of her slight and skilful fingers, and enlivened her task with a multitude of ludicrous masculine suggestions, over which they laughed together as she convinced him of their utter impracticability; when she sang, his voice was blended with her own; and when too happy or too indolent to provide her own amusement, he read to her from the works of some favorite author; or, seated on a cushion at her feet, he accompanied on his guitar some of the wild romances which he had learned in Grenada or Seville.

Such was the life they led; and if indeed there were an adder among the roses which strewed the path of Ida, it was, for a time at least, coiled and hidden beneath the perfumed leaves.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE LETTER.

"I REALLY think, love," said Sydney, on one occasion, as they returned home from a saunter through some of the quiet lanes in which they both delighted; and he spoke so gravely, and so much with the air and manner of one who has arrived at a very serious decision, that Ida involuntarily glanced up at him, marveling what was to follow; "I really think I shall not renew my subscription at my club."

"My dear Sydney!" exclaimed his wife; "what an extraordinary resolution. What can be your reason?"

"I am so much more happy in your society than elsewhere."

"But consider, dearest—"

"I have considered, and I think that I am right."

"But the world will not think so, Sydney," persisted Mrs. Elphinstone, almost aghast; "a man without a club would be such a solecism in society—it would never do for you to lose caste just as you are endeavoring to follow your profession."

"I am quite aware of that, my dear girl; and there can be no doubt that a club has its advantages, but it is so deucedly expensive."

"Well then," said Ida, as though she were suggesting something so easily accomplished that it required no second thought; "we will curtail our expenses in some less objectionable way; for I could not endure that you should be subject to such a privation. No, no; it is not to be thought of. Remember, too, that you may occasionally have correspondents to whom you may not consider it desirable to give your private address."

"That is probable enough," acquiesced her husband; "in which case I shall refer them to my chambers."

"Depend on it, the scheme is a bad one," insisted Ida, who, habituated to the prejudices of the particular set to which she belonged, could not comprehend that a man could pass respectably through the world unless he conformed to all its conventionalities. "If you love me, Sydney, say no more about it. I am half angry with you for having conceived so wild an idea. Our discussion, however, reminds me that you have not been near this said club, which has suddenly become so odious to you, for the last four days; and, who knows? there may at this moment be letters awaiting you there—grave business letters—giving promise of a brief! Suppose my prophecy should prove to be a correct one, would you quarrel with the poor club again!"

"Probably not, fair tyrant."

"Then I will play the sybil, and predict that if, in obedience to my behest, you hasten there within this very hour to claim the prize, it shall be yours; and until you return I will closet myself awhile with Glück and Beethoven; and then while away the remainder of the time in devising some expedient which shall render your late mighty project both unnecessary and impossible."

"If you are quite determined, dear Ida—"

"My will is immutable, Mr. Sydney Elphinstone; a thorough woman's will, so that you have no alternative save obedience."

"Au revoir, then, love."

"Au revoir et sans adieu. I shall be quite anxious to know if I am indeed the sybil that I feel."

"—And look!" smiled her husband, admiringly.

Ida laughed, waved her hand, and disappeared into the house.

By what strange fatality is it that, not content with awaiting our destiny, we are always so prone to assist its progress, even in our brightest and holiest hours, when we know that any change may diminish, or even destroy, our present happiness?

Mr. Elphinstone went to his club, and there, as his wife had predicted, he found a letter awaiting him. It contained, however, no legal matter—no claim on his forensic eloquence—but that it was none the less welcome, was evident from the well-pleased smile with which he perused it.

As usual, he was cordially greeted by his numerous friends; for even at that unfashionable time of year, when London was still a desert, and the season only in perspective, there are always men either too indolent to abandon the ordinary routine of their habits, or too sagacious to relinquish their club enjoyments, when they have not secured an equivalent in the well-appointed country seat of some more wealthy friend.

Few heirs-apparent to an extensive estate, or a title, indeed; for they are always secure of change, be they as fickle or fastidious as they may; the very knights and castles of the social chess-board, without which the game of life must lose its interest; but shoals of younger brothers, the pawns of the play, who are at times indispensable, it is true, but who can be withdrawn from the board when their services cease to be available; travelers newly arrived in England, who indulge themselves with a week's run in town before they settle down in a hum-drum family-party in the country; and officers of the household troops, whose tour of duty detains them in the dull and dingy city.

Sydney's heart was very light that day; Ida had appeared to him to be more lovely and more fascinating than ever; he was very partial to his club, and he had really, as he stated, began to feel that it was a luxury too great for his means; but the arguments of his wife had been forcible enough to silence all his compunctious feelings; she had convinced him that, in justice to himself, he must maintain his proper position in society; and, long before he reached St. James's street, he had become quite of the same opinion.

It was, therefore, with a feeling of the most complete and quiet gratification, that he lounged away an hour among his gay and idle associates, skimmed over a couple of the daily papers, played half a dozen games at billiards, read the names of the new novels that were strewn over the library tables, and, finally, turned his face homeward.

But although it was still early when he left the club, his arrival at his own house was less punctual than was his ordinary custom; and during the half hour which preceded it, Ida had built up a very charming little romance upon the corner-stone of her own prophecy, founded entirely on his prolonged absence.

Yes—the letter—singular as such a coincidence would unquestionably be—the letter which she had foretold, was in truth awaiting him, and he would at last have the opportunity so long and so earnestly desired, of doing justice to his own high intellectual powers, and of justifying her choice in the eyes of all who might now seek to blame it.

Sydney, once famous, would no longer dissuade her, as he now did, from seeking a reconciliation with her father, for fame in his profession was the sure guarantee of wealth; and, consequently, he could then have no apprehension that he should be accused of mercenary motives, when sanctioning the overtures of his wife.

Perhaps Mr. Trevanion, softened by a renewed intercourse with his child, might even consent to a general amnesty, and include Ida's uncle in his forgiveness; and then, indeed, he felt as though no shadow could again cross his spirit.

The past was forgotten in this brilliant day-dream; while even the present—that present which to her was fraught with love and peace—seemed a mere period of probation, tending to a still brighter and a happier phase of existence.

Mrs. Elphinstone lay buried among the cushions of her dormeuse, her eyes closed, and a smile upon her lips, wandering in fancy through her old haunts, inhabiting her old home, and surrounded by her old associates, when at length the well-known and welcome step fell upon her ear, and she started up to receive her husband.

"Forgive me, Ida—" he commenced.

"Fergive you, love! For what?" was the laughing rejoinder—"for your brief delay? How could it be otherwise, when my promised letter suddenly involved you in such a whirl of pleasant occupation?"

"Were you then really aware—"

"Of course I was, rebellious unbeliever! or how could I have put wings to your heels a few hours back by my potent spell?"

"Still the letter does not mention your knowledge of the arrangement," said Sydney, thoroughly mystified.

The low sweet laugh of his wife was her only reply.

"However," he pursued, gayly, "you are right; the said letter did give me considerable occupation, although, with all deference to your opinion, be it said, fair lady, that I found it more essential than agreeable."

"My poor Sydney!" said his wife as she touched his up-turned brow with her lips, "it is weary work, I have no doubt, but still—"

"You are right, dear Ida, as you ever are; still it was my duty to undertake the task without a moment's delay, and right glad am I that I did so, as I flatter myself that I have succeeded to admiration."

"Succeeded, Sydney!" exclaimed his wife, mystified in her turn, "what, already?"

"Yes, dear love, so you see that I was worthy of the 'winged heels.' I have secured the snuggest little box for them; and only think—"

"We must be playing a game of cross-purposes," interposed Ida, becoming suddenly grave; "what were the contents of the letter?"

"What! Is the sybil at fault?" demanded Elphinstone; "I was actually deluded by your manner into the belief that you knew all about it. However, here it is; read it; and then I will tell you how I have fulfilled my appointed mission."

Ida took the paper from his hand, and her first glance at the superscription sufficed to drive the blood from her cheek; the handwriting was that of a woman; she hastily drew the note from its envelop, and as hastily ran her eye over its contents, which were these:—

"As I am sure that I may trust to your kindness in all things, my dear Sydney, I do not hesitate for a moment to request that you will render me an essential service. I find that the utter seclusion of our otherwise comfortable retreat has produced a very depressing effect upon my dear child's spirits, which reflected itself in some degree on her health. I had not calculated on the dreariness of a long winter during the previous season of leaves and sunshine, and while the near neighborhood of your accomplished wife and yourself rendered us independent of all other society; but I am compelled to confess that even at my age, when rain, wind, and snow confined us to the house, I felt that I had relied too much upon our home-resources, and exposed my poor Edith to a trial which was both severe and unnecessary.

"What I would ask of you is, therefore, that, if practicable, you will secure for me a small but ladylike residence, consistent at once with my present means and position in life.

"I have unfortunately mislaid your address, of which I only retain the word 'Brompton.' I shall, consequently, direct my letters to your club; and leave you to offer, in my name, my very sincere apologies to Mrs. Elphinstone for this demand upon your time and energies, which I feel sure that she will pardon.

"My essentials are pure air for my dear girl, and a small garden, in which she may amuse herself with her flowers, a sight of green boughs from our windows, and a situation which will not involve us in the necessity of making acquaintance with our neighbors.

"Now it strikes me that upon all these points Mrs. Elphinstone must have been as imperative as myself; therefore, I may sum up all my requirements by requesting you to do for me precisely what you have done for her; and I need scarcely add that if, in your own immediate neighborhood, these requisites can be secured, I shall be doubly gratified, as we shall then have the opportunity which we both covet, of forming, as I trust, a close and endearing friendship with your amiable and gifted wife.

"Lose no time, my dear boy, in complying with my request, as I am becoming anxious about Edith; and, to own the truth, shall not be sorry myself to be brought into more immediate contact with the 'human face divine' than I have been for the last few months. Say for us all and every thing that you know will be acceptable to Mrs. Elphinstone, and receive assurance of the sincere affection of your own and your mother's friend,

CLARISSA MALCOLM."

Poor Ida! Her air-built castle was prostrate, and in the void created by its destruction uprose a host of bitter anticipations. She had been so happy even in the house of her enforced solitude; and now—

She still sat silent with the fateful letter in her hand, when she was recalled to a more vivid sense of her self-inflicted suffering by the voice of her husband, who, surprised that she made no comment on its contents, suddenly discontinued his occupation of removing the decayed leaves from the plants in her jardinière, and exclaimed joyously:

"Is it not charming, Ida? We only required the society of Lady Malcolm and Edith to make our home a little Paradise; I may confess to you, now, that I reproached myself with every hour which, during my absence, condemned you to solitude; while, after their arrival I shall be able to leave you with a lighter heart, well assured that they will do all in their power to make the time pass pleasantly."

"Have I ever complained, Sydney?" asked his wife, tremulously.

"Never, dearest; and there were even moments;" he replied, with a shade of compunction in his voice, "when I almost wished that you had done so; that you had told me you could not support so wearisome an existence; and that I must be less apparently regardless of your happiness."

"I should have scorned myself for such egotism;" said Mrs. Elphinstone; "how could I complain, when I knew and felt that you were compelling yourself to a life ungenial to your tastes, in order to secure an existence of comfort and tranquillity to me?

"No, Sydney; you do not understand me yet. There can be no solitude, no weariness for me in a home, which I know will a few hours hence be gladdened by your presence. The proud conviction that you are laboring to do justice to yourself, and to fulfill my fondest dreams suffices, and ever must suffice, to my happiness. Do not rejoice for me, therefore, for I have nothing to desire—nothing to wish, I have made you my world, and am well content to abide in it."

There was much in the words of Ida calculated to inflict a pang upon the heart of her husband, but of that fact she was unconscious; for a moment only he replied by a silent caress, but soon rallying, he thanked her tenderly for her patience and forbearance; and ever sanguine, declared his conviction that the day was not far distant when he would be enabled to repay her all.

"Only love me, Sydney;" she said; "love me, and me only, and I can ask no more."

"Are you not my existence?" was his rejoinder; "does the world contain a second Ida?"

"May it never do so in your eyes;" murmured his wife.

"And now let me talk to you of the Malcolms," said Sydney, as he repossessed himself of the letter, which his wife still held, and replaced it in the envelop; "for despite all your generous self-abnegation, I can not help feeling delighted that since you have resolved to shut yourself out altogether from the world, you will at least secure the society of two individuals who can understand and appreciate you. I need scarcely say that after spending an hour at the club, I hastened to commence my undertaking.

"My first impulse was to hurry home, and consult you on the subject, but on second thoughts, I resolved not to do so, lest you should volunteer to accompany me in the search, a fatigue to which I was unwilling that you should be exposed, so like a sober and experienced Benedict, I entered upon my task unaided, feeling, that as I had, on a former occasion, been successful, where my heart was even more interested, I should scarcely fail to day."

"And you again succeeded, if I understand you rightly?" said Ida, forcing a smile.

"Beyond my hopes! Only imagine, dearest, that after having walked through a score of 'villas,' 'cottages,' 'lodges,' 'elms,' and 'oaks,' and 'roserys,' I had abandoned all thoughts of accomplishing my purpose today, when I was directed to the adjoining grounds, where you may remember my having drawn your attention to an avenue of acacias just bursting into leaf, and where I found, in fact, at the termination of the said acacias one of the very prettiest of all pretty cottages.

"Nothing could be better, nothing more convenient; I liked it both inside and out, and in less than ten minutes all was arranged. The house will be ready in a fortnight, and we have only to break a door through the wall which separates the two gardens, to become like one family, and to defy the prying curiosity of all the gossips of the neighborhood."

Ida almost gasped for breath; the reality was even worse than she had anticipated. She was to make a common home with the being whom she dreaded most on earth, and that, too, without being able to advance one valid objection to the arrangement.

The vision of Edith in her pure, fresh loveliness, swam before her eyes; she felt faint and sick at heart; her first impression had not deceived her; this young, and apparently guileless girl, was the rock upon which her married happiness was to be ultimately wrecked; doubtless, there were scores of women even more attractive in the world than Edith Malcolm, beautiful as she was, but Mrs. Elphinstone, with bitter ingenuity, easily convinced herself that in the hands of Edith Malcolm lay her fate.

Why, were it otherwise, when they had parted with every prospect of a prolonged separation—for Lady Malcolm had expressed some vague intention of residing for a year or two on the continent—why had she been pursued to her very threshold by the object of her distrust?

Again and again did she ask herself the question, and carefully did she note every word uttered by her husband, on the ever recurring subject of the speedy arrival of their new neighbors; note his undisguised exultation at the pleasure expressed by Lady Malcolm at the prospect of so soon rejoining her friends, for whom she felt so warm a sincere a regard, and watch his perpetual visits to the house, and his eagerness to complete the arrangements necessary to secure their comfort.

Nothing could be more simple, nothing more natural, than that Elphinstone should both feel and act as he did, but Ida saw and judged every thing through a distorted medium; encouraged the morbid feelings against which, for the sake of her own peace, she should have struggled, and thenceforward looked with a jaundiced eye upon all that related to Lady Malcolm and her daughter.

CHAPTER XXXI.

NEW HOPES.

On the day fixed for her arrival, Elphinstone was at the station, ready to escort his mother's friend to her new home. Ida had raised no objection to this arrangement, and did she, as he gayly bade her adieu, after having assured himself that all was in due order at the cottage to receive the in-coming tenants, sadden his pleasant anticipations by a look or a word of discouragement, although she was conscious, as she watched his departure, of a strange feeling of restlessness and indisposition, for which she could only account by supposing that the near approach of the trial to which she had been looking forward with dread for the last fortnight, had produced a painful effect upon her nerves.

Anxious, therefore, to conquer what she considered as a weakness unworthy of her, and peculiarly ill-timed at a moment when she required the exertion of all her energies, she resolutely abandoned her sofa, shook off the oppression which was stealing over her, and endeavored to divert her thoughts by personally superintending the preparations which were making in her little household to welcome the expected guests, who were to spend their first evening under her roof.

With her own hands she arranged fresh flowers in the vases, gave a more graceful fall to the soft draperies of the windows, and selected from a pile of music, such compositions as she knew to be peculiar favorites with Miss Malcolm.

It was a species of voluntary martyrdom which she thus inflicted upon herself; but true to her dignity as a wife, and anxious that the home of her husband should be worthy, even in its simplicity, both of him and of herself, she resolutely pursued her task, until her sense of physical suffering became so great, that unable longer to struggle against it, she was compelled to ring for assistance.

A succession of fainting-fits, alarming from their duration, at length so terrified her two attendants that one of them hastened to procure professional advice; and ere she was sufficiently restored to consciousness to forbid it, she found the solitude of her cottage invaded by the presence of a stranger.

"It will be nothing, positively nothing," said a low, pleasant voice, as the application of a powerful stimulant aroused her once more from the torpor into which she had fallen; "come, my dear madam, do me the favor to swallow a few drops of this essence; and believe me when I assure you that in an hour or two you will be perfectly restored."

Ida languidly opened her eyes, and raised herself into a sitting posture; she was still too weak to give utterance to a syllable, but she felt soothed, and as the large tears fell slowly on her cheeks, she slyly averted her head to escape the look of involuntary admiration which was fixed upon her.

"Over-excitement, no doubt," pursued her visitor; "but you must control your feelings, my dear young lady, you must, indeed; it is absolutely essential that you should do so. Gentle exercise, cheerful society, and the new interest which existence now offers to you, will be your best physicians."

Mrs. Elphinstone glanced at him inquiringly.

The physician smiled. "Leave me for a moment alone with your lady," he said to the maid who still lingered beside her mistress, and who instantly withdrew.

"I can not be deceived, my dear madam," pursued the old gentleman, as he seated himself near her, "in believing that I am the harbinger of good tidings. You are about to become a mother."

Ida sprang to her feet, and pressed her hands tightly together, while a smile of triumphant happiness lit up her countenance into almost unearthly beauty. In the excess of her joy she almost gasped for breath; then, after one long gaze into the venerable face of her companion, she sank upon her knees, and buried her burning brow among the cushions of the sofa.

Dr. Darnell neither spoked nor moved, until the vehement sobs by which her whole frame was convulsed had gradually subsided, and then, after having strictly enjoined an hour or two of perfect repose, he rose, and took his leave.

As the door closed behind him, Ida sprang from the floor and hurried to her own room, where, having carefully locked the door, she felt secure from all intrusion.

She needed to be alone with her new-born happiness—to dream of it—to dwell on it—Edith Malcolm was forgotten; she could think only of her child—of Sydney's child—of the sacred tie which was about to bind them a thousandfold more closely together.

There was no faintness at her heart now; her pulses throbbed with an emotion which defied alike sickness and sorrow; life was all brightness, the future all sunshine; rest! how could she rest? with a fevered cheek and a kindling eye, she paced up and down her chamber, until at length exhausted nature gave way beneath the violence of her excitement, and, casting herself upon the bed, she fell into a deep and dreamless sleep.

She was still buried in this death-like slumber when Mr. Elphinstone and his guests arrived, and great was the alarm excited in the whole party by the tidings which awaited them—an alarm which was increased almost to an agony in the breast of Sydney, when, on rushing up stairs, he found the door of his wife's chamber shut against him.

His voice, however, soon aroused Ida, who hastened to admit him, with a cheek so bright and an eye so radiant that he started back in surprise.

"They told me that you were ill, my own love," he exclaimed, as he drew her toward him, "ill, very ill, my Ida. Why did they torture me by such a fable? You are not, you can not be ill. Only tell me that—"

"No, no, Sydney, I am not ill; I am quite well, and, oh! so happy!"

"But what mystery is this, dearest? You can not imagine the torture which I endured until I once more saw you beside me."

"Mystery!" echoed Ida, with a bright blush, as she pillowed her cheek upon his shoulder; "oh, there is no mystery; I have been weak, very weak, since you left me, and played the woman, I believe, sufficiently to faint and terrify our ignorant Abigail; but I have slept since then, and, as you see, am perfectly recovered. But we must not forget our guests; return to them at once, dear Sydney, while I gather up my disheveled hair, and make myself presentable."

"Ida, you can not deceive me," said Sydney, uneasily; "you are feverish and excited."

"It is nothing," was the laughing reply; "I have had a dream, which I may perhaps confide to you hereafter if you obey me now."

"A dream—" murmured her husband, still only half-convinced; "and you will not tell me the true meaning of your evident emotion?"

"Not now, not now; remember that you are about, for the first time since our marriage, to play the host in your own house: you owe yourself to your friends; go, and acquaint yourself with your new duties, and I will join you within an instant."

Elphinstone reluctantly obeyed, and his agitated account of his brief interview with his wife by no means prepared Lady Malcolm, who during his absence had questioned the attendant on the subject of her mistress's indisposition, for the bright and radiant appearance of Ida, who shortly afterward entered the room with a glad smile and an elastic step, to offer at once her apology and her welcome.

If Lady Malcolm had occasionally thought the manner of Mrs. Elphinstone uncertain and capricious, she certainly found no cause to do so on the present occasion. Nothing could exceed the courteous urbanity of the young hostess, who did the honors of her house with a frank and cordial kindness which at once diffused its charm over the whole party; and ere long the conversation became as gay and animated as though no heart in that little circle had ever known care or doubt.

From that time the health of Mrs. Elphinstone became so delicate that she was seldom able to leave the house; but it is nevertheless certain that, had she been less ingenious in self-tormenting, this would have been one of the happiest periods of her life.

The devotion of her exulting husband, who watched every look and anticipated every wish; the gentle and unwearied kindness of Lady Malcolm, who was her constant companion; and the pretty playfulness of Edith, who came and went in the sick-room like a sunbeam, brightening and gladdening all around her, were well calculated to divest even indisposition of its dreariness.

But the very charm shed over the party by the presence of the fair girl, who was never weary of ministering to her comfort, was a perpetual source of wretchedness to Ida, as with closed eyes she lay upon the sofa, contrasting in her own mind the buoyant graces of Edith, her unimpaired health, and elastic spirits, with her own faded beauty, and depressed energies.

The two small households had, indeed, as Sydney had anticipated, become like one family; and while his wife was too languid for any exertion beyond skimming over a few pages of some favorite book, or listening, while Lady Malcolm relieved her of even that slight fatigue, Edith assisted Elphinstone to tend her flowers, feed her birds, and perform all those graceful little duties in which she had herself hitherto taken delight.

Every hour in the day they were together, generally engaged in the same pursuit, and evidently interested in the same objects. They played, sang, and drew together; and although Ida was present, still it was with a bitter pang that she saw them thus engaged, and felt that their mutual enjoyment was independent of herself.

Occasionally, Elphinstone would stroll down to his club; and at long intervals, he even extended his walk to the Temple, in the vague hope of hearing from his clerk that some strange foot had passed the threshold of his chambers; but no; every new visit was only a new disappointment; and even sanguine as he was, there were moments when he felt sick at heart, and began to ask himself how all this must end!

Town was filling rapidly, and whenever he made his appearance in his old haunts, he was overwhelmed with invitations, but he no longer suffered himself to be seduced into dissipation

Since the arrival of Lady Malcolm and her daughter, he had never passed a weary hour, and he consequently resisted the importunities of his friends without an effort, quite satisfied in his own mind that it was the present situation of Ida which had invested his home with a new charm.

As time passed, a fresh trial awaited Mrs. Elphinstone, to which she submitted in silence, anxious to conceal from the observant eyes of Lady Malcolm the weakness which, painful as it was to endure, would, as she was well aware, appear not only ridiculous but even offensive in the eyes of others.

During one of his daily visits, Dr. Darnell—for Sydney had at once declared constant attendance upon his wife to be essential—was struck by an appearance of languor in the voice and movements of Edith which was foreign to her usual habit; and after having watched her attentively for a few seconds, he said, in a tone of gentle decision:

"I can not afford, young lady, to have two patients in one house, and, therefore, I have to request that you will take more exercise. You are young and active, but in order to benefit by your energies, you must develop them. You are here in excellent air, I admit; but you must not always breathe the same atmosphere. You must walk, change the scene, and lay in a stock of new ideas, for the mind requires employment as well as the body. Have you been to the Exhibition yet? No! well, then, go to-morrow; it is well worth a visit; and as you are an artist yourself, you can not fail to pass an hour or two delightfully.

"Here is Mr. Elphinstone, an idle man, of whom his wife will be glad to be rid now and then; you could not have a better escort. Follow my prescription, and I shall find your cheeks a little brighter when we next meet."

Sydney was enchanted by the proposition, and eagerly offered his services, which were as frankly accepted by Lady Malcolm, who looked upon the son of her friend as her own; and, while Ida drove back the tears of jealous mortification and annoyance which sprang to her eyes, as she witnessed the pleasure evinced by the rest of the party, it was finally decided that should Mrs. Elphinstone be sufficiently well on the following day, for her husband to leave her without uneasiness, and the weather prove propitious, the plan of the worthy physician should be carried out.

As may be anticipated, this first absence of Sydney and Edith was succeeded by many others; the benefit derived by her child from moderate exercise and mental occupation, led Lady Malcolm to overlook the possibility that Mrs. Elphinstone might be less gratified by the arrangement than herself; and as Ida carefully abstained from all expostulation, no suspicion of the truth ever intruded itself upon her mind.

At length the event so anxiously anticipated by all took place, and Elphinstone, to his unmeasured delight, found himself the father of a noble boy; while even Ida herself, victim as she was of a diseased imagination, felt for a time alike proud and happy.

"Would," she murmured to Lady Malcolm, who sat beside her bed; "would that my father could see this precious babe. He would take me to his heart again; and I am sure he would; for I now feel what it is to be a parent."

"Do not despair," was the whispered reply; "rely on it that, estranged as Mr. Trevanion may seem to be, he is not ignorant of any thing which affects your welfare or happiness: and, therefore, like yourself, I look forward with a hope that this dear boy will prove a new and lasting bond between you."

As Mrs. Elphinstone shortly afterward sank into a deep and refreshing sleep, Lady Malcolm sat for a time in earnest thought; and then, relinquishing her post to the sick-nurse, hastened home, and rapidly wrote and sealed a letter, which she at once dispatched to the post-office by a servant.

Admitted as she had now been for a considerable time into the intimacy of Mr. Elphinstone's family, and fully acquainted as she was with the extent of his resources, Lady Malcolm had felt many misgivings as she noted the slight value which was attached to money by either himself or his wife, and their total ignorance of its real capabilities.

More than once she had been on the point of hinting her apprehensions to Sydney, but the subject was one of so delicate a nature, that despite her better judgment, she had shrunk from the task. Now, however, she believed that she had discovered a method of assisting the young couple without wounding their pride; for she felt that, let Mr. Trevanion resent his daughter's marriage as relentlessly as he might, still he could not be insensible to the gratification of learning that he had a grandson, or sufficiently regardless of his own dignity to suffer the child to be reared in obscurity and indigence.

Nor did she deceive herself; for although he in due time acknowledged her communication coldly and briefly, without comment of any kind, many days did not elapse before a packet was delivered to Mrs. Elphinstone, directed in a business-like hand with which she was totally unacquainted, and containing a bank-post bill for a thousand pounds. Great was the astonishment, both of Sydney and his wife, and numerous were their conjectures; while a shade of mortification lessened the happiness which such a gift at such a moment could not fail to afford; for a sense of obligation, be it to whom it may, is always galling to a proud spirit; but still they could not but acknowledge to themselves that never had so generous an offering been made more opportunely.

Nevertheless, however, the mystery was a painful one; and when Lady Malcolm, anxious to soothe their irritated feelings, ventured to suggest that it was in all probability a present from Mr. Trevanion to his future heir, Ida eagerly embraced the idea, and began once more to dream of pardon and reconciliation.

Her recovery was rapid. Never weary of watching over her infant, she sat with him for hours upon her knees; while Sydney, as much engrossed as herself by his new happiness, appeared to have lost all interest in existence, save that which centered in his wife and child. Sometimes, although reluctantly, the young mother would resign her precious charge for a time to Lady Malcolm; but when Edith would occasionally plead for the same privilege, Ida, gently, but firmly, declined to place him in her arms, alleging as her excuse that she was too timid to trust him to any one who was not accustomed to children.

It was her first revenge, and she had not strength of mind to forego it.

Sydney was, as we have said, wholly engrossed for a time by his little son, but it is not in the nature of any man, however kind and affectionate, to emulate the persevering love and devotion of a mother. As time wore on, therefore his old tastes and habits resumed their sway, and he no longer spent hours beside the little cot, in which, nestled amid lace and cambric, lay the tiny object of so many cares and hopes.

While Ida was still fully occupied in registering every look and movement of the babe, Sydney had resumed his walks, his music, and his gardening; and in all these pursuits Edith was, as formerly, his companion; nor was it long ere Mrs. Elphinstone, even amid her preoccupation, had fully succeeded in convincing herself that her co-operation in their several employments, was requested rather as a matter of courtesy than of choice; never suspecting, how often her husband felt jealous of the absorbing affection for her child, which appeared to have weaned her heart from him.

Poor Edith! she was so childlike and so innocent that no thought of evil ever paled the roses on her cheek, or palsied her young heart. She loved Mrs. Elphinstone sincerely, and admired her with the fervor which only youth can feel. Little did she imagine that to the object of her regard she was herself a source of bitter and perpetual suspicion; little did she imagine that the mind which she believed to be so lofty had degraded itself by the admission of one impure idea, and that her image was interwoven with it.

So true it is that even those with whom we are most intimately connected never know us as we really are; to them we are what we desire to seem; into our inner life they can not penetrate, and thus society is, in point of fact, a clever masquerade, in which the ablest actors play the highest parts, and wear their motley the most gracefully.

Now and then the pressure of circumstance may rend away a portion of the drapery from each and all, but still much remains concealed, until the game of life is played out, and goes down even to the grave at once undetected and unsuspected.

CHAPTER XXXI.

A NEW ACQUAINTANCE.

THE grace and beauty of Mrs. Elphinstone, the manly bearing of her husband, and the refinement of every thing about them, had singularly excited the interest of Dr. Darnell, who was well able to appreciate such qualities in those with whom he came into contact.

That their pecuniary resources were by no means equivalent to their pretension she at once discovered, although no inference to that effect had ever escaped from either; and that some mystery was connected with the little household he felt satisfied, while, at the same time the intimacy which existed between the Elphinstones and the somewhat stately Lady Malcolm, together with the presence of her young daughter, sufficed to convince him that it could not be one of a discreditable nature.

Thus, there was a certain romance flung over his new friends which tended to heighten rather than to diminish the feeling of affectionate regard that he soon experienced for them, and which led him ultimately to express an anxious hope that their accidental acquaintance might be suffered to grow into friendship.

"I am no longer a young man, my dear madam," he said, affectionately, taking the hand of Ida; "but my heart has not run so rapid a race as time; it can still sympathize in the happiness of others, and exult in sharing it. As I can no longer keep you as a patient, I am anxious to retain you as a friend; I will, indeed, be frank enough to confess to you without disguise that I can not coldly look forward to the loss of your society just as I have learned to value it."

"You have only anticipated my own intention, my good friend," was the cordial reply of Mrs. Elphinstone; "for, believe me, when I assure you that I am far from insensible to the charm of your conversation, or to the peculiar benefit which constant intimacy with a person of your character and principles can not fail to confer on so young and inexperienced an individual as my husband, who, with the warmest heart, and the noblest nature upon earth, is ill calculated to wrestle with the world single-handed."

"So be it, then, my dear lady; from this hour we sink the physician in the friend," said the doctor, heartily; "and I trust that neither party will ever have cause to repent the compact."

And Ida judged rightly, when she declared that the friendship of Dr. Darnell must prove valuable to Sydney, for Dr. Darnell was no common character. Possessed of admirable taste, and good practical common sense, he had seen enough of the folly and frippery of fashionable life to estimate it at its true value, and had sufficient moral courage to avow that he could and did relish the charm of unaffected simplicity, alike in speech and principle.

Talking for effect, was his aversion, nor did he even endeavor to conceal his contempt of the talker; while he joined cordially, and genially in the pleasant, unstudied, home-breathing gossipry which is, after all, the great charm of the social fireside. The puerile vanity, which sought to cheat itself by a sophism, and to make words stand proxy for ideas, was to him as hateful as a vice; and it was precisely this absence of all stage-effect in the language and bearing of Mr. and Mrs. Elphinstone, which had attracted him.

Unfortunately, however, the proffered friendship of the estimable and somewhat eccentric physician, involved, as a natural consequence, the acquaintanceship of his wife, who, although a well-meaning woman, was extremely weak, and like all weak people, fancied herself more clear-sighted and judicious than every one about her.

Her pretty person, and still more, perhaps, her modest fortune, had proved irresistible to the young doctor, at a period when he was striving to establish himself in his profession; and thus two persons, as widely sundered as the poles, both in taste and intellect, had been united in a life-long tie which it was idle to lament when, in after-years, both discovered their mistake.

Dr. Darnell, frequent as his visits had been to the cottage of the Elphinstones, had discovered nothing there but what, to a mind constituted like his own, was genial and charming; but it was far otherwise with his lady, who was never happy save when she was peering below the surface of things, and detecting some hidden rock beneath the apparently placid waves.

Her husband had forwarned her that although evidently persons of high-breeding and elegant habits, Mr. and Mrs. Elphinstone, were apparently far from affluent, and strictly cautioned her to avoid all reference to the fact; nor did she fail to give a promise to that effect, even while she exalted in the consciousness that, on this one point, at least, there could be no rivalry between them.

A greater contrast to the calm and gentle Lady Malcolm could scarcely have presented itself in the drawing-room of Ida, than the little, fussy, gayly-attired wife of the staid middle-aged doctor. If there were one fact, which more than every other, Mrs. Darnell had been unable to comprehend, it was the ravages produced by time, upon her once blooming face and graceful figure; and thus, in her fiftieth year, she assumed the dress, and aped the manner of fifteen.

Too thoroughly self-possessed to be absolutely vulgar, her little affectations were simply ridiculous; and Ida scarcely knew whether to be amused or annoyed by the absurdities of her new acquaintance.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Darnell was perfectly in her element, as she watched with a keen eye every member of the little party; caressed the baby with voluble comments on his extraordinary loveliness, congratulated Lady Malcolm on the acquisition of Acacia Lodge, and examined with all the assumed gusto of an artist, the sketch upon which Edith was engaged, and which chanced to be the one with Mrs. Elphinstone's figure in the foreground.

"Well! this is really very nice," she exclaimed, patronizingly; "very nice, indeed. You have a charming talent. I absolutely do not think that I ever saw a more graceful figure."

"It is, indeed, admirably executed," said Edith; "but I regret to be compelled to confess," she added, ingenuously, "that my little sketch is indebted to Mr. Elphinstone for its greatest ornament. The scene is one dear to us all, and the portrait is, as you have probably discovered, that of his wife."

"Of course, it is; no one could mistake it for a moment," acquiesced the visitor; "and how very delightful it must be for you, Miss Malcolm, to have so skillful an assistant in your studies."

The remark was common-place enough, but the glance turned upon Ida as the words were uttered was infinitely more significant; an expression of blendid pity and surprise could be read for an instant in the keen eyes which were riveted upon her, and beneath which her own fell, while she felt the warm blood rush to her cheek and brow.

By that one look, Mrs. Darnell had justified Ida to her own conscience. She did not pause to reflect upon the impertinence, should she indeed have read the glance aright, of such an inference on the part of a perfect stranger; she did not dwell on the ill-breeding, or, still worse, on the ill-feeling, which could have prompted a suspicion of evil where all was apparently frank and simple; she forgot, as by magic, the wonder and almost disgust with which she had regarded the lady half an hour previously; she only felt that her secret had been read, and that one individual, at least, could sympathize in her suffering.

From that moment Mrs. Darnell became in her eyes invested with an interest which produced an immediate effect upon her whole manner; her flippant nothings were rewarded by a smile; her offers of friendship were graciously acknowledged; and when she at length rose to take her leave, she was warmly pressed to repeat her visit.

As Sydney conducted the lady to her carriage, Lady Malcolm looked up quietly from her knitting, and asked, demurely:

"Well, my dear, what do you think of your new acquaintance?"

As her mother spoke, Edith also glanced toward Mrs. Elphinstone, while a smile, requiring only one word of encouragement, twinkled in her eye and quivered about her lips, but it faded beneath a look of astonishment, as Ida calmly answered:

"I think her both pretty and pleasant."

The surprise of Lady Malcolm equaled that of her daughter. That Mrs. Elphinstone, who she well knew to be even hyper-fastidious in her tastes, should not only tolerate, but actually profess to admire a woman so conspicuously deficient in all the attributes of high breeding, was an enigma which she felt herself unable to solve.

"Pretty, perhaps," she said; "yes, undoubtedly she must have been pretty—once; but pleasant, my dear! Can you really think her pleasant?"

"Very pleasant," persisted Ida; "and I am, moreover, convinced that she is sincere and warm-hearted."

"Upon that point I must defer my judgment," said Lady Malcolm; "and, as she has promised me the honor of a visit in my turn, I shall be delighted to have the opportunity of doing her justice."

"I am so sick of the empty conventionalities of the world," was the rejoinder of Ida, "that it is really refreshing to me to meet with a person so thoroughly unsophisticated as Mrs. Darnell. In the artificial state of society in the present day it is difficult to distinguish friends from foes, or a seeming kindness from a secret wrong."

"Come, come, you must not encourage such gloomy ideas," said Lady Malcolm; "take a fancy to this fussy little dame if you will, for it will serve to amuse you, but do not on that account misjudge the rest of the world."

Ida smiled somewhat bitterly, and rang for her baby.

Meanwhile, the unsophisticated wife of the worthy physician was rolling toward home in her well-appointed chariot, a self-gratulatory light gleaming in her restless eyes.

"So, so," she mentally exclaimed, "the poor doctor has then, with all his boasted penetration, frequented these people for months, and never suspected the truth. Good, easy man! So this, then, is the earthly paradise that he taught me to expect. Paradise, indeed—a new Eden with a new serpent; but its fangs shall be drawn, if it depends on me. Infamous! So beautiful as she is, that her worthless husband should be flirting—and, for what I know to the contrary, perhaps even intriguing—with that demure-looking girl, before her face; and the mother sitting by, too, looking as calm and as stately as if she were not giving her countenance to such an enormity!

"And they flatter themselves that the poor injured wife does not suspect the truth—does not see the looks which pass between them, nor how perfectly they understand each other. But they are deceived; she does more than suspect; she knows it, or why should she have shrunk when our eyes met, and then suddenly become so friendly in her manner?

"There is no mystery there, at least; she saw that I had discovered the truth, and that I felt for her, which no one else does.

"Poor thing! Poor thing! well, my duty is plain; I will not leave a stone unturned to serve her; and I know that it will ease her poor breaking heart to pour out all her grief to me. I will call on her again in a day or two. I shall be so delighted to give her comfort."

And fully satisfied with herself and her own good intentions, Mrs. Darnell proceeded to pay another visit.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

HOPES AND FEARS.

"I HAVE brought you some visitors, Mrs. Elphinstone;" said Lady Malcolm one morning, as she entered the drawing-room of Ida unannounced; "and most welcome ones, I feel convinced."

The young mother, who had been bending over the couch upon which her boy lay asleep, looked up in surprise; but before she could reply, her eye met that of Sir Jasper Trevanion, who at that instant passed the threshold of the apartment.

"Sir Jasper Trevanion!" she exclaimed, as she sprang forward to meet him; "this is indeed an unexpected pleasure—and my cousin too!" she added, as she extended her disengaged hand to his son, by whom he was closely followed.

"You will forgive us this intrusion, I know;" said the baronet, as he led his niece back to her seat; "when I tell you that since our first and only meeting, I have vainly endeavored to ascertain your place of residence; which we at last learned to-day from Lady Malcolm."

"I was not aware that you were known to each other;" said Ida.

"Oh, we are old and tried friends;" was the reply; "but we will talk of that another time. And now tell me, my dear niece, are you well? are you happy?"

Ida pointed with an exulting smile to her sleeping child.

"I am answered;" said Sir Jasper; "he is indeed all that a mother's heart can wish. Look at him, Hubert, is he not worthy of the Trevanion blood?"

"Hubert!" exclaimed Ida, with a kindling eye; "is it possible, my dear sir, that your son bears the name of my father?"

"It is an old family name;" said the baronet, more coldly than he had yet spoken; "we have been Huberts and Jaspers from time immemorial, and I was too thorough a Trevanion not to respect the prejudices of my ancestors."

There was a painful pause, for Mrs. Elphinstone too readily understood the full meaning of the words to which she had just listened; but eager to diminish their effect, she turned with forced gayety toward her cousin, saying reproachfully, "and you Mr. Trevanion, have you not, also, a word of praise for my little nursling?"

As she asked the question, she for the first time looked steadily into the face of the young man, and was startled by the change which she perceived in his appearance.

He was still superbly handsome, but a settled flush, too deep and too brilliant for health, gave a fevered expression to his countenance, which was heightened by the unnatural brightness of his eyes.

A pang smote upon the heart of Ida as she met the radiant smile with which he replied to her inquiry; and she involuntarily glanced from him to his father. No symptom of alarm or uneasiness could, however, be detected in the look or manner of the baronet. It was evident that if her terrible surmise were a correct one, it had as yet never awakened one suspicion in his mind.

"You must forgive me, my dear niece;" said Sir Jasper, after having suffered his eye to wander over the well arranged but still modest apartment; "if I appear more unreasonable than my relationship may seem to warrant. You have a pretty home, and the hand of taste is visible in all its arrangements; but still I can not help thinking that it is not precisely the home suited to my niece. Tell me truly; have you no wish which it may be in my power to gratify?"

"None;" replied Ida, in a tone which she strove to render calm, but which still betrayed a shade of bitterness; "I am already, perhaps, more fortunate than a discarded daughter had any right to expect. I am quite satisfied with my destiny."

"Yet you had every reason to anticipate—"

"Pardon me if I request of you not to speculate on the past: I made my own future, and I look forward to it without one misgiving."

"You are right, quite right; I am rebuked for my worldliness—the philosophy of the heart is the only true one. And who are to be sponsors of this noble boy?" pursued the baronet, as the child awoke, and laughed in the face of his mother. "If not too late, I should be delighted to offer my own services."

Tears filled the eyes of Mrs. Elphinstone, but they were tears of joy, as she replied; "Then, indeed, will one of my most earnest desires be fulfilled: of the other I have, unfortunately, no hopes."

"Well, well;" said Sir Jasper, cheerfully "thus much at least is arranged, and I assure you that I shall be sincerely proud of my godson."

"A thousand thanks!" exclaimed Ida; "oh! you know not of what a heavy load you have relieved my heart."

"And I?"—asked Mr. Trevanion, one of whose fingers was clasped in the plump little palm of the infant; "may I venture to present myself as the substitute of the favored individual who has excited the implied regrets of my fair cousin?"

Ida extended her hand to him in silence; her heart was too full for words.

"An excellent arrangement;" said Sir Jasper; "and one which induces me to waive one of my rights in favor of my son, my dear niece. I was about to make it a point that you should give my name to your boy; but we will call him Hubert—for many reasons it may, perheaps, be desirable."

"Nothing could be better;" observed Lady Malcolm; "and as this little cherub is to be my godson also, we can at once decide that henceforth he is to be known as Sydney Hubert Elphinstone."

"Hubert Sydney;" said his mother, in a low but decided voice.

"Right, right;" smiled the baronet, evidently much gratified; "and the next time, we will have Sydney Jasper, will we not, Master Hubert? See the young rogue, how heartily he enters into the conspiracy against his younger brother. By Jove, madam, he is already a Trevanion from head to heel."

It had been long, very long, since Ida had felt so intensely happy. The consciousness of isolation which had pressed so painfully upon her since she had become a voluntary exile from her father's house seemed suddenly removed, and she forgot that her uncle and his son were in reality strangers, while remembering that they were the only relatives who still acknowledged her claim.

In that hour she had only one regret, and that was induced by the absence of her husband, who had unfortunately yielded to the request of Dr. Darnell that he would accompany him several miles into the country, where he had been called to a patient; and who thus missed a meeting which his wife ardently desired should have taken place.

As Sir Jasper Trevanion was anxious to leave town within a few hours, the visit was necessarily a brief one, but it left a cheering impression on the mind and spirits of Ida; who, after the departure of the gentlemen, inquired with natural curiosity of Lady Malcolm, why she had hitherto made a mystery of her friendship with her uncle's family.

"I will tell you;" was the frank reply: "the General and Sir Jasper were college-companions, and, in after-life, firm friends. Such friends, indeed, that it was proposed between them, in the event of the arrangement becoming possible, that an union should take place between their children. Sir Archibald had more than once mentioned the subject to me, but it was one which I did not encourage, as, in my secret heart, I had at that period, different views for Edith; and as it was a point upon which he did not insist, I considered myself, after his death, exonerated from the fulfillment of a promise which I confess that I regarded merely as the caprice of two young men who had expressed an idle wish, rather than entered into a serious compact.

"Some time ago, however, my own reasons against the proposed marriage were removed by circumstances, and consequently, when Sir Jasper, disregarding the decline of our fortunes, recently wrote with a generosity which I could not fail to appreciate, to suggest that our children should meet, and that we should thus enable ourselves to judge whether the proposed union would tend to their mutual happiness, I assented at once."

"And what has been the result?" asked Ida, thoughtfully.

"It is, as yet, impossible to say. They have met but three times; still I can not but think that a young and disengaged heart must do justice to the attractive qualities of Hubert Trevanion; while, with the partial affection of a mother, I am equally inclined to believe that Edith, on her side, is well calculated to inspire a sincere and lasting attachment."

"This is all very strange;" said Mrs. Elphinstone, moodily; "nor, I confess, can I yet comprehend why, when aware of my connection with the Trevanions, you should have maintained so extraordinary a silence regarding this contemplated marriage."

"And yet I do not think that on reflection you will consider my reserve as singular. A thousand circumstances might have occurred to render the union undesirable, or even impossible; in which case, delicacy demanded silence on both sides; a feeling in which Sir Jasper and I alike concurred."

"I am obliged to admit the truth of your reasoning;" said Ida; "but may I, without impertinence, inquire how Lady Trevanion, who has been represented to me as a purse-proud and overbearing person, has been induced to consent to the marriage of her only son with a young lady, who, however beautiful and fascinating, is, as you yourself have assured me, almost without fortune?"

"Lady Trevanion, my dear;" said her companion; "has now been dead upward of a year. She was indisposed at the period of your marriage; and from that illness she never rallied. The retirement in which you have subsequently lived could alone have kept you in ignorance of the event."

"This is indeed a day of revelations!" exclaimed Ida; "and now that you are kind enough to enlighten me upon so many points connected with my own family, I may perhaps be forgiven if I inquire the reason of your original reluctance to bestow the hand of your daughter upon my cousin."

"I had wished her to marry elsewhere:" repeated Lady Malcolm, gravely, but without hesitation.

"Did you then alter your opinion of the person for whom you designed her?"

"By no means."

"This is more enigmatical than all the rest."

"The resolution of the enigma is simple, my dear Mrs. Elphinstone, the gentleman in question selected another wife."

"Ha!"

There was silence for a moment, a gloom had gathered upon the brow of Lady Malcolm, who was evidently buried in deep and painful thought; while the life-blood of Ida had sprung from her heart to her cheek, and burned there like a lava-flood.

Sydney, then, was the husband that she had coveted for her daughter! Sydney was the idol at whose shrine Edith was to have worshiped!

"It is to be hoped," she said at length, with an ambiguous smile, "that the happy individual to whom you allude will have no reason to repent his precipitation."

"I fervently trust that he never may!" was the half-unconscious reply.

"Perhaps had he known your flattering intentions in his favor—"

"He never even guessed—he never will guess—the visions of a mother's heart," interposed Lady Malcolm; "I have reason to believe that he is happy—very happy—and in that conviction I forgot my own disappointment."

"And Edith?"

"Edith knows nothing whatever of the circumstance."

"That, at least, is fortunate; but the gentleman himself?"

"Is in equal ignorance."

"And the unfortunate woman who has so unconsciously traversed your projects?"

"My dear Mrs. Elphinstone!" exclaimed her companion; "how do you imagine that she, of all persons upon earth, could ever have fathomed the secrets of my heart? A perfect stranger, whose very name was unknown to me before her marriage."

"There is more romance in the world than we are willing to believe," said Ida, "and I confess that I am woman enough to rejoice that poor Sydney was not thus predestined to another and a brighter fate when he made me his wife. It would scarcely be a comfortable reflection."

"I respect you too much to reply by one word of flattery to such a remark," observed Lady Malcolm, courteously, but with a sudden suspicion that she had been somewhat unguarded in her communications, "yet I may nevertheless admit that it is not the fate of every man to become the husband of such a woman as yourself. You can have nothing to regret—nothing to apprehend."

The eyes of Mrs. Elphinstone were riveted upon her as she spoke, but she remained calm and self-possessed under the scrutiny.

"I am grateful for your good opinion," was the cold rejoinder, "and although we were talking of the romance of real life, believe me, I have no ambition to become a heroine; regret is a weakness which I should scorn, and apprehension a folly for which I should despise myself. And so Edith is to be my cousin! How delighted Sydney will be when I tell him of our meditated relationship."

Although the voice of Mrs. Elphinstone had suddenly assumed a gayety little in unison with its previous tone, Lady Malcolm felt uneasy and embarrassed; nor was the feeling diminished by a consciousness that she could not in any way account for the impression which it produced upon her.

Perfectly true and right-minded, she never for a moment suspected that her motives were misjudged, and her meaning distorted by one to whom she had shown nothing save affection and consequently she could only explain the manner of Mrs. Elphinstone by the painful apprehension that there lay hidden beneath the grace and beauty for which Ida was so eminently distinguished, a defect of temper which must sooner or later prove the destruction of Sydney's peace.

She admitted this fear with reluctance, but still it grew upon her, as day by day she watched the clouded brow of Mrs. Elphinstone, and detected the shade of sarcasm which gave point to words otherwise trivial in themselves.

"Poor boy!" she mentally exclaimed, "secure as he now is in his unconscious happiness, a bitter day of trial awaits him yet."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE FIRST QUARREL.

"And I have still more news for you, Sydney," said his wife on his return home; and she informed him of the unexpected visit of her relatives, and their proposals to become sponsors to her boy; and while speaking she narrowly watched the effect of her words; "our little friend, Edith, is to be the wife of Hubert Trevanion."

"By Jove! he is a lucky fellow!" was the reply of Elphinstone, as his cheek became flushed with genuine pleasure.

"Very;" pursued Ida; "that is, of course, should the marriage ever take place, which I confess appears improbable."

"Why so?" was the eager inquiry.

"Because," she continued; "if I am not greatly mistaken, my poor cousin's days are numbered."

"My dear Ida, what can have induced so fearful an apprehension?"

"The unnatural and settled flush upon his cheek, and the extraordinary brightness of his eyes. I am familar with the symptoms, Sydney. Hubert Trevanion is consumptive."

"Poor dear Edith!" murmured Elphinstone.

"You should rather, I think, say, poor dear Hubert!" exclaimed his wife, impatiently.

"And so I do, my love, I pity them both from my soul; but my instant sympathy for Edith grew out of the conviction of what my own feelings, would have been had I lost you under such circumstances, when my whole heart was full of joy and hope." And as he spoke, Elphinstone fondly drew his wife to his bosom, and pressed his lips to her cheek.

"Nonsense, Sydney;" she exclaimed, only half appeased; "you can not for one moment suppose that child to be capable of so engrossing an affection as you describe."

"You are greatly mistaken. I have, as you know, seen Edith alike in her grave and in her gay moments—I remember her as a mere girl, before there existed any necessity to conceal her real feelings, and then she was warm-hearted to impetuosity; I have studied her since, and even amid the trammels of what are considered, and perhaps justly so, the proprieties of society, I am convinced that there is a depth and intensity in her character, which no one who knew her less intimately than ourselves would even suspect, vailed as it is, beneath her mild and gentle manner."

"You are a profound student, Sydney."

Elphinstone laughed.

"In her case, perhaps I am;" he said; "for it has been to me a very interesting study."

"And a profitable one, no doubt."

"I hope so; for the contemplation of excellence can not fail to be profitable; and depend upon it, that the more insight you obtain into that girl's heart, the more you will love her."

"One love satisfies me."

"Traitor!" said Sydney playfully; "when not a day passes that you do not compel me to feel jealous of our boy."

"Jealous!" echoed Ida; "oh! Sydney, tell me the truth—are you, could you ever be jealous?"

"Not of you, dearest;" replied her husband, in a voice of the deepest tenderness: "not of you—I should hate myself were I capable of such a heresy; but still I confess to the egotism of murmuring against all and every thing which distracts your attention from myself. Come now, confess—have I not some reason to complain of that riotous urchin who has usurped all my rights? Does he not occupy almost every hour of your time?"

"But you have found other occupation, Sydney."

"You compelled me to it. I love the boy dearly—of that you need no assurance—but, were it not that he has your eyes and your smile, there are moments when I could almost wish that we were once more all in all to each other."

"And are we not so?" asked Ida, hastily.

"Yes and no: in heart no doubt we are: but, I repeat it, that boy has sadly encroached upon my privileges."

"Perhaps I have been to blame, Sydney; but still you will admit that while I have been engaged with our child, you have found, or created other pursuits in which you have, to all appearance, at least, taken very considerable interest."

"What could I do? You abandoned me to my own resources."

"Do not mistake me, love;" said Mrs. Elphinstone; "I am not speaking to blame you, I am only anxious to exonerate myself; and most certainly I should have been less independent in my own movements, had you not secured so charming a companion as Edith Malcolm."

"She is a sweet girl, that I am quite willing to admit;" conceded Sydney; "but still she is not my wife."

Ida bit her lip.

"Surely," she said; "that circumstance, at least, can be no drawback to your pleasure in her society."

"Certainly not; but you do not appear to understand me."

"Be under no apprehension of the sort;" replied Ida, with a forced laugh; "I am not so obtuse as you imagine. I think that I understand you perfectly. But really, Sydney, it has just occurred to me that, under existing circumstances, it might perhaps be as well if you were not for the future to engross quite so much of Edith's time and attention."

"What can you mean, Ida?"

"My meaning must be sufficiently obvious. As an engaged woman—"

"Nonsense! Is she not engaged to your own cousin?"

"So it would appear."

"Then it seems to me that 'existing circumstances' should rather tend to heighten than to decrease our intimacy."

"That may not, however, be the light in which Mr. Trevanion may regard it."

Elphinstone suddenly looked away from the glass before which he was somewhat fastidiously arranging his hair, and gazed steadfastly into the face of his wife:

"In that case," he said, with a gravity unusual to him, "it must have been unpleasant to yourself, or so strange an idea could never have entered your mind."

"My mind!" echoed Ida, with a constrained attempt at playfulness. "Oh, that is quite a different affair; it is only before marriage that people are supposed to resent the intrusion of a third person between them; and I am now an old married woman, who must be swayed by facts rather than feelings."

Sydney was silent; there was something in the tone of his wife's voice which, for the first time, jarred upon his ear.

"Surely," he said, at last; "you can not imagine—"

"Imagine nothing," interposed Mrs. Elphinstone; "I have not a particle of romance in my composition."

"If I supposed that you could for a moment think me capable—"

"My dear Sydney, you are really fighting against a shadow! You quite terrify me by your dark looks. What have I said or done to anger you?"

"Nothing, Ida, nothing; I am wounded, but not angry—I could not be angry with you; but I confess—"

"Confess nothing; it would appear that we have been exchanging words and not ideas; a mental gladiatorship is by no means desirable. What are your plans for the day?"

"I have formed none."

"Edith is anxious to go to the National Gallery; there is still time enough before dinner; will you accompany her?"

"No."

"No! are you serious?"

"Perfectly so."

"And what can be your reason?"

"I shall remain at home with you."

"My poor Sydney, you will be ennuyé à mort."

"Ida," said her husband, as he seated himself beside her, and took her hand in his, while large tears were swelling in his eyes. "There is something alike in your voice and manner which I endeavor in vain to comprehend. Since the hour in which you became my wife, the sole study of my life has been to secure your happiness. If I have failed, tell me at once the cause of that failure, that I may at least strive to repair it. Be frank; be sincere; I can support blame when I am conscious that it is merited; but let me at least understand the ground on which I stand."

"Have I uttered one word of blame?"

"You have not; but you have done worse; you have implied it. Have I deserved that you should treat me with this cold and bitter sarcasm? How am I to interpret either your manner or your words? Tell me plainly and at once in what I have offended you."

"Why should you suppose that I am offended?" asked Mrs. Elphinstone; "are you conscious of having given me cause of offense?"

"On my soul, I am not."

"Then the question is a strange one."

"Ida! Ida! you will drive me mad," he exclaimed, starting from the sofa; "I have not deserved this."

"Will you explain your meaning, Sydney?" asked his wife, calmly.

"I will—would that I were unable to do so, but I can not deceive myself—oh, Ida, that you, whom I have until this hour regarded as the most perfect of your sex—that you should indeed be guilty of such a weakness. But no, no; I wrong you—it can not be—you are too high-minded, too pure in heart, to wrong either that innocent girl or myself by so foul a suspicion; only tell me that it is I who ought to blush for even venturing to glance at such a thought—reproach me, upbraid me, Ida, for so vile a distrust of your generous nature—for so frightful a belief, transient as it was—only say that you forgive me, though I can not promise to forgive myself."

"Calm yourself, Sydney," said Mrs. Elphinstone, to whom the very intensity of her feelings gave an unnatural composure, which added to the emotion of her husband; "I have no reproach to utter—what I foresaw has come to pass; you placed too great a reliance on a mere transitory passion, and you are beginning to discover your error. I have long seen this—long felt it—but I was strong enough to suffer in silence; I am so still; I shall remain so until I feel that my suffering can avail me nothing, and that it has become my duty to assert myself.

"You have forced this avowal from me; or rather, perhaps, I have been led to make it from a sense of delicacy toward my cousin, who will probably be susceptible on the subject of his future wife."

"And who would dare to malign that pure young girl, who is as innocent as an angel?" asked Elphinstone, passionately.

"Her purity and innocence may be considered questionable, when it is known that she has alienated the affections of a husband from his wife," was the cold reply.

"Listen to me, Ida," exclaimed Sydney, with a vehemence that even startled his apparently impassive companion; "I could have borne all but this; my honor is at your mercy, trample on it if such is indeed your pleasure, but I will brook no slur on hers—she is the child of my mother's chosen friend, the playmate of my boyhood, the hope and pride of a widowed parent's heart; earth contains not a more blameless, a more guileless spirit. If you have decided on the ruin of our domestic peace, I must submit, but your insane suspicions must extend no further, touch not a hair of her head by calumny, but if you have indeed ceased to respect your own dignity, at least respect her innocence."

"Mr. Elphinstone," said his wife, indignantly; "you appear to forget that I am at your mercy."

"No, Ida, no; I forget nothing, and you may believe me when I declare that now you have learned to look upon me as the base and unmanly ruffian that your words imply, I rejoice from my inmost heart that you have so opportunely secured partial and powerful friends, who are able to offer you a more fitting home than that which you accuse me of having dishonored."

"Sydney," exclaimed his wife, "you are cruel even to cowardice; you do not even shrink from threatening me with a second desertion. Forgetting that for you I became an alien from my home, you presume upon my helplessness to insult me. Did I not tell you when you combated my reason with your specious sophistries, that you would one day remember that you had sacrificed yourself to a woman older than yourself? Did I not warn you against the folly of believing that you would not one day feel this, and visit the penalty of your mistake upon my weakness? Do me justice in this at least."

"Ida, do not urge me too far; you have no right, you have no reason to talk to me in such a strain as this."

"Enough! enough!" gasped out his wife; "you justify yourself by casting the blame on me, and I must submit. Be it so; there must be a victim—sacrifice me—as I before admitted, I am at your mercy. The world will be ready enough to exonerate you; there will be little sympathy, and less pity for the woman of six-and-twenty, who entrapped the affections of a boy."

"This is too much!" exclaimed Elphinstone, as he started from his seat, and rapidly paced the room; "all is indeed over between us—we must part. How I have loved you, none have known, none can ever know; I would have clung to you through life and death. You were every thing to me; the very air I breathed was not less essential to my happiness; but now—well, it is idle to repine; I am ready to pay the penalty of my mistake. You have withdrawn from me alike your confidence and your affection, and for both our sakes, it is better that we should part."

Ida suddenly clasped her forehead with her spread hands, and fastened a gaze of agony upon her husband.

"Is it so?" she asked in a whisper which fell upon the ear with all the shrillness of a suppressed scream; "is it really so? And could you indeed part from me so willingly? Sydney, Sydney, how have I deserved this?"

For a moment the whole frame of Elphinstone quivered, and he resolutely averted his eyes, but gradually the flush faded from his cheek, and the frown which had darkened his forehead passed away.

"No," he murmured, tremulously; "no; you are right; it would be the rending asunder of body and soul; and yet even that were better than we should live on under the same roof, the one suspected and despised, and the other—"

"What of the other, Sydney? What of the other?" passionately demanded his wife, springing from the sofa, and throwing herself upon his bosom; "Oh, Sydney, what of the other?"

"I can not, and must not dwell upon the subject," was the agitated reply; "I have fallen from such a height into an abyss so frightful that I want moral courage to probe my wretchedness to its actual depth."

"Yet you did love me, Sydney."

"Love you!" echoed her husband; "do you ask me if I loved you? look into your own heart, and read there if I have merited that such a question should be put to me! It is because I loved you so entirely, so devotedly, that I am at this moment incapable not only of deciding how I ought to act, but even of so acting, if my reason pointed out the proper and becoming course."

"And do you not love me still?"

"Ida, you have made me very, very wretched."

"And I? am I not also most miserable? Did I not for your sake abandon father, mother, home—and brave the comments of an unsparing world? And now you threaten to desert me—me, and my worse than orphaned boy. Oh, Sydney, Sydney, can you indeed do this?"

"Tell me, Ida, only tell me that this is a frightful dream," said Elphinstone, as he stood encircled by her clinging arms; "I can not, dare not think that I have really lost my every hope of happiness. Tell me that all about me is a delusion, a cheat of my disordered fancy."

"Nothing is real my own Sydney, nothing but my repentance. Do you not see my tears? do you not feel the throbbings of my heart? Shall I kneel to you for pardon?"

"Hush, Ida, hush!" said Elphinstone, hoarse with emotion; "I can bear no more. Let us strive to forget all that has just past; let us remember only our days of happiness, those days when there was trust and confidence between us; let us think only of our child, and for his sake endeavor to bear with each other's faults, and to repair our own. I have erred—unconsciously, indeed, but still I have erred, or the woman in whom I had centered all my earthly hopes, would not have accused me—the faults shall be repaired. I will state frankly to Lady Malcolm, that the constant intercourse between her daughter and myself has been a source of uneasiness to my wife, and that I consequently feel it to be my duty—"

"Sydney," exclaimed Ida, "do you wish to see me expire at your feet? would you make me a mark for the scorn and ridicule of an irritated mother? Oh, this is too—too much."

"In what other way can I convince you of my willingness to fulfill my share of the compact I have suggested?" demanded Elphinstone, with a dignity of manner which awed his excited and exhausted wife, who was sinking beneath the violence of long-suppressed and unconquerable emotion; "only name your wishes, and they shall be obeyed."

"Pity me—pardon me," broke in a low murmur from the lips of the wretched and self-tortured wife.

"I do both; and now listen, Ida." But he spoke to ears which were no longer conscious of his voice—her over-taxed energies would endure no more—and she had fainted.

To raise her nerveless form, fold her frantically to his bosom, and implore her to forgive him was the work of a moment to the unhappy Sydney; who, as he gazed upon her faultless face, now pale and cold as marble, and contemplated that "life in death" which is so fearful a counterfeit of actual dissolution, felt as though he were in very fact the murderer that he called himself.

Vainly did he press his fevered lips upon her cheek and brow, his caress remained without response; equally vain were his wild entreaties that she would look at him—speak to him. The closed eye and rigid mouth remained still—the very pulses of her heart had ceased to beat—and, at length, fairly maddened by his fear and his remorse, the poor young man sank down beside her, and buried his face amid the folds of her dress, as still and motionless as the slight form against which he leaned.

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE RECONCILIATION.

An hour passed away, yet Elphinstone neither spoke nor moved; but unlike that of his wife, who lay in a state of utter unconsciousness, his period of inaction was far from being one of rest.

An agony of spirit too intense for physical demonstration, crushed him to the very earth. His bodily energies were dormant, but his mental powers were painfully, bitterly active.

Like one in a hideous dream, he looked back upon the illusions of the past only to be scourged once more into suffering by the realities of the present; and what did that present now offer to his contemplation?

In the severity of his great and absorbing happiness, in the joy of loving, and feeling that he was beloved, he had willfully put from him all the uncertainties of the future; like the unwary traveler who, engrossed by the glorious landscape around him, forgets the sure progress of time, and finds himself suddenly benighted without refuge or shelter, he had sauntered on in the pleasant path which spread itself before him, without taking one precaution against the hour when it might become tangled and hard to tread; and thus he found himself unable to cope with the difficulties by which he was surrounded.

Had he been less devoted to his wife, all would have been comparatively easy, as, in the event of a reconciliation, he might have consoled himself under the miserable conviction of her weakness by once more courting the smiles of a world ever ready to bestow them upon the young and gifted who can bring appropriate incense to its shrine; or even—were this reconciliation impossible, it would still have been in his power to commence a new career, trammeled indeed by bitter memories, but still open to a sanguine and energetic nature. Now, however, it was far otherwise, for, young as he was, Sydney Elphinstone had staked his all of happiness on his love for Ida, and he loved her still, even in this hour of agony when he could not conceal from himself that she had forfeited a portion of his respect. He probed his heart unshrinkingly, but no accusing voice came from its depths—not a thought, not a wish, had wandered from her; and the blow fell with corresponding weight.

What was to be the end? what hope, what trust, could he ever again rest upon her affection after she had thus so cruelly misjudged him? He felt that henceforward he should be perpetually standing on the brink of a precipice down which he might be hurled at any moment, without having himself made one onward step. It was a harrowing reflection; he was as yet only on the threshold of manhood; he had barely entered his twenty-second year; and already he had experienced one of the most bitter trials of life.

Hot tears flooded his heart, and stagnated there—his burning eyeballs were dry. He had become an object of suspicion to the woman whom he would himself have trusted even to the death. True, she had evidently repented her ungenerous want of confidence, while it was equally certain that she still loved him—there was no mistaking the cry of anguish with which she had thrown herself upon his bosom; but what, to such a nature as his, was love without faith? Nothing; less than nothing: a perpetual mockery which must wear away not only her existence, but his own also.

There could be no return of the halcyon days when heart met heart without misgiving; henceforward, every word and action must be weighed, and a never-ceasing restraint, like a mortal coat of mail, never to be put off, must exist between them.

Not once, during his long and painful vigil, had it occurred to Elphinstone to summon assistance. The dead silence which had succeeded to the storm of passion appeared so natural a consequence of the previous excitement, that he continued helplessly engrossed by his own miserable thoughts, until a deep sigh from Ida recalled him to a sense of her situation. Slowly, then, and with a sigh whose intensity formed a fitting echo to her own, he rose from his knees, and pillowing her head upon his shoulder, deluged her pale face with an essence which he found upon her table.

His hand shook, and his lip quivered, as he looked upon her, so lovely and so helpless in her unconsciousness; and when, as he almost frantically pressed a kiss upon her forehead, she at length opened her eyes with a wild and inquiring expression, a convulsive sob which he could not repress, replied to the appeal.

"Ha!" murmured Ida, as she swept her hand across her brow, "now I remember all—all—but you will not abandon me, Sydney? you will not make our child fatherless?"

"Be calm, Ida, be calm," he answered in a voice so changed that it sounded strange even to his own ears; "have we not already decided that we must endeavor to forget the past? Let us fulfill the pledge. I have lived too long for myself; for the past I will substitute the future. There are duties hitherto neglected, which henceforth shall be performed: indulgences which henceforth shall be abandoned; you shall have no further cause of complaint against me."

"Sydney, what mean you?"

"I will no longer be a mere man of pleasure, forgetting all my home-happiness, the responsibilities which have devolved upon me. I will at last be strong and earnest; I have work before me—it shall be accomplished; hitherto, in the egotism of a false and unworthy pride, I have shrunk from suing for the help of others to aid me on my onward path; now I will shrink no longer; but boldly put from me the weak shame of soliciting what I can not command. My day of sloth is at an end, and that of labor shall commence in earnest. When you know that I am toiling for you and for our boy, you will learn to trust me."

"Oh, speak less coldly—I can not bear it."

"Poor girl!" said Elphinstone, "we must both strive to bear our burden. I am not cold, but I have aged two years within the last two hours, and I must seek to profit by the experience so dearly bought. Rouse yourself, Ida; the realities of life have come upon us—suddenly and harshly, it is true—but they have come, and we must face them bravely. We have dreamed a glorious dream, but let us not embitter the awakening by useless repinings for the past."

"And is this all? Have you, indeed, cast me from your heart forever?"

"No, Ida, no; while it beats, it must beat for you. But we can no longer deceive ourselves; a gulf has yawned between us in which the dearest of our mutual illusions have gone down—your faith in me—my trust in your confiding affection. It is a sad truth, but we can not conceal it from ourselves; let us, therefore, rather mourn over it together: it will be another bond of sympathy between us."

"Sydney, my heart is breaking!" gasped his wife.

"Rest it upon mine," was the reply, as he drew her closer to him, and folded her in his arms. "We can still love each other, Ida—let that be our consolation."

"But if I solemnly vow never again to doubt you—"

"Strive, for both our sakes, to place what trust in me you can, but make no vow—it would be at once idle and impotent."

Mrs. Elphinstone sank back upon the sofa convulsed with agony. She no longer recognized her husband: the idolizing lover had been transformed, as if by some occult magic, into the stern and moralizing mentor: his heart was still hers, but his reason had condemned her.

All around her was a blank waste—she felt as if she could have shrieked out in her anguish, while she had not even power to stay the large cold tears which were chasing each other down her cheeks.

Sydney, meanwhile, sat with his head buried in his hands—he was still dizzy from the effects of his sudden wretchedness, and thus they both remained for a time, silent and motionless.

Suddenly Ida arose from her recumbent position, and sprang to the bell.

"Bring me my child," she said to the servant who obeyed the summons; and in an instant he was in her arms.

"Sydney," she murmured, as she sank on her knees before him, and held toward him the unconscious infant, laughing, and struggling to reach its father; "pardon me, and trust me for his sake."

Elphinstone looked up; a wild burst of grief shook him as with an ague fit; he strove to speak, but his words were inaudible; yet Ida was satisfied; the infant was clinging to his bosom; her own head rested upon his knee; and she felt his hot tears rain down upon her hair. He did not attempt to raise her from the ground; he was evidently unconscious of the lowly posture in which she had sued for forgiveness; his moral strength was spent that last agonizing cry came from the mother of his child, and his heart had melted within him.

How could he doubt her at that moment, when the soft little hand of his firstborn was pressed against his cheek? He did not; he was incapable of following up the train of thought by which he had just been oppressed, his sense of wrong had spent itself; he could only yearn for peace, and rest.

"My own best love!" he at length faltered out; "come to my heart, Ida; let me hold you there together."

With a wild gasp his wife flung herself upon his neck; and both believed as they clung together in that close embrace that they were once more happy beyond the reach of fate. Alas! that those clinging arms should ever relax—that the blessed oblivion of that moment should ever yield to the memories of the past, and the threatenings of the future! The eastern traveler, after thirsting and panting in the desert, indulges in the same fallacy, as he reaches the green oasis, casts himself down under the sheltering trees, and laves his parched throat with the sparkling water; he forgets the weary waste of sand behind him; he casts no anxious glance over the arid wilderness before him; the present is for the moment all in all; but still the fact remains unchanged, that on the tract which he had passed he has left time, and strength, and energy; and on that which he has still to pursue, the same, and perhaps greater perils, await him.

Yet both body and mind may well seek rest in these halting-places of life and travel, for without them, few could survive the journey.

And there were peace and love once more in that modest cottage; fond endearments, and gentle words, and looks more eloquent than words; the leafy boughs still afforded their grateful shade; the limpid water still touched their lips refreshingly, the grass was green beneath their feet, the heavens blue above their heads—and the desert lay afar off in the distance.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE TEMPTER.

On the following morning, true to the resolve which he had made to himself, Elphinstone proceeded early to the Temple; where, in default of any more active professional occupation, he passed several hours in close and earnest study, and resolutely flung from him the languor consequent upon the excitement which he had undergone on the previous day.

Occasionally, sad thoughts, and even forebodings, forced themselves upon him, but suffering had made him strong, and he would not yield to that yearning for mental repose which would have rendered him unable to pursue his task.

With Ida, however, it was far otherwise. Her husband had for months past been constantly at home, and she had become so habituated to his presence, that, had she even been free from every other cause of suffering, her solitude would of itself have been irksome to her. As it was, therefore, it became after a time, almost unendurable.

She had whiled away the early hours of the morning with her infant, but at length he slept, and she had no resource save her own thoughts, when, after having seated herself at the instrument, and discovered that her irritated nerves could not support the sound of music; turned to her easel, and found that her unsteady fingers failed in their accustomed skill; and thrown aside a book over which her eyes wandered mechanically, without taking in its sense; she at last threw herself hopelessly into a chair, and abandoned all further attempt at occupation.

For awhile she could not collect her ideas; all seemed vague and dream-like: her husband's sudden assumption of authority; her own submission; all appeared unnatural and impossible; but gradually the mental mist was swept away, and she recalled with a distinctness that made her pulses throb, and her brow burn with emotion, every look and word which had passed between them.

Silently she sat, with clasped hands so tightly clinched together, that the tips of her fingers were bloodless from the pressure. The first question that she had put to her own heart had been—How could I doubt him? How had he deserved that I should so wrong his frank and noble nature? And, under this first impulse, bitterly did she condemn herself; but as time wore on, the busy fiend for whom she had so long made a home within her bosom, began once more to struggle into life; her jealousy had been crushed by fear, not annihilated by conviction.

She remembered that Sydney had upbraided her for a suspicion which he had denounced as impure and unwomanly, and that he had even volunteered to forego the society of Lady Malcolm and her daughter; but she also recalled the fact to mind that, while blaming her, he had been enthusiastic in his praise of Edith; and that he had not once striven to exculpate himself: that he had been indignant, but not explanatory; loud in deprecation of her own conduct, but silent with regard to his own personal feelings.

Was this fair? was this manly? were her next mental queries; and the inward demon murmured—no—you were borne down by words; you were overwhelmed but not convinced; and yet you were weak enough to yield to mere idle declamation—the declamation of a boy, proud in his sense of power, and wielding his pigmy bow with as much importance as though he were, like Sagittarius, about to bring down a constellation at every shot, when, in point of fact, he was only firing into the void. Were you required to make your own heart, which he had already wounded, a target for his weapon? It would have been time enough to have played the submissive wife when he had justified himself in your eyes—but what proof had you?—what proof did he offer to you that you had wronged him? None—he reproached and threatened, while you wept and sued; and what have you gained? Conviction? Peace of mind?—And with a shuddering sigh, Ida answered—"neither—I am not convinced—I am not at peace."

And still her child slept on!

"Delightful!" exclaimed a cheerful voice, as the drawing-room door opened, and the full-plumed bonnet and searching eyes of Mrs. Darnell appeared, glancing and fluttering their way toward Ida; "Mrs. Elphinstone not only at home, but also alone! How pleased I am that I made my first visit here. The Doctor told me that I should weary you with my company if I called too often; but men understand these matters so badly that I was determined to persist. Only say that you are glad to see me."

"I am very glad to see you;" said her hostess extending her hand, and, by a violent effort, arousing herself from her abstraction; "and duly appreciate your kindness in wasting your time upon a recluse, when you must have so many more agreeable engagements."

"Recluse, indeed, my dear young lady; but why should it be so? with your beauty and your talents, you could always command society."

"I care little now for what is called the world;" was the reply; "I have tried it, and found it alike hollow and heartless."

"We have all done that in our turn;" said the visitor, with as much sententiousness as she could contrive to throw into her tone and manner; "but we can at least pay it back in its own currency. The world amuses me; it has amused me all my life; and I am contented to make use of it in its own way."

"You are a practical philosopher," said Ida, with a smile.

"Now, that is so like one of the Doctor's remarks!" exclaimed the voluble little lady, settling herself upon the chair. "He is always telling me that I am this, that, or the other, of which I have not the most remote idea myself."

"In your modesty;" said Ida, with a gleam of her old humor; "you are then, probably, like Molière's gentleman, who had talked prose all his life without being aware of it."

"Very likely; at all events, I know that it is very pleasant to talk with you—particularly when you are alone—for I have taken an immense fancy to you, and am glad to have you for once all to myself."

"I can not but feel greatly flattered," replied her hostess; "and only regret that I shall prove a sorry companion to-day, as I am suffering severely from nervous headache."

"A nasty complaint," said Mrs. Darnell; "a very nasty complaint. Do let me be professional, and recommend camphor julep, or, better still, fresh air and exercise. You are too much in the house, Mrs. Elphinstone."

"Perhaps I am; but I am ashamed to confess that I have not courage to walk alone."

"Of course not; it would be highly incorrect for you to do so; but there is your husband, who must only be too delighted to show himself with a beautiful woman upon his arm. All men like it; it flatters their vanity."

"Mr. Elphinstone is engaged at the Temple."

"Not always: I have frequently seen him walking with Miss Malcolm."

Ida's cheek flushed slightly, but she controled herself. "He was an idle man at that time," she said, quietly, "but now he is about to devote himself to his profession."

"All very proper, no doubt; I have not a word to say on the subject; it is only a pity you did not profit by his period of idleness to lay in a stock of health."

"I was a nurse all that time, and could not leave my boy."

"My dear Mrs. Elphinstone," said the little woman, demurely, "let me hope that you will not fall into the same error as many young mothers, and by devoting yourself too much to your infant, allow your husband to perceive that he can do without you: it is a lesson that men soon learn, and never forget. At this very moment I could really find it in my heart to be seriously angry with you, for not going at least a short distance to meet Mr. Elphinstone, instead of allowing Miss Malcolm to do so."

"What can you mean, my dear Mrs. Darnell?"

"Mean!" echoed the lady; "what can I mean, but that I passed them on the road as I came here; and that I consider that I am only doing my duty by proving to you that you should be more cautious."

"I am sure you are very kind"—gasped Ida.

"I am sure that I wish to be so," was the ready reply; and you young creatures all require the assistance of older and wiser heads than your own. 'Experience makes fools wise,' says the proverb; and you must have time before you can gain experience."

"It appears to me, nevertheless, that some experience is forced upon us very rapidly."

"No doubt of it, but is it worth much? Does it make you happier or better?"

"Neither, I fear."

"Of course not; that is quite a different sort of thing. The experience that I mean—"

Mrs. Darnell paused; if she really did not know what she meant, she was certainly unable to express it; and after an instant's silence, she resumed abruptly:

"Now, as an example of what I want you to understand—suppose, for instance, you had occasionally waived your duties as a mother to fulfill those of a wife, do you not see at once that you would have been more necessary to your husband, and not have thrown him so constantly into the society of that pretty girl, Miss Malcolm? Very dangerous, very dangerous, indeed, my dear lady; for men will be men; and although you are so much handsomer than your young friend, you ought to remember that she is not his wife, and that there is always a charm in novelty."

"She is not my friend," said Ida, bitterly; "Lady Malcolm and Mr. Elphinstone's mother were greatly attached; and as a natural consequence—"

"Yes, yes; I perfectly comprehend—" said the visitor, with a sagacious nod; "the old family affection has created a sort of cousinship, which is all very well when not carried too far; but really I have seen so much trouble brought about by sentimental attachments of that kind, that I feel it more than ever my duty to warn you to be upon your guard. Mr. Elphinstone is a charming young man, but still he is very young, and can not be expected to calculate the consequences of any little indiscretion into which he may be led by a warm heart and high spirits. I have, as I said before, taken a great fancy to you, and therefore I venture to be frank; they say, you know, that 'lookers on see most of the game.'"

"And what have you seen?" asked Ida, struggling to retain her composure.

"Little as yet, very little, I confess," was the unsatisfactory reply; "but then you must remember that I have only recently made your acquaintance."

"But something you must have seen," persevered Mrs. Elphinstone, "or you would not have considered it necessary to urge me to greater prudence."

"These affairs require delicate handling," said Mrs. Darnell, with a complacency which betrayed her perfect confidence in her own skill and tact; "a look or a word may mean so much or so little; and as my only aim is to tranquilize your mind, and to impress upon you your responsibilities as a wife, I can not, of course, wish to make you see with my eyes, or understand with my understanding. All that I shall venture to say, therefore, is this—do not encourage the intimacy between your husband and Miss Malcolm too far."

How, had her visitor exhibited an equal amount of low breeding and want of charity upon any other subject, would the high-minded Ida have loathed and despised her. How soon would she have silenced the busy tongue which sported so glibly with the holiest and most sacred feelings of others. How indignantly would she have rejected the companionship of a vulgar gossip, whose prying eyes saw deep into the darkest corners of a quiet home, and peopled the void with phantoms!

Now, however, it was far otherwise; and Mrs. Darnell was not more convinced of the kindness and sagacity of her own proceedings than was her unhappy listener.

"You may be right," she said, after a moment's silence; "it may have been imprudent on my part to permit so close an intimacy between the two families, but it is only just to Mr. Elphinstone to tell you, that he voluntarily offered to put an end to it, should such be my wish."

"Poor thing!" almost whispered her companion, as an expression of very sincere regret settled upon her usually joyous face. "Has it already come to that? I am sorry to hear it—very sorry—for that was precisely what I was anxious to prevent. I did hope to open your eyes before your husband could suspect that he had given you one uneasy thought. All might have been so easily arranged in some way or other; it is a sad disappointment to me to find that the subject has been broached between you."

"You can not regret it more than I do," said Ida, gloomily; "I am sorry to have been so rash, but in an unguarded moment—"

"I can quite understand you, quite; but it is to be deplored that you were so far excited as to lose your self-command; for I know well by experience how these things end: let the wife be as perfect as she may, she must give way at last, so that, by attempting to protect and justify herself, she only loses ground."

"Which she may, perhaps, never regain," murmured Mrs. Elphinstone, rather speaking to herself than addressing her companion.

"A very rational remark, my dear young lady," said Mrs. Darnell, approvingly; "and one which gives me a great respect for your understanding: my late grandmother, who was a very superior woman, never took leave of a bride without saying to her: 'You will be the idol of a month, but only a wife for the rest of your days; remember this; and, above all else, beware of the first quarrel—quarrel as much as you please afterward, but beware of the first time, for rest assured, that although both may forgive, neither will forget!' She gave the same warning to scores of young women in her time; and I am really very, very sorry that I was not able to do the same kind office for you before it was too late."

Ida made no reply; a weight had fallen upon her heart, and rested there like an incubus.

"However," resumed the pertinacious visitor who had not penetration to discover that she had stretched her listener upon a moral rack which strained and tore every fiber of her spirit: "we will hope better things for you. Mr. Elphinstone is, as I before remarked, so very young, and you are so very beautiful, that no doubt all will come right in time. Only, I entreat of you, take my advice; profit by his offer, and get rid of that very dangerous young lady.

"I have had an unpleasant task to perform, but the extraordinary interest which I feel for you rendered it a duty, according to my ideas of Christian charity and sisterly love. It would have been better, certainly, if Lady Malcolm had spared me so ungracious an office, as she most decidedly would have done had she displayed proper prudence; but I care little for my own feelings when I can relieve those of others.

"Look upon me, therefore, my dear Mrs. Elphinstone, as a warm and sincere friend, confide in me, and make use of me without ceremony or scruple, whenever I can be of service to you; for, as the doctor truly says, I am never so happy as when I am mixed up with the troubles and trials of others. And now, that I flatter myself I have comforted and soothed you, I will leave you to reflect upon our conversation. I need not say that I will soon see you again."

There was a flutter of gauzé and feathers, a rustling of silk and velvet, a clasping of hands, an exchange of courteous words, and Mrs. Darnell disappeared. She paused for a moment in the hall to desire the maid, who attended her to the door, to be very, very careful of her poor mistress; and then the sound of her carriage-wheels died away in the distance; and still Ida stood erect and rigid on the spot where they had parted.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

A STORM CLOUD.

DESPITE the fond embrace with which he had parted from his wife, Elphinstone could not conceal from himself, as he at length closed his books and left the Temple, that his home had ceased to be to him the haven of peace and love which it had once been.

All his most cherished associations had suddenly been shivered about him, and it was in vain that he strove to restore the fragments into a perfect whole: the shock was still too recent: the blow had been at once too heavy and too abrupt.

His sense of delicacy revolted at the recollection that Ida, who had even until the previous day been to him an object of worship, should suddenly have become a suppliant for pity and for pardon; and that the confidence which he had placed in her affection should have been so cruelly requited; his love for her continued unimpaired, but with it came a new and unwelcome feeling, that robbed it of half its charm

Unconsciously his step grew languid, and he lingered on his way as he had never hitherto done after an absence of so many hours from his beautiful and gifted wife. What security had he that even in that comparatively short space of time, she might not have encouraged new doubts, as wild and baseless as those which had already caused him so much misery?

The Malcolms, too—how could he ever again meet them as he had hitherto done, conscious that every look and word must be weighed and measured, and even then, perhaps, adduced as evidence against him?

Poor Sydney, with his impulsive temperament and frank-heartedness, he keenly felt how difficult a task lay before him; and, had he not been restrained by his promise to Ida, he would at once have confided to Lady Malcolm the embarrassing nature of his position, and left it to her more matured judgment to discover some mode of escape for both parties; but Ida had shrunk from exposing her weakness to the mother of Edith, and he resolved to respect her dignity with as much jealousy as herself. Thus he had no resource save in his own moral courage, and bitter was the reflection that it should be first called into action to secure the tranquillity of his own hearth.

Such were the musings of the young husband as he slowly proceeded on his homeward path, a path which, for the first time, he felt to be irksome; nor could he conceal from himself that it was actually a relief to him when he encountered Lady Malcolm and her daughter, who were taking their accustomed walk, and to whom he felt compelled to offer his protection. The meeting, even trammeled as it was by a consciousness of the annoyance which Ida would feel could she be aware of the accident, was of service to him, as it served to direct his thoughts from his own trials, and to give them another direction.

Soothed by the calm good sense of his mother's friend, and enlivened by the gentle gayety of her daughter, the moments passed swiftly and pleasantly; nor was it until he parted with the ladies at their own gate, that he was startled by the recollection that there no longer remained the time necessary for the walk which he had proposed to his wife as he left her, and for which she had promised to prepare herself against his return. Never before had he failed in any appointment involving her gratification, and at what a moment and in what a manner had he done so now! He actually trembled with eagerness as he reached his own door, and anticipated the merited reproach with which she would probably receive him on his return.

Herein, however, he instantly discovered that he had deceived himself. As he entered the room, Mrs. Elphinstone was seated at the piano, from which she instantly rose with a smile to greet him.

"Will you forgive me, my love," he asked; "for not having fulfilled my promise to return at an earlier hour than this? I am really quite distressed to be so late, but I have been detained"

"Are you late?" asked Ida in her turn, affecting to consult the little French timepiece; "oh, no; we shall not dine for an hour yet, so that you have more time than you will require for your toilet.

"But the walk upon which we had decided?"

"Ah, true;" she replied in the same accent of calm indifference in which she had first spoken; "I remember now, that we did talk of a country ramble; but, as you see, I had forgotten it, and had consequently made no preparation."

Sydney was deeply hurt, and his countenance betrayed it; but Mrs. Elphinstone was carefully collecting her music, and did not, or would not, seem to remark his annoyance.

"Your forgetfulness can not, however, exonerate me—" he commenced, struggling to assume as much composure as herself.

"Oh, not a word more, my dear Sydney," she interposed, "upon so unimportant a subject. I feel convinced that you were more usefully occupied; and although I can not boast of having passed my time as profitably as yourself, I have at least spent it very pleasantly."

"Are you, then, becoming so much enamored of solitude, Ida?"

"By no means," was the quick rejoinder, "nor have I been solitary; on the contrary, Mrs. Darnell paid me a very long, and a very kind visit, for which I feel greatly indebted to her."

"Mrs. Darnell!" echoed Elphinstone, emphatically. "It is impossible that you could derive any pleasure from the society of that trifling, mindless woman."

"You are quite in error, I assure you, Sydney, I have a decided engouement for Mrs. Darnell; and, more than that, I have also a great respect for her. She is so frank and warm-hearted, and, moreover, possessed of such admirable judgment, that I consider her friendship to be a valuable acquisition to one so inexperienced in the duties and privileges of a wife as myself."

"Ida! I had no idea that you could be so sarcastic."

"I intended no sarcasm. I have simply expressed my conviction of her character," said his wife, firmly, "and surely you must be happy to find that such a friend is willing to enliven the hours rendered dreary by your absence."

"I should, indeed, be so," rejoined Elphinstone, "could I enter into your feelings toward her; but the expression of such an opinion from you, has, I confess, astonished me not a little."

"You perhaps think her too old to be agreeable," replied Ida, dryly.

"Too old?" echoed Sydney; "you do me injustice. It depends on women themselves to be agreeable at any age. They have it in their power to be charming at every season, like the roses of the Philippine Islands, which are white at sunrise, pink at noon, and crimson at twilight; changeful it may be, but charming in every change."

"Who is sarcastic now?" asked Mrs. Elphinstone.

"Certainly not I," laughed her husband, "and I think you must at least be compelled to admit that I have treated your new friend very poetically."

"But you dislike her?"

"I confess that I do not admire her general deportment, and that I have rather a mean opinion of her understanding."

"You do her injustice," said Ida, with a flashing eye; "she is a shrewd and clear-sighted woman, who only requires to be known in order to be appreciated."

"Now, how on earth, my dear girl," asked Sydney, "have you been able to make so extraordinary a discovery? what can Mrs. Darnell have said or done to establish her fussy little self so firmly in your affections?"

"She has taken a sincere interest in me, and is anxious to contribute to my happiness."

"She is too kind," replied Elphinstone, in a grieved accent, "but I trust that your happiness does not depend on her very supererogatory aid and support. You already possessed a friend equally anxious to render you every service in her power, and one who would, I should have thought, have been infinitely more congenial to so refined a nature as your own, in Lady Malcolm."

"Comparisons are invidious, my dear Sydney."

"Neither do I seek to institute a comparison between two women who are the antipodes of each other," was the impatient rejoinder, "and you must forgive me if I frankly confess at once that to me the vulgar-minded wife of Dr. Darnell is positively insufferable."

"What can you have to fear from my friendship with the poor lady, who has so unconsciously inspired your dislike?"

"Fear! nothing assuredly for myself; but I feel disappointed that you should find pleasure in the society of a woman to whom I am satisfied that you would not have accorded a second glance before you became my wife."

"Perhaps not," said Ida, with an ambiguous smile, "for, at that period, although I lived in what is emphatically called 'the world,' I had never looked below its surface, and was consequently only one of the bubbles that floated down the tide, without comprehending what lay beneath; now, however, when I have to struggle against the current, I must learn to turn my gaze from the sunshine that gleams above to the impediments which may possibly impede my progress—the rocks and shoals that are hidden in the depths of the stream."

"And has such a struggle really commenced for you Ida?"

"Certainly, my dear Sydney; am I not a wife and a mother? Are not our prospects uncertain? Our resources rapidly diminishing?"

"True," said Elphinstone, gloomily, "true; your trials have indeed commenced, and if you conceive that they can be lessened by other sympathy than my own, you have every right to try the experiment."

Ida made no reply, but after having, with great apparent care, smoothed the dark bands of hair which fell low upon her cheeks, before the mirror, she turned toward the book-case, and with the same affectation of fastidiousness, selected a volume, with which she established herself upon the sofa, apparently forgetful of her husband's presence.

Elphinstone was bewildered, and as he paced slowly to and fro, he asked himself in vain what could be the meaning of his wife's extraordinary manner. Suddenly he stopped immediately in front of her, and gazed inquiringly into her face, but she read on calmly, with a smile playing about her lips, as though pleasantly engrossed by the book in which she was occupied.

At this moment the servant announced dinner.

"Already!" exclaimed Sydney; "and I have not even changed my dress. Will you excuse me for five minutes, Ida?"

"For any time you please; there is no hurry in the world;" replied his wife, without raising her eyes from the volume.

After another long look, which remained unnoticed like the last, Elphinstone, hurriedly left the room. As he did so, the book fell from his wife's hand to the floor, her eyes were strained in the direction where he had disappeared, and her trembling lips became livid. It was evident that she struggled fiercely to control the violence of the emotion which shook her whole frame to agony; but she did control it; not a tear moistened the quivering eyelids, not a sigh escaped the overcharged breast; all was still, strong endurance; the shaft hurled by the idle hand of Mrs. Darnell, had struck home, and the iron which rankled in the wound was crushed back as resolutely as the Spartan boy crushed back the living death that he carried in his bosom.

Already? while the kiss of reconciliation was yet warm upon her lips—while the words of promise and of hope were still sounding in her ears.—Already had Sydney again sought the society of the woman whom she feared and hated; and forgotten his pledge to her. A low bitter laugh escaped her once, and once only; nor did she stir a limb until aroused by the hasty step of her husband as he crossed the hall. Then she stooped, picked up the volume that lay at her feet, and, resuming the attitude in which he had left her, was once more, to all appearance, absorbed as before.

"Are you ready, Ida?" asked Elphinstone, as he paused at the door.

"Quite;" she replied, rising with alacrity and moving toward him.

The young man's heart throbbed painfully. Could he have mistaken her? Had the book which she had persisted so pertinaciously in reading, really so much interested her that it had caused her to overlook his want of punctuality, and even rendered her for the moment independent of his society? It must be so; and he had been doing battle with a shadow.

Strong in this conviction, she had no sooner reached his side than he took her hand, but it was instantly withdrawn.

"What can this mean?" he asked; "have I again offended you, Ida?"

"Oh, no;" was the reply, as by a violent effort she recovered her self-possession; "why should you suppose so?"

"Because you would not suffer me to take you hand."

"It is unnecessary;" she said, quietly; "the distance is not great."

"True;" acquiesced Elphinstone as he followed her to the dining-room, thankful that the presence of the servant must for a time at least avert the storm which he saw was once more gathering around him.

The dinner passed almost in silence, and as the wondering attendant quietly performed her duties, Sydney felt the very air oppressive, so heavily did the singular demeanor of his wife weigh upon his spirit; nor was it until they were again alone that he could rally sufficiently to make any attempt at conversation; while even then the calm pale face of Ida actually awed him.

"You appear to have been singularly interested in your book to-day," he said at length. "May I inquire what it was?"

"I really do not recollect:" was the reply; "it lies yonder; perhaps you may like to read it."

"Not at present, I would rather converse with you."

"I shall be but a poor companion. My head aches horribly."

"I feared as much;" said Elphinstone, eagerly, endeavoring to delude himself into the belief that he had now found the true solution of the enigma; "I felt sure that something was wrong. You are very pale, love; shall I send for Dr. Darnell?"

"Oh no, no;" exclaimed Mrs. Elphinstone; "I will apply a better remedy," and laying her hand on the bell, she desired the servant by whom it was answered, to beg Lady Malcolm and her daughter to do her the favor to take their coffee with herself and Mr. Elphinstone.

"My dear Ida;" said her husband, as the attendant withdrew; "would not a perfectly quiet evening have been more beneficial in your present state than even the society of your friends?"

"Perhaps so, as regards myself;" was the cold reply; "but I am not selfish enough to sacrifice your gratification to my own—and it will, I should imagine, be pleasant to both Miss Malcolm and yourself to talk over your morning's walk. They will no doubt be here in a few minutes, and meanwhile, I will go and ascertain if Hubert is asleep."

As she ceased speaking, she rose and left the room, while her husband, who instantly comprehended the whole extent of the new difficulty in which he had so innocently involved himself, remained motionless with surprise and mortification.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

ESTRANGEMENT.

From the evening recorded in the last chapter, no allusion was ever again made by Mrs. Elphinstone to her husband's implied admiration of Miss Malcolm, but he too well comprehended the nature of his wife to imagine for an instant that she any longer placed the slightest confidence in his affection; and while he could have taken her to his heart, and wept over her pale cheek, and the rapid attenuation of her still graceful, but now fearfully fragile form, and poured forth all the agony of his soul at her mistrust, he shrank from the slightest demonstration, lest the appeal which he would fain have made to her reason should only lead to a renewal of the bitter scenes through which they had already passed.

And thus they lived on; Sydney smothering his better feelings, and sacrificing his innate sense of dignity, to that morbid love of ease which formed so prominent a feature in his generous but weak nature; and Ida gnawing away her own heart in silence, conscious that when the moment of conviction came, the lava-flood of her indignation must carry ruin with it.

Elphinstone chafed under an injustice as baseless as it was unworthy; while his wife, misled by her own wretched suspicions, and confirmed in her error by the inane consolation and advice of a mindless and ill-judging acquaintance, never for an instant suffered herself to doubt that she had become the victim of his inconstancy.

Thus, in order to escape from a thralldom which was hateful to him, the young husband, who, at the commencement of his married life, had looked upon his chambers in the Temple as exile, because they involved an occasional and brief separation from the object of his idolatry, soon learned to feel that his most genial home was there—there, where no cold but ever-watchful eye noted his every movement; where no quick but apparently careless ear drank in his every word; and where no diseased and distorted imagination converted even his most inconsequent actions into matters of moment, pregnant with inquiry and meaning.

The ready smile and unquestionable docility of his wife wounded him to the quick, for they were no longer the assurances of affection and devotedness; the smile was hollow, and the docility overacted and unnatural; there was no longer any communion of spirit between them; Ida was a mere human automaton, answering to every spring at his pleasure, but originating no movement of her own.

To his anxious inquiries regarding her health, he always received the same stereotyped reply—she was quite well—quite—could not desire to be better; to his attentions she resigned herself passively, as though this resignation were a part of her wifely duty. Nor did she, on her side, neglect to exhibit toward Sydney all those minor courtesies which are so dear and grateful to the heart when they are the spontaneous growth of mutual affection; but this was rather from an impulse of high breeding than from a genuine desire to increase his happiness; and Elphinstone was not slow to see and feel the painful truth.

There was no pleading now for another hour when her husband, immediately after breakfast, day by day, lingered for a moment in the hall to caress his boy ere he caught up his hat and gloves, and with a hasty kiss upon her brow, hurried off to town; no inquiry as to the probable hour of his return; nothing but a calm and unquestioning submission to his will, an apparent indifference to his movements, which had gradually built up a wall of ice between them, that sent its bitter chill to the hearts of both.

Scarcely, however, had Sydney disappeared, and her child been placed in her arms, than Ida passionately pressed her lips upon the rosy little cheek still flushed from the pressure of her husband's kiss; while hot tears, long and painfully suppressed, streamed down her face, and fell into her bosom. She had ceased to trust, but she still loved him with the whole vehemence of her ungoverned nature.

Poor Ida! with all the elements of happiness within her reach, she was hopelessly, irremediably wretched. Her capricious inconsistencies, her wayward fits of temper, had seriously alienated the affection of Lady Malcolm, who had, moreover, resolutely refused to expose her daughter to a constant companionship with Mrs. Darnell, to whose mind and manners she alike objected; nor had she failed to impress upon Ida the inexpediency of encouraging her visits. The advice was, however, at once rejected, as the ill-fated woman instantly attributed to her right-minded and well-judging friend a motive totally foreign to the real one, and felt a bitter pleasure in disregarding her advice.

Still for Sydney's sake, Lady Malcolm resolutely supported the occasional annoyances to which she was exposed through the waywardness of his wife; nor was it long ere she discovered that Mrs. Elphinstone had some hidden sorrow, and then the warm stream of her woman-heart welled up, and she forgot her own feelings in her anxious endeavor to soothe those of Ida.

Vain, however, was the attempt; her inferences were disdainfully denied; how, she was asked, could the wife of Sydney Elphinstone—the wife who had abandoned every thing for his sake, and to whom his affection was all in all—be otherwise than happy, most happy?

"Were you indeed aware that he had ceased to love me," she pursued with a kindling eye; "you might suspect that I was the victim of a hidden grief; but now—"

"You misconceive me, my dear Mrs. Elphinstone," replied her companion, mildly; "I have had so sad an experience of the world, that I too well know how possible it is to have a sorrow totally unconnected with home and home-affections. Did I dare to do so, I believe that I could point to the cause of your evident depression."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Ida, scornfully.

"Yes, indeed," pursued Lady Malcolm; "can you imagine that I have never reflected upon the suffering with which you must dwell upon the estrangement from your parents? Surely not; and from the bottom of my heart I pity you. Have courage, my dear young friend: remember that there is a silver lining to every cloud; your father must have loved you deeply; have regarded you with pride as well as affection; and rest assured that when once the wound which you have inflicted upon his ambition has had time to heal, his heart will yearn toward you with a tenderness which he will not seek to control."

"I can only pray that your propheey may be fulfilled before I have ceased to feel an interest in any thing," said Mrs. Elphinstone, moodily, "for Hubert's sake I will hope, even when I cease to do so for myself."

"In that case judge of your father's heart by your own," replied her persevering comforter; "and do I entreat of you, struggle against a depression which is evidently undermining your health. I can see that Sydney is wretched about you."

"Sydney wretched about me!" echoed Ida, with a forced laugh; "I do not think that Sydney was ever more happy in his life. During the first few months of our marriage he was my devoted slave, poor fellow! obedient to all my caprices: subject to all my whims; and it was then, or never, that I might have supposed him to be wretched about me, as I must necessarily have involved him in every dangerous or disagreeable fancy in which I saw fit to indulge; but he is now altogether released from this peril; I have grown weary of practicing upon his patience; he is perfectly independent in all his actions; he comes and goes unquestioned; I make no demand upon either his time or his tenderness; but receive with proper wifely gratitude the portion of each, which he finds it expedient and proper to bestow upon me."

"My dear young friend, you terrify me!" said Lady Malcolm, uneasily; "you are in a frightfully morbid state of mind; and I sadly fear that, from some misconception or another, you are doing serious injustice to your husband."

"Oh no, no; do not alarm yourself about him;" was the quick retort; "I can assure you that he makes no complaint; and I have not a doubt, from his regular and unwearied attendance at the Temple, that his affairs are prospering there also. It is really admirable, is it not, Lady Malcolm, to see how pertinaciously he pursues his profession? for, as I never hear of his spending the hours that he is absent from me elsewhere, I naturally conclude that he is at his chambers."

Her companion started; had Ida laid bare her heart before her, she could not more thoroughly have read its secret than she did at that moment. Mrs. Elphinstone was the victim of jealousy, but who could be the object of her suspicion? Vainly did Lady Malcolm ask herself the question; Sydney had, at the request of his wife, so utterly abandoned the world, that the only conclusion at which she could arrive was that Ida might possibly have been informed of some previous attachment on the part of her husband, which, now that the first effervescence of married happiness has subsided, was pressing upon her mind; and even while she condemned such a weakness, the gentle-hearted matron could not withhold her sympathy for the self-tormenting sufferer.

"Will you forgive me, my dear Mrs. Elphinstone," she asked; "I hazard another guess?—I can not mistake your meaning—you doubt Sydney."

"Have I any cause to do so?"

"Certainly none of which I am aware."

"In that case," observed Ida, haughtily; "you might have spared me the suspicion."

Lady Malcolm rose.

"I am truly glad to find that I am in error," she said, with dignity; "rejoiced alike for your own sake, and Sydney's, for believe me, Mrs. Elphinstone, when I assure you that no weakness on the part of a wife is so calculated to estrange a husband's heart as jealousy; where the suspicion is just he becomes irritated under his own sense of error, and where he is conscious of his own rectitude, he revolts from an accusation which robs the woman he has chosen of that charm of mental purity which had hitherto compelled his admiration and respect.

"I am, therefore, I repeat, most happy that I had wronged you, and you must pardon my offense, arising as it did out of my maternal anxiety for your mutual welfare."

"All apology is unnecessary," was the cold reply; "and I am really happy, in my turn, to have set your heart at rest. Question Sydney yourself, and I am convinced he will tell you that, however exacting I may have been for a time, I am now the very model of a wife. Oh, depend upon it, my dear Lady Malcolm, that should we again emerge from our hermitage, we shall be quoted as a marvel of connubial devotion; a species of show couple to be gazed upon with awe and admiration; a fitting example in fact, for my cousin Hubert and your fair daughter; and more than this I am sure you can not be unreasonable enough to wish."

Ida had overacted her part, but her companion was too judicious to suffer her to perceive this, although her heart ached as she slowly walked along the garden-path which led to her own house.

"Poor Sydney! Poor fated boy!" she murmured to herself; "this is even worse than I had feared. I have indeed lived to rejoice that she is in her grave, whose heart his misery would have broken. Yes—it is better so; this crowning sorrow she at least is spared."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE FIRST BRIEF.

As a natural consequence of the state of things which we have described, Sydney Elphinstone gradually estranged himself more and more from his ungenial home; and, with the impetuosity which formed so strong an element of his character, plunged into study with an ardor and perseverance that enabled him for many hours in the day to banish from his mind all memory of the blight which had withered the best feelings of his heart.

Shut into his chambers, half-buried with books, and grappling with difficulties from which he had hitherto shrunk with disgust, the gay young man of fashion had subsided into a plodding student; lines of thought began to trace themselves upon his lofty brow; his step became less buoyant, and his words more measured.

The youth was rapidly ripening into the sober maturity of manhood; and if he rarely smiled, and the music of his ringing laughter was no longer heard, at least neither had been succeeded by the querulousness of discontent, or the gloom of asceticism.

Toward his wife he still exhibited the same watchful attention and courteous kindness as ever, but it was no longer with the lover-like devotion of old; care had aged him in more than looks; and while Ida wept in secret over a change which wrung the chords of her heart to agony, and remembered that it had been her own work, she bore it in silence rather than by one concession make an effort to repair the evil.

"How know I," she would murmur to herself, "that the hours of his absence are, indeed, spent in study? How dare I even hope it, when I am so well aware that all mental exertion is antagonistic to his careless and impulsive nature? Could I only be sure that such were the case, how different would be our relative position!

"But no, no; I must not yield; it is clear from his continual and consistent coldness that his heart is no longer in his home, and that it has found another resting-place. Be it so; I will endure the suspicion until it has grown into certainty, and then—then—"

A month or two passed on thus; and at their close the earnest prayer of Elphinstone was granted—he held a brief: nor was it the least agreeable or welcome feature of this long-wished-for event, that it had been offered to him at the desire of Lady Malcolm, who had at length decided on endeavoring to rescue at least a portion of her property from the unworthy hands into which it had fallen.

Information recently acquired had convinced her that her case was far from a hopeless one, if skillfully conducted; and, much as she shrank from the excitement and uncertainty of a lawsuit, she still felt that she owed a duty to her child which must be performed even at the expense of her own feelings; while the consciousness that she had it in her power at the same time to serve the son of her still-lamented friend greatly tended to reconcile her to the anxiety of the trial.

Thus then, when he had almost despaired of such a result to his labors, and had pursued them rather as a resource from more painful thought than as the necessary means to accomplish a career, Sydney found himself suddenly summoned to exert all his energies in a cause in which the best powers of his heart and intellect must be alike called forth.

His cheek glowed, and his breast heaved with excitement; he was now to try his strength—he was now to prove to Ida that her faith in his intellect at least had not been misplaced; she had ceased to love him, but he might still compel her respect; and then a shadow fell over his joy: how differently might he have gone forth to meet his first struggle, strengthened by her encouragement, elated by her conviction of his coming triumph. The blood faded from his brow, and fell back cold upon his heart; he still grasped the important document, but half its spell was broken.

Then he roused himself; he remembered that he was to be associated in his task with one of the most eminent counsel in England; and that he must endeavor by his industry and care to render himself worthy of such an association; that he must not suffer the success of a cause which involved the future independence of Edith Malcolm to be secured solely by the eloquence of Sir F—— T——, but that he must labor assiduously to convince his co-adjutor that, inexperienced as he was, he was nevertheless worthy of the trust which had been reposed in him.

His facilities for obtaining every information relative to the case were necessarily great; and many an hour was spent at the villa of Lady Malcolm over papers and documents, or in confidential conversation connected with the one important subject; hours which Ida might have known to be so spent, had she ever stooped to ask one question as to the manner in which he passed his time; but this she never did: and when Sydney, in the exuberance of his exultation, informed her of the fact of his having received his first brief from Lady Malcolm, she congratulated him so coldly on the event that, stung to the very heart, he never again alluded to the subject, save to apologize for the lengthened absences to which he was compelled by the exigences of his occupation.

Thus it was from her kind and sympathizing acquaintance Mrs. Darnell alone, that she learned the fact of her husband's long and frequent visits to the mother of Edith; visits which were considered by both ladies as Elphinstone's chosen relaxation in his intervals of leisure.

"Was I not right to warn you?" was the triumphant inquiry of the visitor on such occasions; and what will you do now?"

"I will wait," was the unvarying reply.

And Ida did wait; and meanwhile, brooding over her imagined wrongs, her gloom and coldness increased; and had not the mind of her husband been absorbed by the one great interest of the moment—the pivot upon which he felt that all his future fortunes must necessarily turn—it would have been impossible to have longer delayed an explanation which must have proved fatal to every hope of domestic happiness forever.

As it was, however, Sydney perseveringly pursued his system of conciliation and kindness; spoke cheerfully and fondly to his wife; caressed his child with a tenderness and pride which even trial and disappointment had failed to diminish; and endeavored by every means in his power to recall, were it only for a moment, the smiles of happier days.

Every comfort and every luxury permitted by their slender means he lavished upon Ida unsparingly; but accustomed to other and far more costly indulgences, she had begun to disregard those which she still enjoyed, and to regret others which were beyond her reach.

Suffering had made her selfish; had she not, by her one fatal fault, thrown happiness far from her? had she still trusted as deeply as she loved, she would have jested at every privation, and been careless of every sacrifice; but now it was far otherwise; the constant companionship of a coarse mind had produced its effect; and she even felt a weak pride in upholding without murmur or reproach the character of a victim.

"Poor dear Mrs. Elphinstone! you really excite my wonder," was the frequent exclamation of her confidential friend; "I can not understand such fortitude and patience."

But Ida was not strong; she was not patient; she was simply ungenerous and unjust. Was there no tacit murmur in the averted eye and the rigid lip? no reproach in the moodiness of manner, and ungenial coldness of deportment, which checked the warm and honest impulses of her husband's heart, and left him to fight his battle with the world, destitute alike of home sympathy and support.

Had she been made to comprehend the bitterness of his feelings in this utter isolation, she would have smiled, and gloried in the miserable triumph; and gloried the more, because, even while she was thus torturing his noble and forbearing nature, she felt that he was necessary to her existence; that she still loved him beyond all else on earth—even beyond her child—none knew or guessed how, in the solitary hours, she dwelt with intense and agitating anxiety upon his coming trial—how she prayed for his success—how she yearned to throw herself upon his neck, and send him forth strong in the armor of a wife's and a woman's love.

But no: in these moments of spiritual healthfulness, ever uprose the vision of Edith Malcolm, while the insidious venom of Mrs. Darnell's inferences fell like molten metal upon her mind's ear, scorching and withering all her better and purer impulses.

"He will be armed with her affection—he will be strong in her cause—" was ever the climax of her reverie. "It would be idle indeed for me to stand forth as his champion: one word of encouragement from her will suffice to arouse his best energies to action: and so let it be. For my boy's sake I will bear the burden, heavy as it is, until its weight threatens to crush me to the earth: and then he shall be made to feel that I will not fall alone."

CHAPTER XL.

THE EARLY LOST.

While the cloud thus darkened over the modest cottage at Brompton, suffering in a more tangible shape had made its abode under the stately roof of Trevanion Hall. The heir of that ancient house, the idol of his father's heart, the object of many a hope, and many a sigh, was rapidly sinking into a premature grave.

Hubert Trevanion, whose manly beauty and moral worth had endeared him to every heart, had ceased to struggle against the conviction that he was the destined victim of the insidious disease which had long been sapping the principle of existence, and while the preternaturally bright eye and blooming cheek deceived the fond father into a belief that a life of happiness and honor awaited his darling son, that son himself felt with a resignation rare and beautiful under such circumstances, that for him there existed no future upon earth.

Day by day, and almost hour by hour, he became aware that the silver cord was loosened, gently and gradually, but not the less surely.

Often did he yearn to throw one gleam of light upon his father's mind; to awaken him to at least a possibility of their early separation, but his strength of purpose was insufficient for the effort. He felt that he dared not turn the proud and exulting happiness of his last parent into bitterness and mourning.

"The blow will come soon enough, come when it may," he would murmur to himself, as he listened with a brow steeped in the chilly moisture of exhaustion, and with closed eyes, to the projects of the unconscious baronet, in all of which he was necessarily involved, and while Sir Jasper talked with enthusiasm of the fair young creature who would, as he trusted, ere long become the mistress of the Hall, Hubert, instead of a wedding-garment, saw only a shroud; instead of wedded bliss, reveling in light and life, only inanition and a grave.

With mistaken and persevering affection he continued, however, to rally his failing energies, and little did those who saw him the companion of his father's rides and walks, the indefatigable sharer in all his pursuits, and the anxious promoter of all his enjoyments, imagine at what a price the devoted son at length purchased the privilege of brightening and gladdening the declining of his self-deceived parent.

Often, after a long attendance in a heated justice-room, or a rapid gallop over the downs, when the baronet returned home excited and refreshed by a sense of a duty performed, or a healthful sensation of augmented vigor, his son, after a painful effort of simulated strength, no sooner found himself alone in his chamber, than he tottered to a couch, where, bathed in the cold and clammy dews of consumption, and laboring for breath, he lay shivering and helpless, until by the aid of some powerful stimulant, he once more recovered sufficient energy to resume the wasting struggle.

At the close of a few months, however, this fearful exertion became no longer possible. His physical powers were exhausted, the flush upon his cheek deepened and concentrated itself into a burning spot, the fire of the large dark eye gleamed keen and cold, and this noble form became attenuated and feeble. Whispers circulated among the household, and many and earnest were the anxious looks turned on him by the gray-haired retainers of the family.

"It was thus," said the most aged among them, "that his grandfather had died—it was thus that he would die; the child of prayers and hopes, in whom his father had garnered up all his affections, for whom his mother had hoarded all her wealth."

It was strange, very strange, that Sir Jasper did not see that he was perishing before his eyes; but at length came the low and hollow cough, that sound of doom which can never be mistaken, the slight but painful spasm by which it was succeeded; the quivering of the wasted hand; the uncertain accents, which at intervals rendered the once melodious voice hoarse and discordant, and then indeed, even the doting father, whose pride in his only son had hitherto cast out fear, could no longer delude himself with the belief that all was well with the object of his idolatry.

The blow smote the stately old man to the earth, and in the first agony of his grief he gave way to a vehemence of feeling which had nearly proved fatal to the invalid. Medical assistance was summoned from far and near—there must yet be hope.

Alas! there was none. The fiat had gone forth, and Hubert Trevanion, the last representative of his noble family, gifted with all that the world can offer to its favorites—youth, wealth, and intellect—a noble person, and a heart rich in the best and holiest impulses of human nature, was about to share the common fate of all created beings.

No mortal skill, even although purchased with the ransom of a kingdom, could avail him now, and he learned his fate from the friendly physician—who had been induced, at his own entreaty, to name the probable period of his release from suffering—without the quivering of a pulse.

"My poor father!" was all he said as he ascertained that his very hours were numbered; "how will he bear this blow?"

"Sir Jasper is a man and a Christian, my dear sir," observed his companion, soothingly.

"But he is also a father," murmured Hubert, as he swept back the masses of dark hair which clung dankly about his brow; "and so strong a link can not be wrenched asunder without a struggle too powerful for his age. I must not, however, dwell upon this painful thought, or it may unnerve me when he most requires my support."

"Right, right," said the physician; "you must strive to keep up both his spirits and your own, difficult as it may be to do so; but you are equal to the effort, as I well know."

Hubert smiled sadly; for himself he was resigned; he had long felt that his doom was sealed, and that he was predestined to an early death; but he could not so certainly contemplate the sufferings of a father to whom he knew that he was all in all; and while, had he been alone in the world, he could have yielded his last sigh almost without regret, he felt a yearning to live for his father's sake, which shook him to the very depths of his spirit.

"Thank you for your frankness," he said, as, at the close of a violent paroxysm of coughing, he withdrew the handkerchief from his lip, and held it toward his medical friend, deeply stained with blood; "although, as you see, all further attempt at self-delusion would be useless on my part, even were I weak enough to encourage it; and now I have a last favor to ask of you—"

"Name it."

"Will you undertake to break the truth to my poor father? the whole truth, I mean. For the abstract fact of my early death he is already prepared; but I would fain see him reconciled to the probability, nay, the certainty, of its almost immediate occurrence. Will you oblige me in this?"

"I can not."

"And wherefore?"

"Because I have been acquainted with Sir Jasper for the last forty years," said Dr. Fernley; "and am well aware that although, like all his fellow-men, he has had many annoyances to combat, he has never yet been subjected to the searching trial of a great sorrow. Some one who has less regard for him than myself must undertake the task."

"Yet who could perform it so tenderly?"

"You mistake, my young friend, you mistake," said the worthy doctor with an emotion which sufficiently attested his sincerity. "It must be done by one who will not feel with him as well as for him. It is the only request of yours with which I can not comply."

"I regret it deeply," replied Hubert; "for in that case, painful as the effort will be, I must communicate the fact myself. I could not bear that his first and bitter grief should be exposed to the eye of a stranger, or a hireling."

"It will destroy you!"

"No," said the dying man, firmly; "my last act will have been one of duty, even of mercy, and that consciousness will give me strength; but it must be done at once, for I dare not dwell on the trial that is before me; I should only multiply my own moments of suffering."

"Let me entreat of you, Mr. Trevanion—"

"Nay, nay, do not unman me unnecessarily beforehand; my purpose is fixed, and I am too physically weak to contend, although morally strong enough to persist in my purpose. Only do me the favor to be present at our interview; he may need your assistance, —perhaps I may even need it myself."

"Only wait until to-morrow."

"That were worse than useless. My poor father! He has now but little time for preparation; why should I, by my cowardice, seek to abridge it? Surely it is wiser and better that his grief should have time to subside into resignation before—"

"Well, well; be it as you will," said his companion, reluctantly; "but I own that I could have wished—"

"You will comply with my request," interposed Hubert, with a sad smile; "and I thank you. Saunders shall summon his master at once, and my first and most bitter pang will then be over."

The physician was silent; for, even while he admired the courage and self-abnegation of his patient, he shrank from its probable result.

Ten minutes afterward the baronet, with bowed head and unsteady step, entered the sick-room.

An hour passed away. There are periods, or, at least, there is ever one period in the lives of even the most favored of human beings, when an age of suffering may be compressed into one brief hour of existence; but although the anxious watchers in Sir Jasper's household, dreading they knew not what, and fearing to question their own hearts, lingered near the door of the death-chamber, no sound escaped thence from which they might infer what was passing within; the arrow which enters the heart does its work noiselessly; nor was it until they saw their master come forth, leaning on the arm of Dr. Fernley, bent as though the weight of twenty additional years had suddenly fallen upon him, turning meekly and unquestioningly in the direction where he was led, his eyes glossy and tearless, and the muscles about his mouth quivering as though he no longer retained any power over their action, that they understood how surely all hope was at an end.

Morning broke, clear, and cold, and grey; the birds began to twitter among the boughs, and the deer to shake the dew from their dappled hides, and to emerge from their nightly covert. The lowing of cattle came upon the wind, and at distant intervals the cheerful whistle of the early hind was audible from the low pasture-lands. The world was once more awake; but on a sumptuous bed, in a darkened room, surrounded by all the appliances of wealth and all the cares of affection, lay one for whom sight and sound could no more be, and for whom there was no awakening upon earth.

Hubert Trevanion had passed away for ever, and so calmly, that his anxious watchers could not even guess at what precise moment the dreamless sleep which so mysteriously transforms the living sentient being into the dull, inert, and passionless atom retaining nothing of humanity save its outwards emblance, had fallen upon him

The dead was at peace; at peace in his manly beauty; another brief week, and he would be but a memory; while by his side sat his grey-haired father, who had stolen to the death-room, as noiselessly as though his muffled step would have disturbed the sleeper.

His quick ear had caught and interpreted the hurried whispers of the attendants; and without the utterance of a word, he had motioned them all from the room, fastened the door behind him, and sat down tearlessly beside his dead son.

Close to the pillow that supported his head; so close that his thick labored breath heaved the dark curls which rested on the spotless cambric; and sometimes he clutched at the sheet by which the body was covered, and sometimes he passed his hand slowly over the noble features, as if to impress their outlines more forcibly upon his memory.

Morning brightened, and the eastern sky became one prism of glory; the song of the wild birds pealed out an universal chorus, from which the clear and exulting notes of the early lark detached themselves like the triumphant outgushing of an emancipated soul ascending in rapture far above the dregs and dross of earth. Nature was gladdened by the birth of a new day; and the sons of toil were already entering upon its duties; but still the death-chamber was closed.

"This must not be—this should not have been"—exclaimed Dr. Fernley, the noise of whose carriage-wheels had been the first sound which awoke upon the deep silence of the mansion; "why were you so imprudent as to permit your master to shut himself in with his dead son? The door must be opened instantly."

Vain, however, were all his efforts to obtain admission; there was no answer to his earnest appeals, and at length the lock was forced, when the unfortunate old man was found stretched across the body of his son, as insensible as the pale form upon which he rested.

Hours passed ere he was restored to consciousness; and even then his return to existence was pitiable. Obedient as a child, he complied with every request, and resigned himself to every arrangement with a vague, unmeaning smile, which betrayed that he had lost all power of volition; at intervals he wrung his hands, and murmured out "My son! my son!" But these intervals were rare, and for days he continued a mere human machine, mindless and will-less.

Under these circumstances, Dr. Fernley, who had established himself at the Hall, had no alternative save to ascertain the name and address of his nearest relative, in order that he might be summoned to superintend the arrangements which were imperative under the circumstances; and accordingly an express was dispatched to Mr. Trevanion, the nephew who had been for so many years an exile from his ancestral home, and who was thus suddenly called upon to assume the duties of its master.

The last sad offices were performed for the dead, while the bereaved father sat supinely in his cushioned chair, clad in a suit of sables over which his dull eye glanced without perception or emotion, and the long-estranged relative, who had never exchanged one sentence with his heir, officiated as chief-mourner at his funeral.

And then Mr. Trevanion entered upon the more onerous responsibilities of his position. At the express request of the family physician, a consultation was held upon the unhappy baronet, whose mental condition was declared to be beyond hope, although his bodily health still promised, as they unanimously declared to withstand the shock.

CHAPTER XLI.

SOLITARY REFLECTIONS.

"And now, gentlemen;" said Mr Trevanion, as the party withdrew from the chamber of the sufferer; "I must, before we separate, request that I may be favored with your advice regarding my unfortunate uncle. I have personal duties to perform which entirely preclude the possibility of my residence at the Hall, or my own superintendence of his health and comfort, which must be my first consideration. All other points are of minor importance, and may bide their time.

"That Sir Jasper Trevanion has executed a will there can be no doubt, while it is equally certain that it must have been made in favor of his son; there can not, therefore, exist any necessity for torturing him by efforts (which would, moreover, in all probability prove abortive) to make him comprehend the necessity of such a precaution; even did his present state of mind hold out any prospect that such a document, executed under such circumstances, could be considered as a legal one.

"All I apprehend, therefore, that can be done, is to insure his perfect comfort and convenience so long as he is spared; and I am anxious that those should be scrupulously and efficiently secured. As I know little of the personal tastes or idiosyncracies of my uncle, I am by no means qualified to decide on the most desirable mode of effecting such an object; nor should I feel satisfied to follow the suggestions of mere domestics, who, however attached to their afflicted master, may err in their estimate of his requirements. I therefore appeal to you.—I shall feel gratified by your assistance."

"Frank and manly, Mr. Trevanion," said Sir D—— D——; "but no more than I should have anticipated from you. Your position, as regards the invalid, is difficult and peculiar, but he could not have fallen into better hands. You are right; he is powerless now, and you can afford to forget the past."

"After the scene which I have just witnessed," was the reply; "the past is only to be regretted. I have learned a stern lesson in that silent room. I now feel only that Sir Jasper Trevanion is my nearest kinsman, and the head of my house."

"And in that house let him remain, my good sir," broke in Dr. C——; "it would be like rending the ivy from the oak, to remove him from his old and accustomed home."

"I am quite of that opinion," said Mr. Trevanion; "and, moreover, that the attendants to whom he has become habituated should also remain about him. With two of them I am myself familiar, as they were already installed here in my boyhood, and have grown gray in the service of their master. I have had interviews with both since my arrival, and they are anxious to end their days under the roof which has for so many years been their only home. I know them to be thoroughly trustworthy; and I think that could Sir Jasper be consulted on the subject, he would be as desirous as myself that they should retain their present sway over his household."

"You allude, of course," remarked Dr. Fernley, "to Mrs. Pearson and Tomkins?"

"I do."

"Admirably decided. In fact, I do not see how the services of either one or the other could now be dispensed with; the worthy old housekeeper is worth her weight in gold in a sick-room, while her co-adjutor is equally valuable in his own department."

"We will, if you please, gentlemen, put his abilities to the test," said the merchant, as he laid his hand upon the bell; "after your hurried journey you must require some refreshment."

As no objection was raised to the suggestion, a speedy adjournment was made to the dining-room; where, enlivened by a well-spread board, and some of the choicest wines from the baronet's cellar, the sufferings of the invalid himself were soon forgotten by the professional brethren, who entered into a political discussion with as much earnestness as they had previously done into the ailments of their patient; while Mr. Trevanion, seated at the head of that table to which he had been so grudgingly admitted in his youth, was compelled to take his part in the conversation, and to affect an interest which he was far from feeling in the subject of their discourse, occupied as he then was with objects of more personal consideration and anxiety.

"It strikes me, Mr. Trevanion," observed Sir D—— D——, as he dissected a partridge, "that you would do well to ingratiate yourself with the landholders of the county, to whom, as I am informed, you are almost, if not entirely, a stranger. Take my word for it that we are on the eve of a general election, and it would be idle to stand on ceremony under present circumstances. Sir Jasper, poor man! is naturally hors de combat, and you are his most fitting successor. I have some interest here myself, and shall be most happy to exert it in your favor."

"In that case we shall have a contest," said Dr. Fernley; "as Lord Dronemore has long been anxious to start his elder son."

"What! The poet who has just returned from the Pyramids?"

"The same."

"But, my good sir, we want politicians, not poets, in the Lower House," interposed Dr. C——; "sound practical men, who care little to hear themselves talk; working bees, who will know how to store their own hive—not honorable tourists, who scatter their honey that others may hoard it."

"Perhaps so; but I still adhere to my opinion. What say you, Mr. Trevanion?"

"Simply, that I never intend to offer myself to the electors of ——, until I have a stake in the county."

"Unfortunately," observed Sir D—— D——, with a courtly inclination of the head; "the prospect is by no means a remote one, and the subject appears to me to be worthy of consideration."

"Had I a son—" commenced the merchant.

"You have, I believe, a grandson," said Dr. Fernley.

Mr. Trevanion started. The existence of Ida's child had been a forbidden topic in his presence from the moment of its birth; and he was consequently unprepared for so abrupt a reminder. The stern man had resolved to forget the fact himself; and, as a natural consequence with one of his peculiar character, he had calculated that others would follow his example.

"My grandson is not a Trevanion," he remarked, coldly.

"True; but that circumstance does not militate against the fact that he is heir-presumptive to the baronetcy."

The merchant winced again.

"And a fine little fellow he is," pursued the pertinacious physician; "I never saw a more noble boy."

"You are a fortunate man, sir," said Dr. C——, who was entirely ignorant of the family history; "and we will, with your permission, drink to the young man's health in a bumper of this splendid hock."

Mr. Trevanion bowed stiffly, as his guests prepared to do honor to the proposed pledge; he even raised the glass to his lips as the toast was drunk, but the cool liquid seemed to scorch him, and not one word of acknowledgment followed the draught.

"And now, gentlemen," said Dr. Fernley, to whom the silence which succeeded was perfectly intelligible; "I must request of you to excuse me, as I have two important visits to make before sunset."

"While I," followed up Sir D—— D——; "must be back in town to-night, and consequently have little time to spare. It is wonderful how the hours fly by when one is pleasantly engaged."

"While your carriages are preparing," said the family physician; "will you allow me to suggest that we should take a parting look at our unfortunate friend Sir Jasper?"

"By all means," was the ready reply, and once more the party ascended to the baronet's sick room, but every effort to rouse him into mental consciousness again failed; and the men of science finally departed, leaving the weary and irritated merchant alone in the vast and lonely mansion.

Then it was that, abandoned to himself, and left to wrestle with his own thoughts for the first time since this signal change had taken place in his social position, Mr. Trevanion keenly felt the isolation which his own vindictive passions had created about him.

The garrulous old physician was right; he had a grandson, and that grandson must, one day should he live to manhood, inherit the lordly estates, and the proud title of his ancestors, while the daughter whom he had cast forth, alike from his heart and from his hearth, would rule over a splendid home for which she would be indebted to her son and not to him.

The thought was wormwood to him! And then, as his eye traveled over the vast dimensions of the gorgeous rooms in which he sat, he pictured to himself the crouching insignificant form of his wife, who would probably at an early period become its temporary mistress, and with a sensation of disgust and scorn, he rose and paced the floor like one suddenly awakened to a sense of injury.

The frivolous Miss Clara Rotheringbury, the inert and mindless Mrs. Hubert Trevanion, to fill the place of his own beautiful and high-born mother! The proud man shuddered as he contemplated such a contingency, while slowly and uninvoked, there rose up before him the radiant vision of his daughter; that daughter, whose beauty and whose grace had flattered his vanity, and satisfied his pride; and like one under the influence of mesmerism, unable to contend against a will stronger than his own, the picture broadened and deepened until she seemed to stand before him with her infant in her arms, her proud brow glowing with matronly dignity, and her eyes bright with natural love.

It was a splendid picture, and the merchant's heart throbbed as he lingered on it; but after awhile he shook off the spell.

"Perhaps it must be so," he murmured to himself; "but not yet—not yet—Hubert Trevanion will not forgive, even if Sir Hubert be ultimately compelled to do so. I am still master of my own actions; and when no longer able to control them, I must e'en follow the example of the French prince, and not suffer the long-descended baronet to revenge the injuries of the money-seeking merchant. Yet, when I remember that she might have entered this house as a peeress, it almost maddens me!

"And to think too that he—that the vain boy who, by a few idle flatteries, blighted all my views—that he may one day play the master here—I could almost wish that the poor old man who crushed my youth, and who now in his helplessness can not resist the slightest of my wishes, might live on until the world and the world's honors had ceased to hold out any charm to the penniless adventurer who robbed me of my daughter."

It was fortunate that, at this period of his self-communing, Mr. Trevanion chanced to remember that he had still many and important duties to perform before he left the Hall; and with his habitual energy he immediately prepared to execute them. There were solicitors and land-stewards to consult and instruct; tenants to receive, servants to discharge, and a host of minor arrangements to make, as essential as they were harassing.

At length, however, all was accomplished. The papers of Sir Jasper, including his will, of which a duplicate was in the possession of his attorney, were duly examined and sealed; the family diamonds and those of the late Lady Trevanion, all of which had been recently reset for the destined bride of the unhappy Hubert, together with the costly service of plate, were transferred, under the care of Tompkins, to the baronet's banker in town; leases that were falling in were renewed, in accordance with the instructions previously given by Sir Jasper; the wages of the several servants retained at the Hall were doubled; the stud was reduced, and all the equipages, save one, were disposed of.

Nothing, in short, remained to be done, when Mr. Trevanion took his departure from the Hall, which could conduce to the convenience or security of its afflicted master; while so ably had the still active Pearson seconded his efforts, that, while in the apartments tenanted by the baronet, all was luxury and comfort, even the strong-minded merchant felt his heart sink with a strange sensation of awe and repulsion as he traversed the spacious suite of state-rooms, and found their gorgeous draperies and stately mirrors shrouded in their Holland coverings. Life seemed indeed to have been put out in the home of his fathers.

"I shall close the gallery altogether, sir, as soon as you are gone," said the ancient housekeeper in a low voice, as she followed him in his last circuit of the mansion, her voluminous black garments sweeping with melancholy monotony along the uncarpeted floors, "and only open it to air the rooms, and to dust the furniture, all of which will of course be done under my own eye. You know that you can trust me, Master Hubert—I beg pardon, sir; I meant to have said Mr. Trevanion; but really, now, when all seems to have passed away except yourself, my old brain is clearer about early days, than on what is going on about me. Poor Sir Jasper! To think that he who was a boy to me, should have come to this, while I am still hale and able; it is strange and sad indeed, sir, is it not? And that dear boy—the sweetest youth that ever trod the earth, gone too! How often he made me talk of you, Master Hubert, and tell him how, although you went out from these doors without a friend, to seek your fortune in the wide world, you came to be a great and a rich man, the companion of proud lords and a guest in the king's palace."

"But how came you to know all this, my good Pearson?" demanded the merchant, with a curiosity which he could not repress.

"Oh, sir, we always knew all about you," was the eager reply, as planting the stick by which she was compelled to support herself while walking, the aged woman suddenly stopped in order to give greater emphasis to her words; "for you were no sooner gone than Sir Jasper, poor dear gentleman! began to have a thousand fears about you; and although he never dared to name your name before her ladyship, he often talked to Tompkins and his own man about his unhappy nephew; and I do believe, Master Hubert, that if you had only bent your pride to write a letter to my master, and to ask him—"

"I had nothing to ask of him, Pearson."

"More's the pity, sir, more's the pity that you had not, for then we should have had happier hearts at the old Hall."

"So then I am to understand that Sir Jasper—that my uncle—really did regret his harshness when it was too late."

"Indeed he did, Master Hubert, indeed he did; and of late years, since my lady died, often and often did he and his poor dear son tell me how honored and how happy you were, and what a credit you were to the family name; and that you had a daughter so beautiful that she might have married the greatest lord in the land."

"And so she might," said the merchant, bitterly, "but she did not."

"So I heard, sir, so I heard; but then Sir Jasper learned from her own lips that she had wedded the man of her heart; and such a boy as she had, my master said; it was really wonderful to hear him talk of that child; and of course you know, sir, that the poor youth you laid to rest only a few days back was to have been his godfather, although he was too ill to go up to town for the christening."

"Ha! indeed!" exclaimed her startled listener, "was Mr. Hubert Trevanion really to have been the sponsor of Master Sydney Elphinstone?"

"Of your daughter's son, sir," said Pearson, "but he was to be called Hubert; the young lady would have it so, they told me, because it was her father's name."

"It is cold here, my good Pearson," said the merchant, huskily; "let us leave these desolate-looking rooms. Poor Sir Jasper! How much I wish that he could recognize me before I leave."

"No, sir, no; there is no hope of that," whispered the housekeeper, mysteriously, "my master's mind will not come back to this world till he is about to leave it altogether; and then it will be but a blink of light, faint and feeble, so that soul and body may go together."

"A strange doctrine, that, my good old friend," smiled Mr. Trevanion, "but we will hope better things. Who knows? The constitution of my uncle is a sound one, and he may yet rally."

"Ay," murmured the aged dame, "he will rally, but it will only be at the sound of that trumpet which will call us all from our long sleep. And now you had better go to the dining-room at once, Master Hubert; there is a fine fire there, and your dinner will be served in a few minutes."

CHAPTER XLII.

SUNSHINE AND SHADOW.

GREAT was the astonishment of Lady Mary Brooklands, for of the actual mistress of the house there was no question, when she was requested by Mr. Trevanion on his return to town, to oblige him by putting the female servants of his establishment into the handsomest mourning compatible with their station; and that, at the same time, a hundred-pound note was placed in her hand, with a respectful entreaty that she would be good enough herself to appear in the same sable habiliments in honor of his deceased relative.

"Do me the favor also, my dear Lady Mary;" he said; "to impress upon Mrs. Trevanion the necessity of wearing the deepest sables, for I have almost a twofold death to deplore; as I have not only buried Hubert, but have, moreover, left my unfortunate uncle in a state of dying death, even worse than actual annihilation. She can not, as I well know, appreciate the delicacy of my position without your prompting, and I consequently throw myself, as far as she is concerned, upon your accustomed kindness and consideration."

"Rely on it, that I will do all that is right, my dear sir;" was the reply of the lady, as she crushed the fragment of tissue paper between her glove and her hand; "and I am sure you will believe me when I say, that your anxiety to do every thing in a proper manner, and one suited to your position in the world, at so melancholy an occasion as this, is precisely what I should have expected from you.

"Dear me!" she pursued, dropping into a chair, and assuming an expression of sentimental sympathy; "what a trying visit yours must have proved, Mr. Trevanion; father and son, at one blow—or rather from what you tell me, it would have been less deplorable, had the bereaved old gentleman really followed his child to the grave."

There can be no doubt of it;" replied her companion, in the same tone; "no doubt on earth of it; for his condition is, as you judiciously remark, indeed deplorable. Mindless and powerless, he retains nothing of humanity but the form; and so long as he survives, I see little hope of any amendment."

"The affair is altogether very untoward;" observed Lady Mary, carefully examining the pattern of the Valenciennes upon her handkerchief.

"Worse, worse;" said the merchant contracting his heavy eyebrows; "my responsibility has suddenly become most painful."

"But in a sensible point of view, you are actually the head of the family, and the representative of the Trevanions."

"True; in a sensible point of view, but not in a legal one; I am, in fact, nothing more than the guardian of Sir Jasper, and have neither power nor influence while he lives."

"It is monstrously provoking!" drawled the family friend; "and I know by experience how long, how very long, persons in his peculiar state do often live. Where there is no wear on the mind, the body is wonderfully tenacious of existence."

"It is at least consolatory that he suffers no pain;" said Mr. Trevanion, calmly.

"Very."—was the retort, as the titled matron applied her handkerchief to her nose; "but still—you will excuse me, I know, if I repeat that the whole thing is nevertheless monstrously provoking. The baronet, by your account, does not live, he only vegetates; and I confess that, feeling as I do toward yourself, I could have wished—"

"No, no; I thank you for your interest in my welfare, Lady Mary;" interposed the merchant, "but I must not suffer myself to glance at what might have been."

"Yet he had injured you so deeply."

"Like many other men who pride themselves upon their moral strength, he was at last compelled to succumb to a stronger will than his own, but I have had satisfactory proof that he repented his harshness when it was too late."

"I am glad to hear it;" said Lady Mary; "if the abstract fact affords you the slightest gratification. And now, my dear sir, that Ida's son has become an important little personage in your family, I trust that you will be induced to pardon her escapade. As you are well aware, with all my affection for the dear girl, I have never hitherto presumed to plead her cause."

"I am aware of it, Lady Mary, and have estimated your delicacy at its just value. No—you have never striven, by word or look, to moderate my just resentment."

"I could not venture to do so; my position as a relative of Mr. Elphinstone's was so onerous, that I shrank from every species of interference."

"I fully estimated the reasons of your silence. Had you, like her mother, harassed me by weak repinings and still more idle reproaches, the breach between us could never have been repaired."

"That was precisely what I felt, my dear sir; but now—"

"Now, madam, I must have time to reflect. A father whose child deceives him, and elopes from beneath his roof, leaving him to brave as he best may the comments of the world, merits but little indulgence at the hands of her outraged parent; and I tell you frankly, Lady Mary Brooklands, that had Mrs. Sydney El-phinstone become the mother of a girl, instead of presenting an heir to the Trevanions, I would have abandoned her for ever to the miserable obscurity of her present lot."

"But as it is?"

"As it is, I shall be ruled by circumstances: I am not yet Sir Hubert Trevanion, and I can afford to wait."

Little did the stern and unrelenting father imagine that his daughter had, like himself, declared her willingness to "bide her time."

The disconcerted Lady Mary, who on the restoration of her nephew's wife to favor, had rapidly built up a cloud-castle of advantage to herself, was too much accustomed to the inflexions of Mr. Trevanion's voice, and the portentous action of his eyebrows, to prolong the discussion; and accordingly, after having pledged herself to superintend the personal arrangements of Mrs. Trevanion on this important occasion, she hastened to terminate the interview, and so well did she redeem her pledge, that within a week the merchant's wife, despite her "dear mes," "how very disagreeables," and sundry other inane expletives, found herself attired in the deepest sables, for a man whom she had never seen, and who she had been taught to regard with aversion, as an impediment in her husband's path toward greatness.

Nevertheless, with her usual apathy, she resigned herself to her fate. She had, as we have shown, long ceased to contend, and although on Ida's evasion from the paternal roof, she did, with the true instinct of a mother's heart, for a time revolt against the inflexible harshness of her husband, the mere force of habit soon crushed her back into her habitual insignificance, and surrounding herself with novels, she endeavored to forget her own sorrows in those of her favorite heroines, and suffered the titled matron who had usurped her place in the household, not only to act, but even to think for her.

The mental condition of Mrs. Trevanion in her Richmond Villa, was little superior to that of Sir Jasper in his ancestral halls.

Far different was the effect produced by the intelligence of the melancholy events which had taken place in ——, on the two families so closely allied by blood and friendship to the baronet and his son.

Upon Lady Malcolm, who had anticipated a life of honor and affection for her gentle Edith, the blow fell heavily indeed, although she derived consolation from the fact that the fair girl herself, however she might, and undoubtedly did, admire and respect Hubert Trevanion, had yet seen too little of him to render her sorrow at his loss of more than a temporary nature. Edith was, in truth, only learning to love him; her young heart had been awakened, but not won, and though she wept, it was rather in pity for his fate than in regret at her own disappointment, while her mother, with all a mother's anxiety, looked into the future of her child, and shuddered as she felt how suddenly it had become a void.

Their retired existence, which had hitherto been brightened and gladdened by a thousand innocent and happy projects for the future, had in one brief moment lost its charm; the one perpetual subject of discourse had become only a theme of sorrow and regret; the light of their modest dwelling was extinguished; and as Lady Malcolm, with a troubled eye, followed the movements of her daughter, her heart swelled, and for the first time in her life she felt disposed to repine.

The grief of Mrs. Elphinstone was twofold; for even in the brief interviews which had taken place between them, she had learned to love her long-estranged relatives; while the only ray of sunshine which her miserable infatuation permitted to fall upon her heart, was the hope of soon being relieved from the presence of Miss Malcolm by her marriage with Hubert Trevanion.

That hope had now passed away forever; while the calm and unimpassioned resignation of Edith, who, in the presence of her mother even restrained her tears in order not to augment the distress of her parent, awoke a new suspicion in the self-tormenting mind of Ida.

"She never loved him," she murmured to herself; "she never loved him, or she would have needed the consolation which she is so eager to afford. What can be the blighted ambition of a mother when placed in competition with a heart whose first affection is cast back upon it?

"No, no; she would have shed other tears over the grave of Sydney Elphinstone; her secret passion was hopeless, and she had self-control enough to obey the bidding of her maneuvering parent.

"Poor child! she is playing her part badly now, when even I can detect the truth. Hubert is happy to have escaped a fate like mine; better to die young—ay, to die a thousand deaths—than to live on, unloved and neglected, when all the illusions of hope and passion are rent away, and the bleak, bare realities of existence alone remain."

And with this gratuitous suffering came a renewed feeling of isolation; the tie which had existed between herself and Sir Jasper, and which was to have been rendered still closer through her child, had greatly tended to reconcile her to the unrelenting silence of her father, which she now felt with double force.

In the early months of her marriage, the passionate devotion of her husband had sufficed to render her independent of all other affection, and she had consequently endured it with patience and submission as the consequence of her own act; but now, when she believed the heart of Sydney to be estranged from her, she shrank appalled at her loneliness.

There did appear, indeed, no prospect of a reconciliation now, when the unhappy events which had taken place in the family, and which would have afforded so favorable an opportunity for Mr. Trevanion to summon his only child once more to her home, had been coldly and officially announced to her by Sir Jasper's attorney, in precisely the same form as they had been made known to Lady Malcolm.

Never, until this moment, had Mrs. Elphinstone confessed, even to herself, that she had involuntarily looked beyond the affection to the generosity of her uncle; and it was, consequently, with terror that she remembered how fearfully her slender fortune had dwindled away, and that she had no longer a friend on earth to whom she could appeal for assistance.

On Sydney's professional gains she had long ceased to calculate; it was Sir Jasper's intercession with her father which had formed the mainstay of her hope, and now Sir Jasper was dead to all human sympathies.

She strained her infant to her heart almost convulsively as these fearful thoughts flashed across her brain. What would become of her boy? For herself, she could die; death had no terrors for her; it would be peace, and rest, and oblivion; but her noble boy—he was too young, too beautiful, too beloved, not to live long and happily; and yet to what a fate was he reserved!

Her own trials faded before her fears for him; and as his soft arms encircled her neck, and his rosy cheek rested against hers, the wife was forgotten in the mother, and she shed tears as holy as an angel might have registered.

It was in this wild burst of grief, to which she had yielded herself up immediately after the departure of Lady Malcolm and her daughter, that she was discovered by her husband on his return from the assize-town where the cause, upon which he had been engaged for Lady Malcolm, had been tried and gained in a manner which had surpassed his most sanguine hopes. Sir F—— T——, upon whose well-known eloquence its success was considered mainly to depend, when in the very act of putting on his gown, had been seized with sudden and violent indisposition: his appearance in court was accordingly impossible; and it was too late to secure the services of any other leading counsel.

Under these circumstances, there was no alternative save to leave the cause entirely in the hands of Mr. Elphinstone, whose familiarity with all its details rendered him the most eligible person to conduct it; and it was consequently fortunate that the industry of the young man, in the first place, and his intense anxiety for his friend at the critical moment when he was called upon to incur so heavy a responsibility, produced a degree of excitement that for the time overcame the nervousness to which, on his first appearance in so prominent a position, he would most probably have yielded.

Forgetting his own identity in the important duty before him, he watched the case as it proceeded with a care and tenacity which enabled him to garner up every fact and argument adduced by the opposing counsel; and when, after closely and cleverly cross-questioning the witnesses brought against him, he at length rose in his turn to reply, the ease and skill with which he analyzed and commented upon the speech of his opponent, the lucid manner in which he brought forward and connected his own proofs, the extraordinary grace of his action, the animation of his handsome countenance, and above all, his minute acquaintance with every detail of the case, however trifling and futile in appearance, soon excited universal attention.

The Judge leaned forward in his seat, evidently interested both in the cause and the orator; the gentlemen of the bar desisted from their several occupations; squibs were left half written, and caricatures half sketched; the audience were silent and absorbed; while even the opposing counsel, who, on finding himself pitted against a mere youth, a legal novice hitherto unknown on the circuit, had performed his duty somewhat less punctiliously than usual, was observed more than once to suffer an approving gesture to escape him, as the speech proceeded.

But the enthusiastic speaker noticed nothing of all this; his whole heart was in his cause; nor did he imagine when he at last resumed his seat, that in the estimation of most of his professional brethren his cause was already gained. Such, indeed, was the result, and Sydney Elphinstone was both a proud and a happy man when, to his surprise and gratification, he heard himself complimented by the learned Judge who had presided, and congratulated by the counsel who were seated about him; while, as the climax of his triumph, he had scarcely been an hour at his hotel, when a note from his intended coadjutor was placed in his hand, containing not only the thanks and felicitations of Sir F—— T——, but also the handsome fee with which his own eminent services had been retained.

"The gold which you have so ably won, my dear sir, you must be content to wear," said the high-minded lawyer, "and I trust that you will accept with it my very sincere hope that we shall ere long meet again with the same happy result."

His first step toward forensic celebrity was taken, and the ground was firm beneath him.

Such were the circumstances under which the young husband returned to his home, only, as already stated, to find his wife absorbed in grief.

"Ida, my own, my darling Ida," he exclaimed, as he hurried to her side, and folded her to his heart, forgetting every thing save his love and her sorrow; "what has happened? why do I find you in this miserable state? Speak, darling—do not torture me with suspense."

Mrs. Elphinstone replied, by placing in his hand the letter which announced the death of Hubert Trevanion, and the imbecility of his father.

Sydney was greatly shocked.

"This is, indeed, appalling!" he said, in an accent of deep feeling; "how I pity your poor father, who will, no doubt, be greatly shocked that all possibility of a reconciliation with his family is now over. Do not think me heartless, Ida, if, however painful as these facts are, it is a consolation to me to find that no misfortune has happened to either yourself or our boy."

"Myself!" echoed his wife, bitterly; "and is it then no misfortune to be alone in the world?"

"Alone, Ida! Did you say alone, with your husband by your side, and your child upon your bosom?"

"But for that child, I should indeed be alone."

Elphinstone withdrew his arm from her waist, and rose from the sofa.

"Have I deserved this, Ida?" he asked, reproachfully.

Mrs. Elphinstone was silent.

"Even you, although you have ceased to love me, will perhaps afford me your pity," he pursued, greatly agitated; "when I tell you that I hastened home, full of hope and joy, with words of kindness and encouragement still sounding in my ears, to offer to you the first fruits of my professional success. The anticipation of your approval, the hope of your sympathy, made every moment of my tedious journey seem an hour until I reached my own door: the transition is a bitter one; but I do not blame you: our affections are beyond our own control, and I must submit to my fate."

"Do not add cruelty to coldness, Mr. Elphinstone," said his wife.

"Neither the one nor the other can you ever experience at my hands, Ida. I have loved you as woman is seldom loved; I would sacrifice my life to insure your happiness; but you willfully misjudge me. How can I regain the affection which was once mine? Only become what you were during the first months of our marriage—tender, generous, and confiding; only let me once more be convinced that I have not forfeited your love; that our sad and unaccountable estrangement is at an end, and I shall consider no effort too great which may enable me to feel that you are again the Ida of former days."

"Would that it indeed were in my power," was the gloomy reply; "but we can not deceive ourselves, Sydney; we are both changed. Like yourself, I utter no reproach; I only yearn for a renewal of the illusion which is unhappily dissipated forever."

"And wherefore? If we are only true to ourselves and to each other, what more can we require for happiness?"

"Do not urge me," said Ida, with a fresh burst of tears; "I am unhinged, and sick at heart."

"In that at least we sympathize," retorted her husband, as he turned away, unable to endure the sight of a grief which he could neither comprehend nor console; that his wife was suffering most acutely he could not doubt; and such was in fact the case, for jealousy is an intermittent fever which "has," says a celebrated French author, "its paroxysms and its hours of lassitude; no patient could long endure the violence of the ague fits which shake, chill, and agitate their victim with an universal shiver; no heart is strong enough to sustain the tension of the anger which absorbs the whole being." And thus it was with Ida; the doubts and fears in which she had so recently indulged had prostrated her powers; and now, as she looked upon the clear frank eye and proud brow of her husband, a new trouble grew upon her. Could it indeed be that she had wronged him?

She began to doubt herself; and that doubt was torture; for, if she had done so, how mean, how despicable, must she not appear in his eyes? He might profess to love her still, but would he do so when she had wounded him alike in his heart and in his honor?

She rose suddenly from her seat, and laying her child upon the cushions of the sofa, she moved a few steps toward her husband with the intention of once more throwing herself at his feet, and entreating him to pardon her; but just as she approached, unconscious of her purpose, he took his hat from the table, and merely saying: "I can no longer delay apprising Lady Malcolm of the success of her cause, which I was anxious to communicate personally,"—he turned, and left the room.

Once more the angel of peace folded its wings, and bowed its radiant head.

"No, I have not wronged him!" was the exclamation of Ida, as she swept back her disordered hair, and clasped her hands in passionate emotion: "he dare not remain to justify himself; and worse, far worse, before he has been an hour in his home—the home of his wife and child—he finds a ready excuse for hastening to reap the reward of his exertions in her smile.

"Fool that I was to doubt! when he takes so little pains to conceal his falsehood, why should I torture myself by self-accusings as idle as they are ill-timed? Should I not blush at the cowardly impulse which would have carried me to his feet, to be again cajoled, and again deceived?

"Father! you are revenged. Grievously have I sinned, but grievously also do I suffer. You would have made me great; and could you only know the abject thing I am, you would forego all further vengeance—loveless, friendless, and almost homeless, your proud heiress still hangs upon the smile of a man whom her love has wearied—still clings to him, even amid her wrongs."

The demon once more triumphed. Reason was drowned beneath the waves of passion.

CHAPTER XLIII.

A LAST HOPE.

His unfortunate reception by his wife, after his professional triumph, had wounded Elphinstone to the heart; and consequently, at the very moment when he should have been hopeful and buoyant he became depressed and spiritless.

Why, he asked himself, should he toil, when she whose love would have made his labor light had not only ceased to interest herself in his efforts, but had even disdained to utter a single comment on his success?

To what a different result he had once looked forward! How fondly and confidingly had Ida, on former days, listened to the air-built hopes which at that period he had so little power to realize; while now, when each and all were about to become real and tangible, she had withdrawn from him alike her sympathy and her encouragement.

Vain were all the congratulations poured on him by his friends, and the laudatory comments of the public press; vain were even the offers of professional employment pressed upon him, to arouse him from the settled gloom into which he had fallen; and although he pursued his legal duties with care and conscientiousness, his enthusiasm was at an end; and few could now recognize in the calm and unimpassioned Sydney Elphinstone, the brilliant and sparkling orator by whose eloquence they had so recently been startled and surprised.

His crushed heart was no longer in his task; it was buried beneath the ashes of his loveless home. Young and sanguine, he had never foreseen the possibility of a spirit-void like this; and the moral desolation withered him.

Had he possessed more strength of character, he might have replaced affection by ambition, but his nature was too yielding, and too dependent upon external support, to lead him to strive for the mere excitement of the struggle, when no helping hand was stretched forth to sustain him.

It is true that the tearful gratitude of Lady Malcolm and her daughter, and the reflection that Edith was at length in secure possession of the handsome inheritance of which she had been in danger of seeing herself defrauded, and henceforward protected from all danger of pecuniary embarrassment, afforded him deep and genuine gratification; but even this consciousness was a very inadequate compensation for the home-happiness that he had lost; while amid his present wretchedness there awoke within him a dread that Ida, the bright and beloved being whose love had once made his world, might one day urge him beyond his patience, should she continue to indulge in the baseless suspicions and unjust accusations by which she had already tortured him.

"But no, no;" he murmured sadly to himself; "come what may, I must be guilty of no such cowardice; for me she abandoned rank, and wealth, and station, incurred the anger of her implacable father, and resigned herself to comparative poverty; she is the wife of my bosom, and the mother of my child.

"So long as she has no home save mine to shelter her; no heart save mine to bleed for her, I must bear all the misery which she may see fit to inflict upon me. I were less than man, were I to resent even the most cruel of her caprices; but should it one day chance that her father should relent, then indeed, it would become my duty to assert myself; to prove to her that I am not the abject thing she thinks me.

"Yes, even although in wringing her heart I should crush my own forever, we should then have no alternative save to part. She has ceased to love me; obscurity and privation have done their work; and she would find consolation in the gaud and glitter which render the contrast of her present existence so bitter to her.

"Poor Ida! why did I vainly imagine that my love would compensate for all? The fault was mine; and I must expiate it as I best may."

One word of kindness, one look of tenderness from his wife at this period, would have restored Elphinstone to her, as fond and as indulgent as ever; but the word was not uttered, the look was not vouchsafed.

Ida had, after the interview which we have described, subsided into a cold and listless serenity, which admitted of no reproach, and silenced all questioning. To the well-being of her boy she was ever keenly alive, but she manifested no interest on any other subject; Sydney came and went as he listed without either inquiry or comment; she was calmly courteous when he was near her, but seemed totally careless of his absence; it was, in short, a domestic illustration of the German tale of the dead and the living bodies linked together, and at length, unable longer to endure the joyless existence to which he was condemned, Elphinstone, in a moment of ungovernable wretchedness, poured out all his sorrow into the sympathizing bosom of Lady Malcolm, and entreated her good offices with Ida.

Hitherto he had, in so far as he was enabled to do so, locked the secret of his home-trials within his own breast, but they had gradually become too heavy to be borne alone; and as, with blanched cheeks and quivering lips, he described the daily torture to which he was subjected to the amiable woman who loved him as a son, her heart sunk within her.

True to his implied promise to his wife, Elphinstone forbore, even in his agitation, to hint at her unworthy suspicions. He well knew that Lady Malcolm would never have forgiven the insult offered to her child; and thus his listener could only recur to her original idea that Ida was causing the unhappiness of both by a weak jealousy of some former object of her husband's affection.

"You grieve me more than I can express, Sydney," she said, when his sad confession was made; "but you must remember that, painful as your present trial can not fail to be to you, there is never jealousy without love. Mrs. Elphinstone may probably have been told that she was not the first possessor of your heart—that you had loved before you became the slave of her own beauty—and, however, we may lament that she should yield to the weakness of repining at so common a circumstance, still, as her error is solely caused by her affection, it should meet with indulgence from you."

"But I swear to you, my dear Lady Malcolm, that I never loved any woman but herself. Consider what my age was when I married! Was it probable that at twenty I should offer her an exhausted heart?"

"Age, my dear boy, has little to do with passion. Before you utter any further disclaimers, try to recall the past, and to remember if there be not some name which has, at one period or other, been linked with your own."

"Never. The thing is impossible."

"And yet, if I mistake not, I have myself heard rumors of an attachment between Lady Mary Maitland and Mr. Sydney Elphinstone?"

"How dare people so trifle with the name of a woman!" exclaimed her companion, indignantly. "Lady Mary never gave me the most remote reason to suppose that she regarded me with the slightest favor; while, for myself, I looked upon her simply as a beautiful and unaffected girl, of whom I should have been proud as a sister, but never should have chosen as a wife."

"Nevertheless, as the report reached me, it may also have reached Mrs. Elphinstone."

"I am persuaded that Ida never even heard the name of Lady Mary Maitland."

"Of that fact you can not be sure, my dear boy; and I still adhere to my opinion. That you have given your wife the slightest cause of uneasiness since your marriage, I am myself in a position to deny. Did I not make Mrs. Elphinstone's acquaintance while still a bride? Do I not know that up to the present day you have frequented no house but my own? that the hours which must have been devoted to a flirtation of any kind, had you been unprincipled enough to indulge in so reprehensible an amusement, have been consecrated to the interests of Edith and myself?"

Elphinstone involuntarily shrank under her frank and unsuspicious gaze.

"Thus then;" she pursued; "it can only be as I have stated; and you would do well to allude to the subject; not as suspecting the cause of her present disquiet, for that could, in either case, only wound her feelings; but speak of Lady Mary openly and unaffectedly as a former acquaintance, even as a friend, if you will; and conclude by informing your wife that the young lady is about to bestow her hand upon the Marquis of Brentwood, a fact of which I have been assured."

"Such a proceeding would avail me nothing;" said Elphinstone, gloomily; "Ida has never even dreamed of Lady Mary."

"You astonish me, Sydney, by your persistence in this opinion; I had hoped and believed that I had discovered, and could have struck at the root of the evil. But doubtlessly I have wronged your wife, by attributing to her so despicable a weakness as jealousy."

"I fear not."

"My dear boy, you are inexplicable, but I have no right to ask of you a greater amount of confidence than you are willing to repose in me. All, therefore, that I can now do, is to inquire how I may be of service to you?"

"I will tell you, my kind friend;" was the agitated reply; "on you rests my only hope. See my poor self-deluded Ida; reason with her; convince her of my unchanged and unchangeable affection; describe to her the misery which she is daily and hourly inflicting on me; ask her only to hear my justification before she condemns me; urge her to hear you in the name of her boy—she still loves him! And, above all, bear with her waywardness, should she give utterance to any thing which may wound you—look upon her rather as one suffering from vital disease than—"

"Enough, Sydney, enough—I will obey your bidding, my dear boy, for your dead mother's sake; although I am quite aware that the part, which I am about to play, is, at the best, an invidious one; at, any sacrifice of my own feelings, however, I will strive to restore peace between you, for your present existence is a sad waste of life, and must sooner or later become intollerable to both parties. Perhaps Mrs. Elphinstone will be more frank than yourself; should it happily prove so, I am sanguine as to the results of my interference."

The excited young man seized the kind hand which was extended to him, and raised it to his lips.

"And you will bear with her, even should she—"

"Yes," interposed Lady Malcolm, with an encouraging smile; "even should she tell me, as with justice she may, that I have exceeded the privilege of a friend, by presuming to intrude my advice unasked; so be of good cheer, Sydney; I will call upon Mrs. Elphinstone early to-morrow; and I trust that before I leave her I shall see her weeping out in your arms the happy tears of renewed confidence and affection. And now, in return for my concession, go home, and try my experiment regarding Lady Mary Maitland. I am not yet convinced, and shall be by no means surprised if on arriving at your house, I find my own interference altogether unnecessary."

The young man strove to return her parting smile, but it was with a sad foreboding of the failure of Lady Malcolm's attempt that he turned his step homeward.

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE WIFE AND THE FRIEND.

IRKSOME as Mr. Trevanion had considered his position while under the roof of his uncle, it became tenfold more so when he was again established in his own house. The peculiar circumstances of the last month had unsettled his mind for business; while the daily increasing inanity of his wife, and the selfish condescension of Lady Mary Brooklands, alike irritated him. Mrs. Trevanion, like most weak people, had a horror of mourning, and declared that her health was injured by the gloom of every thing about her.

"I should not have cared, you know, Lady Mary;" she whined; "if I had been called upon to wear this odious silk and crape for Mr. Trevanion, or Ida, or even for yourself; because then it would have been only right and proper, but to do it for a person I never saw in my life is a great deal too bad; just as Mademoiselle Laura had sent me three loves of caps that are now sheer waste. And the servants, too; I declare they all look like people just returned from a funeral; and as for Mr. Trevanion, it is really shocking to see how little he cares how things go on now at home."

"Mr. Trevanion has a great responsibility pressing upon him, my dear madam; and can not, consequently, be expected to interest himself so much as formerly in the details of his establishment; which, moreover, he does me the honor to think that I can regulate with tolerable efficiency," was the sententious reply.

"I wish that poor Ida had never left us," resumed the lady of the mansion, after a brief silence; "there was some thing like life in the house while she was here—and I had some one to love me then—but now, I might as well be in my grave."

An equivocal smile played for an instant about the mouth of her companion, but it did not linger.

"Doubtlessly, we all miss Mrs. Elphinstone," she said, "but surely, you at least have no just cause of complaint. Mr. Trevanion is a most generous husband."

"Generous!" echoed the poor lady, with a burst of very unusual indignation; "I am sure I can not think what meaning you attach to such a word. Do you imply that I am clothed, and fed, and lodged, like a gentlewoman? I have a right to be so, for my fortune was the foundation of my husband's. But what am I to become in my own house? Do you suppose that because I bear with the indignity in silence, I do not feel the insult of seeing a stranger take my place, and perform my duties?"

"My dear Mrs. Trevanion, you amaze me!" exclaimed Lady Mary, alarmed by this sudden and unexpected self-assertion, on the part of her hitherto supine and listless companion; "in your delicate state of health, would it be kind, would it be prudent, to subject you to so great a fatigue as the superintendence of an extensive establishment necessarily involves? You surely can not be serious in thus misinterpreting the considerate kindness of Mr. Trevanion?"

"It would be no fatigue to reply if I were occasionally consulted on the arrangements of my household," said the irritated woman, to whom anger had lent a temporary energy, "but if he did not see me from day to day, I might easily imagine that Mr. Trevanion had forgotten my existence. Surely, when my daughter was gone, I had a right to be the mistress of my own house."

"Mrs. Trevanion," said Lady Mary, looking up from her worsted-work with an air of offended virtue, "I can not pretend to misunderstand your inference. You are jealous of my position in the family. You shall no longer have cause to be so. I will immediately apprise Mr. Trevanion of your sentiments, and request his consent to resign a post which has for years been both delicate and difficult. He will be delighted, I do not doubt, to find that you consider yourself equal to the exertion of taking my place."

"I am sure that I never asked you to leave us," was her terrified reply; "of course you will tell Mr. Trevanion what you please, and you know well what he will answer. I have no friend to take my part; no child to care for me, and so I must submit; but if you think that I do not feel, you are both mistaken."

Lady Mary instantly saw her advantage, and pursued it.

"I had flattered myself," she said haughtily, "that you regarded me as a friend, but I find that I am deceived; and that after having devoted long and weary years to the interests of yourself and your daughter, I am still considered as a stranger. Under such circumstances, Mrs. Trevanion, I can, of course, no longer remain a guest in your house."

"You were very kind to Ida, I know," conceded her companion, sullenly.

"And of what have you yourself to complain?" was the harsh inquiry; "before we part, I should desire to ascertain upon what grounds you assume the right to censure me. Mr. Trevanion, conscious that neither his connections nor your own could introduce your daughter into the society in which he wished her to move, solicited my assistance, which I granted as frankly as it was asked. I filled your house with the élite of the fashionable world; I did for Ida what neither her money nor her beauty could have done; I enabled her to take her place among them. That she did not profit by my exertions in her behalf was assuredly no fault of mine."

"You introduced your nephew to her," exclaimed Mrs. Trevanion, with a last flash of expiring spirit.

"I presented many to her besides my nephew," was the reply of Lady Mary, as a conscious flush rose to her cheek; "but I never counseled her to marry him. On the contrary, I represented to her the folly and rashness of such a choice. Had she been my own daughter, I could not have advised her more disinterestedly. But it is of yourself that I would speak rather than of your daughter. Do you not also owe many hours of gratification to my good offices? Have you not seen yourself surrounded by some of the greatest and noblest in the land? And have you forgotten to whom you were indebted for such a privilege? Your husband has a better memory, and to him I shall have no cause to appeal."

"Ah, those were happy days!" murmured out the broken-spirited woman, once more crushed beneath the well-acted indignation of her haughty companion, and burying herself still deeper amid her cushions; "those were happy days!"

"I am rejoiced to find that you, at least, admit that fact," pursued this relentless persecutor, "as it proves that you have little cause of complaint. Those days might have been renewed, had the same good understanding continued to exist between us; but that will be impossible when I have left you. My friends will, as a natural consequence, resent the affront which has been offered to me, nor will it be in my power to prevent it."

"I am sure that it was not my intention to offend you," sobbed out Mrs. Trevanion, whose unaccustomed excitement had terminated in tears; "you know, my dear Lady Mary, that I dare not do so, even if I wished it. Do not leave me alone with my husband; it is too late, too late—once, perhaps, I might have resented his harshness, but that time has gone by. I only wished—I only thought—that I might have been treated with more kindness, more consideration; that I might at least have had a voice in what concerned myself; but I will never indulge in such a hope again."

"And you will do well," said her companion, as she glanced with contempt upon the weak woman whose domestic wrongs should rather have excited her sympathy; "you have not to learn to-day the peculiar disposition of Mr. Trevanion; he is proud, very proud, and should he find himself coldly treated by those who have hitherto professed to be his friends, he would bitterly resent the insult. Should I withdraw myself from his house, this would undoubtedly be the case, nor could I conceal from him that a puerile love of power on your own part had led to the annoyance.

"Decide, therefore, in how far you feel yourself able to resist his displeasure. If I go, it is because you have desired it; if I remain, it can and shall only be at your express request. That you have deeply wounded me, you must both see and feel, but for your own sake I will consent to pardon the affront, if by so doing you believe that I may avert from you the resentment of your husband."

"Oh, no, no; don't talk of leaving us," gasped out her victim; "whatever I may feel, whatever I may suffer, I will never offend you again even by a word, my dear Lady Mary."

"I will trust to that assurance; and now, listen to me a moment longer, Mrs. Trevanion. You know that your nephew is dead, and that his father will, in all probability, soon follow him to the grave. Now I appeal to your own good sense; if even here, in your Richmond Villa, you are unequal to the exigences of your position, how could you hope to acquit yourself of the more complicated and onerous duties which would await you at Trevanion Hall? And besides," she added with a smile full of blandishment and meaning, "as Lady Trevanion, you will have ample occupation in sustaining your rank, and receiving your guests. By the by, I find that the family diamonds are superb, and as Ida is unfortunately hors de combat, at least for the present, you will enjoy undisputed possession of these far-famed jewels. Is it then reasonable that you should indulge in idle repinings at imaginary wrongs, when so brilliant a destiny awaits you?"

Weak and vain, however, as the poor mother was, there was yet something in the words of her companion which jarred upon her feelings. She could not exult in any triumph which was obtained at the cost of her only child; and even the vision evoked by the artful Lddy Mary lost its charm, as she remembered how beautiful her banished Ida would have looked in the diamonds which were, as she was assured, to be her own.

Little, however, did Lady Mary Brooklands care to speculate upon the hidden feelings of a mother's heart. She had accomplished her purpose; she had silenced the justifiable murmurs of the ill used wife; she had crushed the germ of indignation in the spirit of the woman; she had, as she trusted, aroused her egotism, and dazzled her vanity, and, better still, she had secured herself against every chance of expulsion from a home, in which, without either outlay or responsibility, she lived a life of luxury and ease which formed a delicious contrast to the existence of privation and expedients to which she must have been reduced, if once more compelled to subsist upon her very insufficient jointure.

The conviction of her present and future security acted like magic on the mood and manner of the noble matron; she listened to the puerilities of her companion with unfailing patience; affected to sympathize in all her murmurs—for despite her promises, poor Mrs. Trevanion's existence was one long murmur, which appeared to possess for her a species of negative enjoyment; and, finally, she rose from her worsted-work to select from a box of books, just received from Churton's, 'a charming new novel,' which she recommended to her perusal.

No wonder that when Lady Mary considerately withdrew in order that she might enjoy it undisturbed. the guileless dupe felt self-convicted of injustice and want of courtesy toward the able tactitian who had so skillfully terminated an interview, which, from the instant that her own point was gained, had alike wearied and disgusted her.

In ten minutes more the family friend was closeted in the library with the master of the house.

CHAPTER XLV.

GREEK MEETS GREEK.

As had been constantly the case since his return to town, Mr. Trevanion was surrounded by papers and accounts, all relating to the affairs of his family, which now appeared to absorb the whole of his attention; for, although his first impulse had been one which did him honor, it must not be denied that after-reflection had induced him to regard himself if not actually as an ill-used, at least as a very unfortunate, individual.

Had Sir Jasper borne the shock of his son's death, as he had borne that of his daughter's desertion, and been still competent to fulfill the duties of his station, it is probable that his nephew would have awaited with patience and equanimity the period when he should himself become the representative of the family honors; but when he remembered that the baronet was, to all intents and purposes, dead to the world, though he might possibly continue for years to live on in the same imbecile and powerless condition, a feeling of irritation took possession of him which he made little or no effort to repress.

Every detail connected with the estate assumed, in his eyes, a separate importance, far greater than it in reality merited; the value of the ancient timber which rendered the extensive park the most picturesque and stately in the county, was calculated again and again; the massive plate, which had been the accumulation of centuries, and the Indian accessions by which it had been increased through the marriage of Sir Jasper with the nabob's widow, underwent a similar process; while not the least interesting subject of his ruminations was the banker's book, with its careful record of the heavy sums saved annually by the baronet, and destined to the establishment of his son.

Hitherto, Mr. Trevanion had looked upon money rather as a means than an end; though he had labored assiduously for wealth, he had regarded it rather as a slave than a master; he had valued the pomp, the luxury, and the consideration which it secured to him, and not the gold for its own sake; nay, throughout the whole of his career until the marriage of Ida, he had coveted its increase rather for her sake than for his own; and all his yearnings had been awakened by the sole ambition of achieving greatness without the aid of those who had despised him in his poverty.

Now, however, when the "bloody hand" appeared to be almost within his grasp, it was no longer the chief object of attraction, and had he been a needy man with whom the world had dealt grudgingly, he might well have been pardoned for such a feeling; while, as it was, it seemed suddenly to have changed his whole nature.

He had no sooner ascertained the enormous sum produced by his own already colossal wealth, when united to that of which he must necessarily become the owner on the demise of the baronet, than he suddenly forgot his ambition in his avarice. He even regretted the profuse expenditure in which he had for so many years indulged, as he reflected that, having failed in his darling project of securing a noble son-in-law, so much more would have been added to the heap; and there were moments when he almost resolved to curtail his establishment, in order to reduce the further inroads which it compelled him to make upon his treasured capital.

Never had the proud merchant been so restless and so ill at ease. Trevanion Hall on the one hand, and his counting-house in the city, on the other—his two mines of wealth—appeared to him so discordant and so incompatible that they almost, each in its turn, fretted him to fever.

He was now, actually if not legally, the head of his house; but while the old man lived, he must continue to be Mr. Trevanion, the merchant. His commercial affairs progressed as usual, but there was, nevertheless, a moral interregnum in his existence, during which he could not mentally define his real position.

To a haughty spirit like his the feeling that such was the case amounted to actual suffering; and at times he would have been thankful, had intelligence reached him that his uncle had been restored to the possession of his faculties, for then he could at least have reconciled himself to pursue the career which had already raised him to opulence and honor; but situated as he now was, it had become distasteful to him, while he had no equivalent to replace either its excitement or its advantages.

Haughty and stern as ever, he had less self-command; and where he would formerly have spurned support, he now yearned to secure it. He was no longer young; no longer sanguine; he could not look beyond the present hour without disturbing himself.

Nothing had come to pass as he had foreshadowed it. The nephew, whose very name had been obnoxious to him because he stood in the way of his own greatness, was in his grave; the daughter upon whom he had leaned with confidence as the sure agent of his ambition had failed him; the relative whom he sought to humble was beyond the reach of worldly mortification; and more bitter than all else, he must consent to forego his resentment, and to acknowledge the child of a penniless son-in-law as his heir, or be condemned to the exasperating consciousness that, resist as he might, he had no power to prevent that child from succeeding him as the heir of the Trevanions.

He had arrived at this phase of his reverie when Lady Mary Brooklands entered the library.

"Are you engaged, Mr. Trevanion?" she asked in her blandest tone; "if so, I will take some future opportunity of communicating what I have to say."

"My engagements at present," was the equally bland reply; "are by no means pressing;" and Mr. Trevanion, with his usual ceremonious politeness, rose from his seat to advance a chair for his visitor.

As he resumed his own, his eye fell on the formidable array of figures in which he had that morning inscribed his possessions in esse and posse; and it was with increased stateliness that he prepared to grant the audience solicited by his noble inmate.

Lady Mary was a peer's daughter, true; but she was as poor as she was proud; while he had wherewithal to buy up a store of peerages, should they come into the market. The time had passed when she was absolutely essential to him, but he well knew that he was as necessary to her as ever. He had purchased her services, and could still pay their price; there was no feeling of obligation on either side; while constant association had enabled them to comprehend each other perfectly.

Lady Mary inwardly sneered at the man of money who aspired at greatness; while the merchant, on his side, despised the great lady who sacrificed her dignity to her interests. Still, nothing could exceed the urbanity and good breeding with which both played their part in the domestic drama. If there was neither confidence, friendship, nor regard between them, there was the strong tie of mutual necessity. Each was essential to the other, and each was conscious that such was the case.

Thus, even when Mr. Trevanion, with a keenness of perception rendered still more acute by distrust—for, from the moment Ida became the wife of Sydney Elphinstone, he had distrusted Lady Mary—perceived, or fancied he perceived, that the tortuous talent of the titled widow was about to be exhibited in some new and skillful maneuver, not a look or a gesture was ever suffered to betray such a suspicion; nor did he, when he occasionally contrived, with apparent unconsciousness, to baffle her endeavor, permit her to imagine that he was aware of having done so.

Nevertheless, he was constantly upon his guard against a surprise; and it was, consequently, with a misgiving of some fresh design upon his purse or his pride that he, on the present occasion, assumed an attitude of profound and earnest attention.

Nor was he far wrong in his anticipations, for after having so cleverly protested against the indignant interference of the wife, the astute matron resolved to render her position equally secure with the husband.

Skillfully as she had striven to ascertain the intentions of Mr. Trevanion, on his accession to the baronetcy, she had been unable to effect her purpose. Had she succeeded in inducing him to confide to her his decision regarding his daughter, her own future fate would have been clearly mapped out before her; for should he resolve to recall his long-banished child, now a wife and a mother, Mrs. Elphinstone must necessarily do the honors of Trevanion Hall, and, with her high spirit, would brook no interference from herself; in which case, she must either forego the well-appreciated advantages of her present home, or consent to subside into insignificance; whereas, should the offended father persevere in his resentment, her own reign was secured.

It was to satisfy herself of this important point that she now intruded on the solitude of the merchant, but she was by far too able a tactician to put the question directly.

"My reason for wishing to see you at this particular moment, Mr. Trevanion," she commenced; "was to inform you that I have just had a somewhat important conversation with your wife. As it is extremely probable that your uncle, Sir Jasper, can not long survive, and as his death will occasion great and extensive alterations in your domestic arrangements, I thought it desirable to ascertain the wishes and intentions of Mrs. Trevanion, when the event should occur—"

"A work of supererogation, madam, which could tend to no result."

"Perhaps so; but, aware as I am of the peculiar constitution of Mrs. Trevanion's mind, I thought it very possible that when once she had become Lady Trevanion, she would consider herself aggrieved should I continue to exercise the same authority under your roof as you have hitherto delegated to me; and, therefore, I resolved to have a clear and perfect understanding with herself upon the subject."

"And did you succeed?" inquired her listener, with a sneer.

"Perfectly."

"Then, my Lady Mary, you have worked a miracle which throughout the whole of my married life, I have been unable to accomplish."

"I was prepared," pursued his companion; "should my poor friend evince the slightest desire to assume her duties as mistress of the house in her new home, to abdicate my throne at once; and, with that view, I had already written to my cousin, the Dowager-Duchess of Clanmore, who is a widow like myself, to propose that we should combine our forces, and establish a joint household."

"And what did her grace reply?" inquired the merchant, with most alarming composure.

"I am still awaiting her answer," said the discomfited Lady Mary, striving to conceal her uneasiness; "but there can be little doubt as to its purport, since she made the same request to me before I became your guest."

"That arrangement then is still in abeyance; but you will, perhaps, be kind enough to acquaint me how Mrs. Trevanion received your proposition."

"She refused to hear of my leaving her—she even shed tears—and I assure you, my dear Mr. Trevanion, that I bitterly reproached myself for having occasionally imagined that she misinterpreted my feelings and intentions."

"Do not make yourself uneasy on the subject, Lady Mary: Mrs. Trevanion's imaginary annoyances may always be removed by a new dress or a new novel. For once, however, she acted with common sense; but you must pardon me if I venture to remark that it would have been more in accordance with your usual good judgment, had you consulted me rather than my wife. However, I have no doubt that you were impelled by a sense of delicacy to act as you did; and you are, at all events, a free agent. Thus, then, I am to understand, that, before you decide upon your future plans, you will await the reply of your cousin the duchess."

"Why, not precisely—" commenced the noble matron, with an eagerness which she immediately endeavored to restrain; "of course, so far as my residence with her is concerned, I shall be compelled to do so; but I am half inclined to visit Scotland under any circumstances."

"I had flattered myself that you would have felt some curiosity to see my ancestral home," remarked Mr Trevanion, with even more than his usual stateliness; "and, indeed, I looked forward to the advantage of your good taste and judgment in the alterations and improvements which I shall find it necessary to make there. My uncle has, since the death of his wife, lived a very retired life, and suffered the Hall to remain in precisely the same state in which I remember it in my boyhood; I discovered no symptom of decided neglect or decay on my late visit, certainly; but still much is required to render it what I should desire.

"Both the Hall and the adjacent estate have great capabilities, very great capabilities, and I have resolved, when they once come into my possession, to develop them to their utmost extent. Sir Jasper, as I soon ascertained, had been anxious rather to save money than to spend it; and he was right. He had a son to inherit the property; I am differently situated; and, moreover, while he was known to all the country, I shall enter it as a stranger, and must consequently be cautious not to allow the local dignity of the family to suffer in my hands.

"This place is, as you are aware, Mrs. Trevanion's jointure-house, and enough, more than enough, has already been expended upon it; indeed, to be candid with you, I almost repent that I have been tempted to do so much. However, when I establish myself at the Hall, it will probably let more advantageously in consequence, than it might otherwise have done.

"As to the house in town, for the present at least, it will answer every purpose, as I shall decidedly reside in the country until I have completed all my plans."

Lady Mary bowed and smiled, and tacitly signified her acquiescence in the propriety of these somewhat premature projects; but still, as she could not conceal from herself, she was no nearer her own point than ever.

"Mrs. Trevanion appears to be most anxious that you should consent to a reconciliation with your daughter at this particular crisis," she hazarded, in order to arrive at some conclusion.

"Mrs. Trevanion is very good; and she must surely have become aware long ere this, that as I can place no reliance on her judgment on any serious emergency, I can not be expected to suffer her wants or wishes to control me in any way. 'This particular crisis' offers no reason that I can perceive, for a precipitate measure of the sort. Mrs. Sydney Elphinstone quitted my roof at her own good pleasure, but she must return to it only at mine; and when, if ever, I may decide on again receiving her, is entirely a matter for my own consideration."

"Yet surely," remarked the lady, making another desperate plunge to clutch the truth which lay deep beneath the waves of the merchant's resolute reserve; "it will be a most unpleasant thing for you to feel that your heir is a stranger to you! Of course, Ida must be naturally anxious that her boy should be reared and educated in such a manner as you would approve."

"I really do not see why Mrs. Elphinstone should be more punctilious with regard to her son's conduct than her own. On the contrary, she is, no doubt, perfectly aware that he will ultimately be more independent of my displeasure than she could ever be; and I feel no present inclination to interfere with her peculiar system of education."

"But you can not, nevertheless, shut your eyes to the fact, my good sir, that your daughter does not possess the means necessary to carry out any such system in an efficient manner; and surely—"

"You are a zealous friend, Lady Mary, and Mrs. Elphinstone will, beyond all doubt, be grateful for your good offices; but still, it appears to me, that you over-rate the privations to which she has thought proper to expose herself. You should remember that she possesses an income of three hundred a year (about as much as she expended upon her dress before her marriage), and that Mr. Sydney Elphinstone is declared to be a very rising young man; fame brings profit, my dear madam, in every profession; and thus you see that you alarm yourself unnecessarily, and that the young gentleman, regarding whose future career you express so very flattering an anxiety will need no patronage of mine."

"Still, as the heir to the Trevanion estates—"

"I yet stand in his way," said the merchant, dryly, "and may probably do so for many years to come; added to which, although Sir Jasper is hors de combat in all matters of business, he is nevertheless still alive; and for any reason which I can see to the contrary, now that his mind can no longer act upon his physical health, he may survive for twenty years to come."

"You can not be serious, Mr. Trevanion."

"I am perfectly so."

"I regret to hear it, as, according to my own view of the case, you would be wise in so ordering your arrangements as to be prepared at any moment to supply his place."

"I flatter myself, Lady Mary, that I should have been quite competent to do so at an hour's warning, at any period during the last thirty years. But, my dear madam, I have myself known invalids in his condition outlive their natural heirs; and who shall say that my uncle may not augment the number."

His listener was fairly baffled, but, indignant at the idea of defeat, she returned once more to the charge.

"I am to understand, then, Mr. Trevanion, that, in the remote contingency of Sir Jasper's death, you are anxious that I should accompany the family to Trevanion Hall?"

"Certainly, my dear Lady Mary. Can you doubt that you will ever be a welcome guest beneath my roof."

"I hope not," said the lady, beginning to chafe under the consciousness that she was check-mated at every move; "but my inquiry embraces a wider scope than you appear inclined to concede to it. As I have already stated, I have been entreated, even with tears, by Mrs. Trevanion, not to abandon her to the heavy and irksome responsibilities which must devolve upon the mistress of such an establishment as that which you contemplate in ——shire.

"Of course," she pursued with a significant smile, "I have not learned to-day that she can make no independent arrangement of so serious a nature without your sanction; and it is consequently to you that I appeal before I conclude my own plans."

"I trust, my dear madam, that you have not wearied of my house; I should indeed be sorry to find that such were the case."

"No, no; do not mistake me. The fact is, that, as I take a totally different view of the baronet's malady from yourself, I look daily for news of his death; and since you compel me to speak frankly, I should like to be informed whether, when it has taken place, you have any intention of recalling your daughter and establishing her at the head of your household; as, in the event of such an arrangement, I must of course decline a further residence beneath your roof. Ida is no longer a mere girl, and she would naturally—"

"When I have given Mrs. Sydney Elphinstone a right to dictate her own terms, I shall be prepared to consider them," was the imperturbable reply. "At present I am content to wait the demise of my uncle before I decide on my after-plans. Meanwhile, I feel much indebted to you, my dear Lady Mary, for the consideration which you have shown to the wishes of Mrs. Trevanion. No doubt she is appalled by the prospect before her; she would be equally so by a far less important event; and I shall feel still further obliged, if you will tranquilize her mind upon the subject, and assure her from me that, in any and every case, I shall be careful that she is not exposed to any extra care or exertion. I trouble you with this mission, because, after the interest which you have so kindly evinced in her very unnecessary anxiety, I feel satisfied that you will derive gratification from performing so friendly an office."

Lady Mary Brooklands rose; she could endure no more; the calm self-possession of her companion made the blood tingle in her veins; but she was one of those wary individuals who live not only in the world, but on it; she could not afford to be true to herself; and, accordingly, she repressed the haughty rejoinder which trembled upon her lips; and, after a few inconsequent remarks, left the library, as ignorant of the real intentions of its master as when she had entered it.

Nevertheless, when she once more found herself alone in her own pretty morning-room, with its costly store of rare china, buhl, marqueterie, and bronze, she soon succeeded in convincing herself that the designs of Mr. Trevanion were more transparent than he imagined; and that it behooved her to be careful of her own interests.

"Had he resolved"—thus she mentally argued—"to exclude Ida from her home during his life-time, he would have evinced more anxiety to prevent me from carrying out my assumed arrangement with the Duchess of Clanmore; as the idea of his placing at the head of his house in ——shire, a woman of whom he is ashamed even here, is preposterous. Crafty as he has been, he has not succeeded in deceiving me; and now my only chance of averting the mortifying change of fortune by which I am threatened, exists in an immediate reconciliation with Ida. How do I regret that, in obedience to her father's request, I did not reply to the letters which she addressed to me after her marriage! However, le passé est passé, and I must endeavor to retrieve my fault. I will write to her at once."

And, seating herself at the antique secrétaire, inlaid with mother-of-pearl and malachite, which occupied the bay of the window, twenty minutes had not elapsed before she had crossed the first page of her paper with expressions of affection, regret, and remorse, as intense as though she had been the cause of Mrs. Elphinstone's disgrace, and had been plotting to rob her son of his birthright.

CHAPTER XLVI.

AN EXPLANATION.

In compliance with the advice of Lady Malcolm, Elphinstone, on his return home, affecting to be blind to the coldness and indifference of his wife, resolutely commenced a conversation, to which she contributed nothing beyond an occasional monosyllable; nor could even his account of the trial, and the formidable ordeal through which he had so successfully passed, elicit from her any demonstration of excitement or gratified pride.

Nevertheless, he persisted in his ungracious task, until her suppressed emotion became too powerful for concealment, and the heart of Sydney began to swell with hope.

"You do feel for me, and with me, Ida," he said tenderly, as she turned away to hide the tears which had forced their way from her downcast eyes; "I am sure you do, although, for some inexplicable cause, you are anxious to suppress those feelings. Oh! do not at this moment, when I am harassed both in mind and body, deny to me the blessing of your sympathy."

"Why will you persist in urging me to feign what I can not feel?" asked his wife, struggling to regain her self-possession; "how can I sympathize in a triumph with which I am totally unconnected? It is for Lady Malcolm and her daughter, in whose cause you exerted the talents which, when their exhibition could only have profited your wife and child, you suffered to lie dormant, to congratulate you on their success."

"Ida!" exclaimed her husband, reproachfully; "you are unjust. You well know how long I had been yearning for an opportunity of usefulness, and that until the day when I was intrusted with this cause, which will, as I trust, prove the corner-stone of my professional reputation, I had been unable to secure one. Surely you would not visit it upon me as a crime that my first efforts were exerted in the behalf of my mother's dearest friend?"

"By no means; and in the acknowledgments of that friend you will have your best reward. It is the consciousness of that fact which closes my own lips."

"But can you imagine for a moment that any thing can compensate to me for your own cold indifference?"

"Do not deceive yourself, Sydney," was the measured reply; "for you can not deceive me. Had this famous trial, which has so suddenly lifted you from obscurity to fame, involved the interests of any other individual than Edith Malcolm, I consider it very problematical if you would have exhibited the same amount of energy."

"Again, Ada?"

"Can you deny the fact?"

"Yes, and no. In any and every case I should have felt it my duty to put forth all my strength; but I do not seek to deny that I should have felt much less anxiety as to the result."

"For once you are frank?"

"For once! Have you ever found me otherwise? Listen to me, Ida: high-minded, pure-hearted, and capable, as I well know, of any sacrifice for those you love, you are, nevertheless, destroying our mutual happiness by a phantom which you have yourself evoked. Once more, despite your pledge to the contrary, you are indulging in inferences as unjust to myself as they are injurious to the innocent girl, for whom I have never felt more than the regard and affection of a brother. Can you not rely upon my plighted word? And have you forgotten that she was the promised bride of your poor cousin?"

"A fable," said Mrs. Elphinstone, scornfully; "a bridegroom with the hand of death already pressing upon his heart!—a bride who scarcely vouchsafed to shed a tear over his untimely grave! The game was ill-played, and could not deceive the lookers-on."

"Can it be possible, Ida, that you still persist in so fatal a delusion? Have you no respect for the father of your child?—no regard for the honor of your own sex? If it indeed be so; if you blindly indulge in a weakness which neither assurances nor proofs can overcome, what a life of misery is before us both!"

"The assurances have not been wanting," said his wife, gloomily; "but where are the proofs?"

"They exist in the fact that, aware of your suspicions, I have not for months frequented the house of Lady Malcolm, save on professional business; and that I voluntarily offered to effect a total estrangement between the two families."

"By exposing me and my wretchedness to the contempt of those who had caused it."

"Ida, do not drive me to extremity!" exclaimed her husband; "from you I can bear, I have borne, much—but all endurance has its limits. I can not long support an existence so cruel as this to which you have condemned me. While I believed that your jealousy was the result of an affection which would not brook less than an adequate return, I strove by every means in my power to prove how much you wronged me; but now, when I see and feel that I am no longer the object of either love or confidence, I have not self-command enough to endure the daily and hourly trials to which I am subjected."

"And do I escape my share of suffering?"

"Unfortunately you do not. Would that it were otherwise!"

"We have committed a fatal error, Sydney," said Mrs. Elphinstone, suddenly; "or rather it is I who have been guilty of one. In my wretched egotism, believing that I could and should suffice to make your happiness, I urged you to abandon the world, that we might live only for each other. I overtaxed your affection; I calculated too blindly on your stability; putting firm faith in the assurances which you had given me that when once I became your wife your existence would be bound up in mine, I thought myself secure. What the result of my confidence has been, I need not say: suffice that we are both most wretched! You affirm that you can no longer support such an existence; judge, then, how little I shall be able to endure it. I never deceived you, Sydney; I warned you, when you sought my hand, that if ever I had proof of your falsehood, I should hate as deeply as I had ever loved. I say so still; but, until I have that proof, I will struggle on for my child's sake—ay, even for my own—for what have I now left on earth to cling to but yourself."

Exhausted by her own emotion, Ida sank back upon her chair, and buried her face in her hands, while hot tears forced their way through her trembling fingers. In an instant, Elphinstone was at her side.

"And I—I," he murmured convulsively; "I have none but you. Why will you close your heart against me?"

With a wild gesture, his wife flung her arms about his neck.

"Precisely as I anticipated!" said a voice, which proceeded from the unclosed door that opened upon the lawn, and Lady Malcolm, with a beaming smile and extended hand, advanced eagerly toward them.

In an instant, Mrs. Elphinstone stood erect; no trace of tears could be detected in her flashing eyes, although they still lingered on her cheeks: proudly, and even defyingly, she returned the animated glance which was fastened on her; and while Sydney grasped, with warmth and fervor, the proffered hand, his wife remained cold and motionless.

"Did I not tell you that one word would suffice to explain all?" asked their visitor, cheerfully; "and now that word has been spoken, you see the happy effect which it has produced."

"Will you do me the favor to interpret your meaning, Lady Malcolm?" asked Ida, haughtily; "for you must pardon me if I confess myself unable to comprehend either the purport of your words, or the reason of this somewhat extraordinary intrusion on the privacy of my home."

"Will you not excuse my want of ceremony in the earnestness of its motive, my dear Mrs. Elphinstone? With considerable difficulty I succeeded in convincing your husband that your late unhappiness had arisen solely from your uneasiness on the subject of a certain Lady Mary Maitland, and that, consequently, when he informed you that she was about to become Marchioness of Brentwood, you would at once appreciate at its real value the idle gossip of a few tattling women."

Mrs. Elphinstone glanced toward her husband for an instant, and a sarcastic expression passed over her features as she replied, "You are very kind, madam, to interest yourself so warmly in our domestic happiness, but, fortunately, I am too clear-sighted to become your dupe. Until this moment I never heard even the name of the lady to whom it would appear that Mr. Elphinstone was so much devoted, as to render it a matter of congratulation to me that she is about to become a wife. This was a piece of intelligence which I had yet to learn, and I thank you for the information, tardy as it is."

"Mrs. Elphinstone, what would your manner to me imply? You know how sincere an affection I feel, and have ever felt, for your husband, but even his wife may presume too far upon it."

"Oh, I can incur the threatened risk without shrinking;" said Ida, with a mocking laugh. "it is really time that we should understand each other; and I can but admire the frankness with which Lady Malcolm acknowledged an affection in which her daughter so cordially unites."

"Ida!" exclaimed her husband, imploringly.

"Suffer Mrs. Elphinstone to explain herself, Sydney," said their visitor, with calm dignity; "if I mistake not, there was an allusion made to Edith—to Miss Malcolm, which requires explanation, and I demand it here and now."

"You shall have it, madam;" said the infatuated woman, as she drew herself proudly up and confronted the pale and stately matron. "If I was not aware, until you obliged me by the information, that at the very time when Mr. Elphinstone (no doubt supposing that I must ultimately become the heiress of the wealthy Mr. Trevanion), induced me to believe that I was the only woman he had ever loved, he had so far committed himself in another quarter, as to have become the theme of idle tongues, and subjected a lady to the same mortification, I feel little disposed at the present day to resent the indignity which he then offered to me.

"I do not even seek or care to know whether on that occasion he played the flattering part of a rejected suitor; or, weighing the lady's reputed wealth with my own, conceived that the scale turned in my favor; if the former was the case, his own feelings must have been a sufficient punishment; if the latter, I am now taught to exult in a firmness on the part of my father, which I had hitherto regarded as cruelty.

"Thus, then, I trust you will perceive that, although the knowledge of Mr. Elphinstone's former attachment by no means tends to exalt my opinion of either his stability or his good faith, it can not otherwise affect my happiness. I am no child to fight with shadows. And now, as you request it, I will explain my reference to Miss Malcolm. I confess, that to myself it appears wholly unnecessary that I should do so, but since you request it—"

"I do not request, I demand it."

"Ida!" once more exclaimed her husband, in violent agitation.

Mrs. Elphinstone disregarded an appeal, of which she even appeared to be unconscious; and coldly pursued:

"You found us happy, Lady Malcolm. When you first crossed our path we were, or I believed that we were, every thing to each other; not a cloud had come between us; and what has been the result of our acquaintance?"

With a groan wrung from his very heart, Sydney flung himself on the sofa, and buried his face among the cushions. He could not bear to meet the eyes of the admirable woman and unfailing friend, who was about for his sake to be subjected to the most cruel insult, that could be offered to a mother.

"The result!" echoed Lady Malcolm, in a tone of undisguised amazement.

"The result, madam: You have a daughter younger than myself, perhaps handsomer—I am too proud, or perhaps under existing circumstances, too careless, to contest that point. I welcomed her to my home, where she has gradually supplanted me. She has been my husband's chosen companion; she consoled him by her society when, by giving birth to his child, I was condemned to the irksomeness of a sick-room; her accomplishments have administered to his amusements; her attentions have soothed his vanity; and finally, when the welfare of those who were dependent on him failed to arouse him into energy and action, she discovered the secret of awakening both, by enlisting them in her service. And you demand to know my meaning, Lady Malcolm! You, who have looked calmly on, and suffered the affections of my husband to be wrenched from me, day by day, by the wiles of an artful girl."

"No more, Ida—no more!" exclaimed her husband, suddenly springing up. "You can not understand the bearing of your words; you can not mean to imply to the mother of Edith—"

"I imply nothing, Mr. Elphinstone, and I am fully and painfully aware of my own meaning. I have endured much, and long; but all human endurance has its limits."

Lady Malcolm had turned away, but the violence of her emotion could be detected in the convulsive shiver by which her whole frame was agitated. Twice she strove to speak, but the words died away upon her lips; and her heart throbbed visibly beneath the pressure of the hand with which she strove in vain to control its beatings.

"Sydney," she said, at length, in a hoarse whisper, "I forgive your wife for your mother's sake—I can do no more. My pure, innocent child! My poor Edith! Who shall escape the tongue of slander, the taint of suspicion, since she has become their victim. Farewell, Sydney, we must meet no more on this earth. Would that our final parting had been less bitter."

"Not so, Lady Malcolm, not so," said Elphinstone, sternly, as he retained his grasp of the hand which she had extended to him; "my wife has truly said that 'all human endurance has its limits,' and I have been forced beyond the boundary of mine. I will not consent that this meeting shall be our final one; I will not consent to be abandoned by my best and oldest friend, at the bidding of a woman, who, in the indulgence of a weak and vicious passion, has forfeited at once her own dignity and the respect of her husband. I thank you that you have not attempted to vindicate your pure and injured daughter, and by so doing, cast a doubt on my own honor. Mrs. Elphinstone is, happily for us both, possessed of an income which will enable her to quit a home in which she declares herself to have been deceived, neglected, and dishonored, nor shall I ever cease to remember that she is the mother of my child, should I have it in my power to add to her worldly comfort and respectability.

"In becoming my wife, she made great and undeniable sacrifices, which I have endeavored to repay by a forbearance that has at last rendered me contemptible in my own eyes. I have deserved the indignities which have been heaped upon me, but I will now assert myself.

"Violating, as Mrs. Elphinstone has done, every principle of delicacy, she shall not have cause to reproach me with a want of generosity in my turn. I am a father, and how I have loved our boy she well knows, but I will spare her the pang which I inflict upon myself; I will not rob her of her child. She will, at least, have one being left to love, while I—I—"

"Sydney!" gasped his wife, as she approached him. "Do I understand you rightly? Do you sacrifice me and your child to those who have brought this misery upon me?"

"I ask you to make no sacrifice," was the cold reply; "I leave you free, while securing my own immunity from further insult."

"Sydney," said Lady Malcom, in her turn; "beware of forming a rash and hasty resolution. That you have been wronged is true, but you love your wife, and must not, without mature reflection, destroy the happiness of two lives."

"Doubtlessly, madam," remarked Ida, bitterly, "what Mr. Elphinstone refuses to an injured wife, he would concede to your entreaties. I, however, decline to owe any thing to the intercession of the individual—"

"Ida," interposed her husband; "let it suffice that you have hitherto been enabled to insult me with impunity; I will not suffer you to carry your madness further. If the dignity and honor of your husband are of so little importance in your eyes, that you can afford to sacrifice them to your insane and unfounded suspicions, I warn you that I shall not attempt to reciprocate the injury, but will part from you without noise or scandal; venture, however, to utter but one word affecting the reputation of those to whom you are indebted for a friendship which you have requited with the most gratuitous ingratitude, and I shall prove less forbearing. The law shall then separate us, and the world shall judge between us."

"Yet once more let me entreat—" commenced Lady Malcolm, earnestly.

"It is useless, madam," said Ida, with a calm more frightful than the wildest passion; "the question has been decided. I prefer the beggary to which Mr. Elphinstone has condemned me to any association with those whom I can neither regard nor respect, and whose very presence is irksome to me. Permit me, however, before you leave us, to assure you that I am not the victim you would fain have made me. I warned my husband before I gave him my hand, that mine was not a heart which could be trampled on with impunity. I warned him that mine was no cold and common nature, which could be stung, and requite the venom with a smile. Believe me when I say—for I say it advisedly—that I can hate as deeply as I have loved; that where I have been injured, I can requite. Do not picture me to yourself, or paint me to your daughter, as crushed by the fate to which you have mutually hurried me. The blow will fall more heavily upon my husband than upon myself. He abandons me to the comments of the world—I leave him to the reproaches of his own conscience."

Lady Malcolm offered no reply, but after wringing the hand of Sydney, walked slowly from the room, and the husband and wife were alone together.

CHAPTER XLVII.

A FIRST SEPARATION.

On the departure of Lady Malcolm, Mrs. Elphinstone had, in her turn, advanced to the door of the apartment, firmly and haughtily, but with a slow and measured step, which would, had he been inclined to do so, have afforded ample time to her husband to detain her.

Mr. Elphinstone, however, evinced no desire to control her movements. He was following Lady Malcolm with his eyes as she traversed the garden; nor did he move from the window until she had disappeared through the door of communication which opened upon her own grounds; and when he at length changed his position, his wife had left the room.

For a moment the young husband looked around him like one bewildered by a sudden blow. Even the accustomed objects by which he was surrounded appeared strange and unfamiliar. There was an expression of keen suffering upon his features, and a tremulousness in his manner, which betrayed how deeply he had been moved; but his eye was tearless as he raised his hat from the table, and, ringing for a servant, desired that Mrs. Elphinstone might be informed that he should not return home that night, and that, consequently, it would be unnecessary to detain the dinner.

Poor Sydney! The illusions of life were over for him; and he felt that henceforward he must pursue his path alone. For hours he wandered through the lanes where he had so often loitered with Ida; nor was it until the declining sun warned him that he had still to seek a home that he reluctantly turned once more into the busy thoroughfare which led toward town.

His reflections had been very bitter ones, but his conscience acquitted him of wrong; and while he remembered, with the sad yearning of regret, all that his wife had once been to him—his elegant, though modest home—his beautiful and only child—his very heart seemed bursting within him. But his resolution was not shaken even for an instant. His wounded affections might, and did, rebel; but the pride of outraged manhood gave him strength to resist their pleadings.

Still it was with a melancholy feeling of isolation that he at length reached the Temple, which he had resolved should be his future home, and gave the necessary instructions to his amazed but unquestioning clerk.

"My profession must henceforth be wife, and child, and world to me," he murmured to himself, as he sank into one of the unwieldy chairs by which his private office was encumbered. "I must forget the past, and strive to suffice to myself. I will endeavor to evoke ambition from the ashes of outraged affection. I can not be happy, but I may yet be true to myself."

It was a bold vaunt; but, even as he uttered it, he felt its emptiness, and, after a sharp struggle with feelings which he vainly stigmatized as weak and womanly, he bent his head upon the desk before him, and wept bitterly.

He was alone; and no prying eye could note his tears. For awhile this conviction gave him a sense of relief, which was almost happiness; but soon the consciousness returned to him that thus he must ever be; that, alike in grief or toil, he must remain companionless—uncheered by the sympathy of home; that, husband and father though he was, the tenderness of a wife, the love of a child, would no longer make his labor light, or his success a triumph.

And he was still so young! So full of the best and holiest impulses of life! To what long and weary years of existence might he not be condemned? The reflection startled him. No! the life of study and intellectual struggle upon which he had decided so prematurely, would not suffice to blot out the bitter memories of the past. He could not breathe the same air, or exist in the same hemisphere, with the woman he had so dearly loved—the child upon whom he had built up so many hopes.

"I will labor on until I have insured their comfort and well-being," was his next resolve. "I will restore to her, by my exertions, the affluence which, for my sake, she abandoned; my boy shall cease to be a beggar; and then, when I have secured my name from reproach, the world will be before me, and I will hew out my own path unflinchingly."

The darkness grew dense about him; every object in the vast and dreary room became dim and indistinct; and the deep silence of the ancient pile was rendered still more oppressive by the hollow reverberations from the busy streets beyond.

The tide of feeling rushed back upon him. The past, with all its hopes and all its affections, rose on his memory with mocking brilliancy; and with lingering tenderness he lived over again the few brief months of happiness and love that he had passed with Ida.

"Is it firmness or cowardice which has impelled me to the extreme step that I have now taken?" he asked himself. "Is it not my duty to endure all, until I have secured the competence which is now mine only in perspective, and which may even fail me yet? Dare I abandon the woman who, in the unselfish confidence of a trusting heart, gave herself to me in my poverty and obscurity, when she might have become the wife of one who could have surrounded her with all the luxuries of life?

"In seeking to assert myself, I have been alike ungenerous and unjust; but it is not yet too late to repair my fault. She can not mistake my motive, if I tell her frankly the decision at which I have arrived. To-morrow, then—to-morrow I will once more return to that home which I believed that I had abandoned forever. I will strive to remember all that she once was to me, and forget that which she now is. I will support my wrongs in silence, until I can liberate both her and myself with honor.

"It is bitter, very bitter; but it must be borne. She does not comprehend how I have loved, how I still love her, and it is better so; she will have one regret the less when the hour of separation at length comes. Yes, I feel that I have decided rightly. She is too young, too beautiful, to be abandoned to a hollow and cold-hearted world until she possesses the means of compelling its respect. I have—I ought to have no alternative—and I will meet my fate courageously, cruel as it is."

As the unhappy young man arrived at this determination, he rang for lights, which were no sooner placed before him, than with nervous rapidity he unsealed and read the letters which lay upon his table; and for a brief moment a smile of exultation played about his lips. There was work before him; not assistance coldly and grudgingly tendered, but opportunities of usefulness pressed cordially and flatteringly upon him. His heart might be silenced forever, but his intellect was about to be called into full exercise; and henceforth he must live for fame, and forget his private sorrows in his public duties.

In the excitement of the moment he seized his pen, and far into the night, alone, fasting, and heart-crushed, he labored on.

His solitude was uninvaded, his wants unheeded. He was alone with his vanished visions, his blighted hopes, his withered trust; nor was it until the cold gray dawn stole with its dreary gleam into the room, that he at length flung himself upon a sofa, and fell into a deep and comfortless sleep.

And how had Ida—she who had wilfully wrecked her own happiness and that of a husband whom she loved with all the passionate ardor of her ill-governed nature—how had she passed the night in which she had become worse than widowed? At times on her knees beside the cradle of her child, weeping such tears as leave their trace forever upon the heart from which they flow—upbraiding herself, her destiny—regretting the past—shrinking from the future—and listening with a beating heart for the returning step of him whom she had outraged. At times pacing the room with rapid and unequal steps, braving the fate which her own folly had brought upon her, and striving to believe that she no longer loved him.

As the night wore on, and the clock of a neighboring church pealed out the hour of midnight, however, all the false energy by which she had hitherto been sustained, forsook her. Never, until the moment in which she at length despaired of his return, had she been fully conscious how necessary Sydney was to her existence. Even her child was forgotten in the utter despair which took possession of her. The very firmness with which he had brought this wretchedness upon her compelled her respect; and for awhile she cowered beneath the conviction of his unsuspected strength of character. This prostration of spirit was, however, only temporary.

"Be it so," she murmured to herself; "the contest will no longer be an unequal one: in bruising my heart, he will crush his own; for even while he betrayed me, I feel that he loved me still. I have no longer a home—scarcely a name—and yet I will defy the fate to which he has condemned me. Time will prove who can best bear up against the trial.

"But no, no; that seeming strength could have been but momentary. Sydney, you have deceived yourself; it is not I who am destined to be the victim: you can not, you dare not, abandon both wife and child, and brave the world without sympathy or support. No, I feel and know that you will yet return to my feet a suppliant; but it shall be too late, even did you sue to me this very hour. You abandon me to poverty; I accept it, for you will have condemned yourself to an existence far more wretched; and while the world may sympathize in my privations, you shall never know the keener pangs that you have inflicted on my heart.

"Ay," she pursued still more bitterly; "the moment in which you have thrust me forth to struggle with that world has been well chosen. Your path is smooth before you; you have felt the intoxicating consciousness of success—the future is bright in its promise; and it is now—now—that you assume the semblance of a power which I defy.

"Were I still the spoiled and pampered heiress. I could forgive you; for then indeed I could, without humiliation, welcome you back to my heart, and struggle to forget the past—I shall be very wretched, but I, too, can be firm; here have been martyrs who have smiled at the stake; and I, like them, will endure my martyrdom without complaint, proudly conscious that I shall not suffer alone."

Day broke; the busy hum of men rose on the air; the sorrowing, who had for a few brief hours forgotten their cares in sleep, awoke to renewed grief; the happy sprang from their beds, exulting in a new season of enjoyment; and ere the sun had long been above the horizon, Sydney Elphinstone, true to his purpose of the previous night, was already on his way, self-accusing and self-rebuked, to his now cheerless home.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

HOME.

"At last!" murmured Ida to herself, as from the window of her dressing-room, which she had flung open in order to cool her aching brow in the fresh morning air, she saw her husband pass the gate of the lawn, and approach the house: "I knew that it must be so; a few short hours have sufficed to show him that he overrated his own strength; this is as I would have it;—I shall not be the forsaken wife, thrust forth from the hearth and heart of the man on whose truth and loyalty she had relied; but the indignant and self-avenging woman, who has energy enough to revenge her own wrongs!"

As she thus communed with her own thoughts, she hastily bound up her hair, bathed her swollen eyes with cold water, and arranged her dress, which, in the irritation of a long and sleepless night, had become disordered.

As the Indian suttee decorates herself with the most costly jewels ere she prepares to ascend the funeral-pyre of her husband, so did Mrs. Elphinstone, strong in her resolution to resist the pleadings of Sydney, and to inflict on him a pang which must, nevertheless, as she was painfully conscious, recoil upon herself, and calmly before her glass, and endeavor with fastidious care to obliterate every vestige of the suffering through which she had just passed, ere she doomed herself to life-long misery by rejecting all overtures to a reconciliation which might yet have saved them both.

Slowly, and with an unruffled brow, she ultimately descended to the breakfast-room; and there, as she had anticipated, she found her husband—not calm and collected like herself—but evidently laboring under an agitation by which he was thoroughly unnerved.

As she entered the apartment, he turned abruptly toward her, and extended his hand; but the action was unheeded by his wife, who, uttering a cold and brief "good morning," preferred to lay her own hand upon the bell.

"Hear me, Ida," he said eagerly, as he interrupted the movement; "before our solitude is invaded by the entrance of a servant, let me tell you that I have recognized my fault; wounded pride and the resentment of a heart smitten in its best affections hurried me into a harshness foreign to my nature, and unworthy of one whom, however lightly you may now regard his happiness, you once loved.

"Let us forget the past, at least until I can provide you with a home more congenial to your tastes and habits. We can never again be to each other what we once were; but we may still live under the shelter of the same roof, and, by mutual forbearance, replace our lost illusions by a calm and peaceful reality.

"Our position must be a painful and an onerous one, as I well know; but if we both strive to render it endurable, surely we may succeed."

"Mr. Elphinstone," was the cold reply, "the picture which you have sketched is by no means an attractive one. That you have, since you left your home, recognized the cowardice and selfishness of sacrificing your wife to the woman who has supplanted her in your affections, I am rejoiced to hear, as it proves that you are not as yet thoroughly forgetful of your responsibilities as a husband and a father; and for your own sake, I am glad of this, although the fact can not for a moment affect either my happiness or my determination.

"You are right, I did love you once—truly, deeply, fervently—but that time is past. Ida Trevanion confided in you—honored you—would have laid down her life to brighten yours—and clung to you through every change of fortune. Ida Elphinstone honors you no longer, confides in you no longer: her idol has been cast from its pedestal, and she has found it clay.

"Do not mistake yourself; it is no sublime and self-abnegating repentance which now leads you to confess and to deplore your injustice; it is simply a sense of the void which our separation will cause in your future existence. You still love me, in spite of yourself—in spite of the wrong that you have done me—the indignity to which you have exposed me—and you can not contemplate without terror the consequences of a final rupture between us. I am still, as ever, necessary to your happiness; and it is for your own sake, not for mine, that you are anxious to avert the evil."

"Ida, I swear to you, that were I at this moment possessed of the affluence to which I trust one day to attain—were I enabled to place you in the position from which I rashly hurled you down—believing, vain fool that I was! that my love would compensate to you for every sacrifice—I should not now be here, pleading to you to relieve me from self-rebuke.

"Even now, I do not ask of you to pardon any thing beyond the impetuous and unconsidered resolution which I yesterday expressed, for, save in that solitary instance, I have nothing to regret—nothing with which to reproach myself. All I entreat—and believe me when I say that I do it earnestly—is, that you will remain beneath my roof, and under my protection, until I am enabled to feel that my ill-omened love has not entailed upon you the misery and suffering of poverty.

"Like yourself, I was weak while I believed that I possessed your affection, but, like yourself, I have acquired strength by trial. I can bear to live without you; I can dare to look forward to an existence unsolaced by affection; but I can not brook that the woman I have loved should be exposed to trials to which she could never have been subjected had she not become my wife."

"You talk bravely," said Ida, with a withering sneer; "the future will prove in how far you are justified in using such high-sounding words. Once more, I tell you that I am revenged; I will not remain another day beneath your roof.

"I express no gratitude for your assumed anxiety in my future welfare; for, specious as the argument might seem to one unacquainted with your nature, it can never mislead me. In your egotism, you dread the comments of the world; the contempt which must attach to a man who, after winning the heart of a trusting woman who had hitherto known nothing of life save its enjoyments, thrust her forth to poverty when she was bold enough to resent her wrongs.

"Well, sir, to these unsparing comments, to that withering contempt, you shall be subjected. I am no hireling, to await in humble submission the good pleasure of a master. I will owe you nothing—I will not even accept as a boon from your hand, the guardianship of my child, for you dare not wrest him from me. Unlike yourself, I have a regret—I have a reproach. I regret that the fortune of the heiress did not enable you to secure the affluence which, in all probability, invested me, in your eyes, with charms that faded under the disappointment which supervened; and I reproach, not you, but myself, that I was weak enough to be deluded into supposing that such must not inevitably have been the case."

"Ida," said Elphinstone, sadly, "passion has made you illogical. If it indeed be as you affirm, and that I am in truth guilty of the ungenerous weakness of which I am now accused; if your loss of fortune, forfeited as it was for my sake, has rendered you less dear to me; then why should I shrink from the destiny which you have hewn out for me? How can I love you still with a fervor which you have declared me unable to control or to subdue? By prophesying my life-long misery in resigning you, you still confess your faith in the stability of my affection, and tacitly admit the falsehood of your own accusations; by fastening upon me the vice of avarice, you divest me of those finer feelings which could alone render my future isolated existence a burden and a pang. The comments of a world, to which, for your sake, I shall offer no explanation, I shall know how to despise; its contempt I shall regard as little, until I have compelled its respect. Do not, therefore, delude yourself; but pause ere you suffer passion to overwhelm your reason. Once more, and for the last time, I entreat of you to have mercy upon us both."

"And once more, and for the last time, I refuse to comply with your entreaty," vehemently replied his wife; "my boy will suffice to me; and I trust that, for your own sake, you may be enabled to derive equal consolation in the smiles of your mother's friend and her inestimable daughter, or in those of the Lady Mary Maitland, who had the honor of preceding me in your affections, until, like a wayward child, you weary of the new toy as you wearied of the old one.

"The world is wide, Mr. Elphinstone, and you are becoming its favorite; I should be unwilling to cast one shadow upon the brightness of your path. You have assured me that the fame which you have lately acquired must bring fortune in its train; enjoy that fortune without scruple and without stint, for, from the hour in which I quit your house, I make no claim upon you; I reject all favors, all concessions; I came to you almost penniless, and almost penniless I am content to continue. Console yourself as I shall—if you can"

"And this is your final resolution?"

"It is."

"So be it, then," was the rejoinder of the young husband; "I had hoped that the memory of the past—the fate of our only child—might have weighed with you; but I have deceived myself, and will urge you no further. Only remember, Ida, that a few hours hence, should you repent your decision, it will already be too late. Since you refuse to accord to me even the right of contributing to your necessities, I shall feel little inclination to waste my life in profitless labor, nor shall the name of the man, toward whom you have evinced a hatred so unbounded and uncompromising, ever again be intruded upon you. You have nothing more to fear either from my affection or my enmity. As you have justly remarked, the world is wide; I will make my home beyond the reach of inquiry or pursuit. I am young and strong; strong in purpose as in frame. Wretched I may be, but I shall at least be a stranger to remorse. I have endeavored to fulfill my duty to the last; and, if I have failed, I am content to abide the consequences of my error."

For an instant the firmness of Mrs. Elphinstone forsook her; there was a depth of feeling in the accents of her husband that fell cold and heavy on her heart; but she would not yield; and she was about to utter some chilling rejoinder, when a servant entered, and placed a couple of letters on the table.

Without even glancing at the superscription, and anxious to impress upon her husband that at the very moment in which he was threatening to expatriate himself—thus rendering all possibility of their future reconciliation impossible—she was indifferent to a resolution beneath which she nevertheless quailed, she tore open that which lay nearest to her; and she was unable to suppress a start of surprise as she recognized, in the lengthy and highly-perfumed epistle, the handwriting of Lady Mary Brooklands. A blended feeling of astonishment and contempt impelled her to read it to the end.

Experience had taught her the hollowness of her former friend; and as this was the first communication which she had received from her since her marriage, a vague suspicion crossed her mind that her astute ladyship must have been impelled by some powerfu motive to lavish upon her the laudatory endearments which formed the staple of the missive.

Suddenly, however, affecting to remember the presence of her husband, she held toward him the still open letter, saying, as she did so:

"A letter from your amiable aunt, Mr. Elphinstone. It may, perhaps, interest you to cast your eye over it."

Sydney received it with a silent bow, but it was merely to fold and replace it on the table; and he was just about to quit the room, when a wild cry from his wife arrested him. Ida sat motionless, with her eyes fixed in vacancy, and a bulky packet with a deep black border, of which she had just broken the seal, crushed convulsively in her hands.

"Read it, Sydney, if you would save my senses," she at length gasped out, in a shrill whisper; "read it, for I can not."

Elphinstone took the packet from her hands, and instantly detected the familiar characters of Mr. Trevanion. He, however, evinced no emotion; but the contents of the letter what they might, he imagined that they could in no way interest himself; but he erred in his judgment.

Thus while Ida, panting from agitation, listened with parted lips and starting eyes, he stood calm and unmoved; and his voice was as clear and steady, as its wont, as he prepared to obey her.

Thus ran the letter.

CHAPTER XLIX.

THE LETTER.

"TREVANION HALL, August, 184-.

"WHEN the daughter to whom I had intrusted alike my future happiness, and the realization of my most cherished hopes, left the shelter of my roof to throw herself into the arms of an obscure and needy lover, I believed that I had forever closed my heart against her.

"She well knew that through her, and by her, I would alone attain the object to which I had devoted the whole energies of a laborious life; that I had neither support nor sympathy to anticipate from the woman whom I had made my wife; that my path toward the goal to which I aspired was beset by mortification; that my position was a false one; and that the present was only rendered endurable to me by the probable results of the future.

"That daughter was my only child; and the disappointment inflicted upon me at her birth, might perhaps to have prepared me for the still keener mortification to which I was subjected by her marriage. It did not, however, even in the moment of painful excitement, when her sex was revealed to me. I at once felt that the infant, at least, was blameless—that it was an accident of fate; and I was no sooner satisfied that I had little prospect of gain becoming a father than I resolved to do for the girl, who was destined to be my heir-at-all that I would have done for the son who would have perpetuated my name.

"You best know, Mrs. Sydney Elphinstone, how I redeemed the pledge made to myself within a few years of your birth. You best know how care and gold were alike lavished on your infancy, your girlhood, and your maturity; but what you did not perhaps understand was this: that in administering with ready hand to your vanity, your luxury, and your egotism, in developing your talents, and in affording to you every opportunity of enhancing those personal qualities with which you had been gifted by nature—as if to convince me that the darling project of my life might yet be accomplished—I was actuated, less by a weak feeling of pride in your personal and mental endowments, than by a desire to accomplish my purpose.

"Had I left you to the sole guardianship of a fond and mindless mother, you would have grown to womanhood as obscure as herself, and as unworthy to co-operate in my own views; and thus, you would have had no right to aspire to a fate less mean than that to which you saw fit to condemn yourself.

"And now, for the last time—as henceforth the subject must never again be mooted between us—let me impress upon you—that you have deserved no forgiveness at my hands. I trusted in you, and you betrayed my trust. I had confided to you the irksomeness of my position—the humiliation which I had endured from my nearest relatives; I had poured out my heart before you, and made you feel how essential your obedience to my wishes must inevitably prove to my ultimate resumption of the social rank to which I was entitled by my birth; and you failed me.

"You fled from my house like a detected felon, and you have paid the penalty of your fault. With ostentatious pride, you left behind you every article of luxury to which the world could affix a price; but you strangely overlooked the fact that you carried away with you a father's hopes and a mother's peace of mind. Were you less culpable than if you had broken into my strong-box, or rifled your mother's jewel-case of its last diamond? I leave it to yourself to answer.

"You had wealth within your grasp; a coronet at your feet; cupidity and ambition might alike have been satisfied, and you rejected both—for what? To unite yourself to one who deprived you of every worldly advantage—to see your first-born son come into life a beggar—and to welcome the alms of an offended father as a boon from Heaven; while even for those, trifling as the gift would have appeared in the days when you had not a wish ungratified, you were indebted—not to any voluntary relenting on my part (for my experience has taught me that no human being exists upon the earth who might not be independent of the sordid wants of the world, did he not invite them either by imprudence or dishonor)—but to the intercession of your friend, Lady Malcolm.

"I am far from justifying the interference of a stranger in such delicate matters as those of family differences; and it is even probable that I might have resented her ladyship's intrusion on the occasion to which I have alluded, had I not been aware that she was one of the most valued friends of Sir Jasper Trevanion, to whom I felt convinced that she would represent your necessities, should I fail to relieve them—a humiliation to which I would not have exposed myself for half my fortune. To her, therfore, and not to myself, you owe the temporary assistance, which I trust proved serviceable to you in your need.

"And now, as I presume that I have enabled you fully to comprehend the nature of our relative positions, I will proceed to explain my reasons for terminating the silence which has so long existed between us.

"You are a wife and a mother; in the first of these capacities I am not only willing, but even anxious, to ignore your pre-existenee as much as possible; nor, from all that has reached me, am I inclined to suppose that you are less desirous than myself, to render the chain as light as may be practicable, without exposing yourself to the idle gossiping of a censorious world.

"As a mother, however, the case should be, and must be, widely different. Circumstances have occurred, which tend to make the son of Mr. Sydney Elphinstone of considerable importance to the Trevanion family; and these I shall now communicate to you in detail, in order that you may decide upon your future line of action.

"About the period of your child's birth, and while my uncle, Sir Jasper, was engaged in preparing the settlements, resetting the family diamonds, and completing the equipages which he had been to town to superintend, previous to the marriage of his son with Miss Edith Malcolm, your cousin, Herbert Trevanion, whose health had long been visibly declining, became rapidly worse; and, with a want of moral courage which was, perhaps, fortunate for his successors—as he might (under the blind influence of a first passion, which you will in all probability not feel tempted, from your own experience, to doubt), have forced some imprudent concessions from his doating father—he never warned him of the fact of his approaching end, until it became too late for the baronet to divert any portion of the family possessions from their legitimato channel; and thus he ultimately died, without having effected the slightest alteration in the will which Sir Jasper had executed in favor of him and his heirs.

"Nor was this all; for the baronet, utterly prostrated by the suddenness of the bereavement which had rendered his old age desolate—and mark, Ida, that like you he had flung from him those who might have sustained and embellished his existence, had he done them justioo—fell powerless beneath the blow; physically he resisted the shock, but his mind was less energetic than his frame; from that hour in which his son ceased to exist, he became a puling idiot.

"You will think this shocking, Ida, but this is, nevertheless, what men call retribution. In his pride and strength he drove me from his roof; in his imbecility and weakness, I made it safe and firm above him; in my youth he cast me forth; in his age I had secured to him the legitimate shelter of his homo.

"I am told that, legally, he was dead, and that I could in my turn have lorded it over his helplessness. I need not say that I did not do so. My wrongs were sufficiently atoned, and I scorned the baseness of a vulgar vengeance.

"Thus far, nothing had occurred with which I could not grapple single-handed, without one feeling of misgiving as regarded my own strength; but more was still to follow, which forced upon me the recollection that I was still a father; and that, although sinned against almost beyond forgiveness, I was bound to pardon the child who had offended, as well as the relative who had injured me.

"Four days since, I received a hasty summons to this place. The physical strength of Sir Jasper Trevanion had failed, but his intellect had been restored to him. I found him on his death-bed, but I already knew that he had long repented his injustice toward me, and I abstained from all reproach.

"As I stood beside his pillow, old memories, indeed, revived, but I thrust them back; and it was with a true heart and a calm brow that I pressed the hand which he extended to me. But for me, the old man would have been childless and desolate; like me, he had been for a time proud and relentless; now he clung to me as the only being left to him on earth, to whom he could turn for comfort and support—who could save his death-bed from the intrusion of strangers and hirelings—who could close his eyes with the hand of affection, and follow him to the grave with the reverence of relationship; and, as I saw and felt all this, Ida, my heart, long closed against all such emotion, yearned toward you.

"As I forgave in that solemn hour the man who had marred my youth, so did I also forgive you, who had blighted my age.

"He died that night; and until dawn I watched beside him, alone; for he had read to me the one great lesson of my life: and while I gazed in silence upon his rigid brow and compressed lips, never again to be unsealed in this world, and which had closed in the utterance of a blessing upon myself for the generosity with which I had requited his injustice, I felt that I could afford to forget all the past. It therefore, remains for you to assist me in the effort

"I will not deceive you. The fact that you have a son, who must at my death succeed to the Trevanion estates, and bear the name of my ancestors, has not been without its effect in strengthening my resolution. It were idle to deny that such is the case; but here, in the house of death, where the light of day is replaced by the glare of waxen tapers, and the voices of my fellow-men by the low whispers which seem to be a foretaste of the hollow murmurs of the burial-vaults, where—after one gloomy pageant—all will relapse into silence until it again opens to receive my own corpse. I am startled by the consciousness that I no longer suffice to myself.

"I strive to conquer this weakness by dwelling upon the change that has come over my fortunes; by the reflection that I am now almost fabulously wealthy; by endeavoring to accustom my ear to the new titles by which I am addressed by those about me; and—shall I confess it?—I feel scorn of myself that I should be so unmanned by events perfectly natural in themselves, and which others will regard as utterly common-place, or as mere matter of congratulation.

"Thus it is, however; and you will, consequently, understand that you have once more become essential to my happiness.

"Do not fail me a second time. These morbid feelings will pass away when I am once more involved in the cares and interests of life; and you are well aware that to you alone I can turn with confidence to assist me in the new duties which have devolved upon me.

"Your mother, Lady Trevanion, has no interests in common with myself, save such as affect her own comfort and convenience; no intellect on which I can repose, no judgment to which I can appeal; while, as regards Lady Mary Brooklands, you need only look back upon your own past career to feel that she is precisely the last person to whom I would intrust the care of either my dignity or my honor.

"Thus, Ida, a new career of triumph awaits you. Your former home, and the arms of your father, are open to you; the future existence of your son is defined, and beyond the reach of fate. So soon as the tomb has closed over my aged relative, I shall return to town, where I shall anxiously await you, trusting that your future affection and obedience will obliterate the past.

"You need fear no reproach, entertain no apprehension of my prolonged displeasure. Greatly as you have been to blame, your punishment has exceeded your fault. I am prepared alike to forgive and to forget.

"I forward to you, by this post, a letter from your husband's aunt, which, by some mistake, was sent here with others addressed to myself. If it be as I conjecture, that her sapient ladyship foresaw the probability of our reconciliation, and has written to reclaim her place in your affections—or, to speak more distinctly—to secure her own future interests, by affecting a sympathy in your trials which she has never felt, do not suffer yourself to be misled by her speciousness.

"She is heart and soul an egotist; she sacrificed you to the necessities of her nephew, and now she would be equally ready to sacrifice you to her own.

"Once more, Ida, be just to yourself, and hasten to resume your proper station in society. By this day week I shall be again established in that home to which I am prepared to welcome you back, and where I trust to see the hopes which you once blighted in your own person, either restored with increased brilliancy, or renewed and realized in that of your son.

"HUBERT TREVANION."

CHAPTER L.

CONCLUSION.

"SYDNEY!" exclaimed Mrs. Elphinstone, springing from her seat, and casting herself on her knees, with clasped hands and streaming eyes, "Sydney, we are saved!"

"We are!"

"The past has been a hideous dream; the future is bright before us."

Elphinstone was silent.

"Why do you not speak, Sydney," pursued his wife; "why do you not exult with me in the blessed prospect which has opened upon us?"

"I do indeed rejoice that my most ardent desire has been granted, Ida," said her husband, in the calm accents of deep and concentrated feeling, "that both you and our boy are now secured against all possibility of struggle and privation. My heart is relieved of a weight by which it was crushed to the very earth, and I am thankful, most thankful."

"And yourself, Sydney? What of yourself?"

"Myself," replied the young man, bitterly, "what should I say of myself, save that I exult in the reflection that Mr. Trevanion's daughter will no longer be sacrificed to my necessities."

"Mr. Trevanion's daughter!" echoed Ida, hoarsely, as she rose to her feet, and looked earnestly into his face; "Mr. Trevanion's daughter! Have I then ceased to be your wife?"

"Legally, no; but even that barrier to your future happiness may be removed, should you desire it."

"Sydney, do not torture me! Tell me what you mean."

"Simply that I have interpreted the true sense of your father's closing sentences. I am still too young to suppose that he can have speculated upon my death, when he expressed so ardent a hope that his dreams of ambition, as regarded yourself, might still be realized. Too young to die, as men commonly understand the term, but still old enough for that death of the soul—divorce."

A sharp scream burst from the lips of Ida.

"Why should you shrink from such a climax to our married life?" pursued Sydney, in the same unimpassioned tone. "Did you not willfully deny my claim upon your affections? Did you not, unauthorized and uninfluenced by the sanction of a parent, spurn my protection as an insult, and my roof as a disgrace? Did you not avow that I no longer possessed either your love or your respect? Have you so soon forgotten the contempt with which you rejected my offers of aid—my earnest entreaties that you would allow me to fulfill those duties toward you which I had vowed at the altar? Have we not, from that moment, been severed in heart and fact; and do you now quail before a mere form which would liberate you in the eyes of the world, and leave you free to make a nobler and a better choice?"

"Sydney!" gasped out his wife, vehemently clasping his arm, while her whole frame quivered with emotion; "Sydney, forgive me! Poor and helpless, I could have lived without you; or, if the effort had proved too mighty for my strength, I could have died without a murmur, for life would have been valueless without your love; but now—now—on my knees, I implore of you to pity and to pardon me."

"It is too late," said Elphinstone, as he turned gloomily away; "one of those tears, one of those supplications, only an hour back, would have sufficed to restore pardon and peace between us; but the moment of reconciliation has now gone by forever. Even as you spurned my entreaties, Ida, do I now reject yours. Let it suffice, that one of my family has debased herself by accepting the benefits grudgingly doled out to her by the insolence of wealth; do not hope to force a similar concession from myself."

"Sydney, have you no mercy, no pity? I have deceived both you and myself. Never, never, did I love you more deeply, more devotedly, than when, in my mad folly, I accused and wronged you—yes, wronged you; I will even believe that I did you wrong, if you will only once more take me to your heart, and call me by the blessed name of wife."

"You deceive yourself still, Ida; if in the obscurity of our present home you placed no faith in an affection which was subjected only to one solitary trial; if you could not see me evince a brotherly interest in a young and fatherless girl, who had been the playmate of my boyhood, and who had been reared under the eyes of an anxious and high-principled mother—how can you hope to induce me to place any faith in a pledge wrung from you in a moment of strong excitement?

"Learn to know yourself better. The man who could not escape suspicion under such circumstances would be weak indeed to believe that he could be more secure, when the opportunities of misjudging him were multiplied a hundredfold. I can not take you to my heart, Ida, though I can not pluck you thence; though I do not hesitate to admit, should the admission still afford you one sensation of happiness or triumph, that you alone have ever, or can ever, possess it. I dare not call you wife, for you yourself have repudiated the title."

"For our child's sake—"

"Ida, in my turn I ask, have you no mercy? Am I not to be parted from my child? Have I not completed my sacrifice, and, in return for all that I have done and suffered, I ask but this.

"Let the world condemn me if it will, let your own heart accuse me if it can, but do not let my boy misjudge me: let me, at least, be blameless and honorable in his eyes. I claim, I demand, this justice; and it is the last appeal I shall make to your generosity. We may never meet again; in a few years I shall have faded from his memory, and—Ida, for the love which you once bore me, will you not promise me that he shall never learn to loathe or despise his father? He will not even bear my name—I know it, but I do not murmur; it is my fate to resign every claim, every tie, which once bound me to an existence of delusive promise, and I submit in silence; yet, still I can not forget that I have a child; that he is very dear to me, and that he is torn away from me forever."

"And your wife—your wife!" shrieked Ida.

Elphinstone turned toward her as she still knelt upon the floor, her hands tightly clinched together, her long and abundant hair, which had escaped the comb which should have confined it, half concealing her slight figure, and her livid features convulsed with agony; for a moment he stood gazing upon her as motionless as though he had been hewn in stone; then his breast heaved, a smothered sob escaped him, a few inarticulate words burst in a hollow murmur from his lips, and with frantic energy he bent down, raised her to his bosom, held her there for a few seconds, and, as he felt her weight grow heavy in his arms, he laid her softly upon a sofa, and rushed from his home.

A month afterward, Mrs. Elphinstone was the self-widowed inmate of her father's house; Lady Mary Brooklands was in modest lodgings in a West-End street; and no trace could be discovered of the young, heart-broken exile, who had abandoned his native land forever.

THE END.

THE RIVAL BEAUTIES.

CHAPTER. I.

On the southern outskirt of a pleasant town in the west of England, which I shall here call Westrum, stood an antique-looking house, evidently never originally intended to suffer such close contact with the mercantile street from which it was distant little more than a hundred yards. A lofty wall, of dull red brick, divided into equal lengths by a richly decorated gate of wrought iron, supported by pillars of coarse granite, each surmounted by a rudely-sculptured griffin with its dexter claw resting upon a dagger, skirted the high road for a considerable distance on either hand; overtopped here and there by the stately crest of a pine, or the spreading branches of an aged oak; while from the gate itself, a straight avenue of limes, whose dense foliage almost shut out the sunlight, extended to the house-door, which was approached by a stately flight of broad stone steps. The dwelling was vast, plain in its appearance, and evidently constructed rather for comfort than for show. From the road it presented simply a solid square of brick-work, with its regularly-pierced windows encased in that peculiarly wrought stone which looks as though it had been subjected to the action of a strong rippling tide; but on the side which faced the extensive grounds the uniformity was broken up by a boldly-projecting bay, where large glass doors, opening upon a lawn, afforded an unimpeded view into the vast saloon beyond them.

A spacious conservatory, rich in rare and exotic plants, abutted upon this summer apartment, whence it was approached by a lateral door; and when this was flung back, flooded the room with perfume; while the eye was equally entranced by the lovely home-view presented by the luxuriant shrubberies, the glittering little stream that terminated the descent of the sloping lawn, and the gambols of a couple of tame deer, which browsed or sported confidingly under the shadows of the tall trees, among whose leafy branches roosted a stately peacock.

The whole appearance of such an establishment in such a position was an anachronism. The venerable building was vast enough to have shown to advantage, as regarded its capabilities, in the midst of a park of some hundred acres, whereas it was seated on the verge of a property scarcely exceeding six; while the undeniable marks of antiquity which it bore about it, were sufficient to satisfy the mind of a stranger, that the little town, by which it was now elbowed, had grown up to it, after the fashion of the continental villages, which spring like fungi about a wealthy monastic house.

In the centre saloon to which we have referred, were seated, on a glorious autumnal noon, two ladies in deep mourning dresses. The close cap, concealed hair, and long crape weepers of the elder, at once betrayed her recent widowhood; even had not the hatchment which surmounted the principal entrance already convinced those who looked upon it, that sorrow and bereavement had lately visited this placid dwelling. She sat, or rather reclined, in a large chair, with her eyes fixed on vacancy, and evidently buried in thought; but that her reflections were not altogether painful was evident, from the faint smile which at intervals played about her faded lips. She was still handsome, although no longer young; and her countenance beamed with that graciousness which so attractively succeeds the bloom of youth in certain well-constituted natures. Time had touched her lightly; and it was easy to see that she had not cared to rebel against his advances. Tall, and finely formed, the elasticity of her movements almost belied the matronly years which had passed over her; for Mrs. Mortimer had lately suffered the first deep sorrow of a calm and happy life, while she had still many blessings to compensate for her one heavy loss; and thus her heart had not grown old with time, but had remained pure, and warm, and generous, and shed its genial influence over her whole person.

There is something very beautiful in such an autumn-tide of life as this. Something almost holy, which affords a moral homily that all would do well to read. Not a line had yet furrowed the high pale brow of Mrs. Mortimer; the finger of passion; the seal of vanity vexed into asperity by trampling upon its own ruin; the withering regret which lingers bitterly over the past that it lacks power to recall, had left no token of their passage on that placid countenance. All there was love and peace; and few would have wished the clear soft eye more dazzling, or the benignant smile more gay.

Her companion was a fair girl, who could have numbered but sixteen or seventeen summers. She too, as we have said, was attired in close and deep mourning; relieved, however, by a broad falling collar and wristbands of white crape; and still more by a profusion of light auburn hair, which flowed in redundant masses over her shoulders. Nothing could be more faultless than the pure Grecian outline of that young face and form; nor more angelic than the expression of the speaking features, even tempered as it was by a shade of sadness, which appeared rather habitual to them than the mere effect of circumstances.

She was seated before an embroidery-frame; and save when she occasionally glanced anxiously towards the elder lady, as if to convince herself that the protracted reverie into which she had fallen was not one calculated to increase her melancholy, she plied her needle busily and mechanically; although from the varying expression of her face, it might be readily surmised that the elaborate undertaking in which she was engaged employed her fingers far more than her thoughts.

"Gertrude," murmured Mrs. Mortimer suddenly, as withdrawing her eyes from the unseen object on which they had so long been fixed, she turned them upon her companion; "I am beginning to weary for the return of Frederic. And you, my dear girl, shall you not, like me, be rejoiced to welcome him once more to his home, even bereaved as it is?"

A deep and burning blush was the only reply elicited by the question; but as if unconscious of the fact, Mrs. Mortimer pursued in an accent of tenderness.

"Poor dear Frederic! How devotedly he loved his father; and how little did he apprehend, when he hung upon his neck so fondly on his departure for this long and adventurous journey, that he looked on him for the last time!"

"My dear aunt!" sobbed out a low soft voice.

"Forgive me, my beloved child!" said Mrs. Mortimer, as she extended her arms, into which the fair girl flung herself with a passionate burst of tears; "I distress you as well as myself, by these incautious repinings; and I have still so much for which to be grateful! But when I think of my noble-hearted boy, and of the fresh trial which awaits us on our meeting, I can scarcely sustain the prospect, even while I pine to have him once more beside me. You too, Gertrude—you, upon whom I have built up such bright dreams of happiness to come; you can understand the struggle, can you not? You love your cousin; you know all his worth, his manliness, his high and well-grounded principle. You love the bold and gallant boy who was the playmate of your infancy; the bright-eyed and warm-hearted youth who was the associate of your girlhood; you share with me in all my hopes and fears. Tell me frankly, Gertrude, do you not love him?"

A second blush, which almost dried the tears that rested upon her cheeks, was a more definite answer than the few inarticulate words by which it was accompanied.

"And now, Gertrude," pursued Mrs. Mortimer with a fond smile; "draw forward that stool, and seat yourself at my feet, for I have much to say to you; much on which not only your own happiness depends, but mine, and, I trust and believe, that of Frederic also. Nay, silly child, why do you tremble? Surely your busy little heart must already have warned you of what is to come; for I have long given you cause to feel convinced that you are as dear to me as my own child; and that it was in the hope you would one day become such, that I have cherished you, and bestowed upon you a place in my heart whence nothing can cast you out. You know, Gertrude, that when, on the death of your poor father, (whose heart was broken by the loss of his young and amiable wife,) who survived your birth only a few short weeks, his brother brought you home, and placed you in my arms as a trust from Heaven, you were far too young to have any consciousness of your bereavement: and the smiling infant grew into the laughing child beneath this roof, without a care or a regret. You have been a blessing to me, my sweet girl; and could I dare to do so without sin, I should thank the dispensation which gave me so loving and so loved a daughter. Nor was the affection of your departed uncle less perfect; but you have yet to learn that, on his death-bed, his last prayer was for you and Frederick. For his children. Do you understand that prayer, my child? He has made no provision for you in his will; for he has bequeathed to you something more worthy of the tenderness he felt for the daughter of his adoption, the pride of his latter years; and this bequest is the hand of his only son."

"Of Frederic!" gasped out her breathless listener.

"Even so: Frederic loves you. He must love you. Were you not the companions, the friends of long and happy years? How can it be otherwise? You will soon meet again. Five years of absence have changed you strangely, Gertrude—changed you from a pretty child into a graceful woman: and this change cannot but delight Frederic; while, on his side, the handsome youth of twenty is about to return to us an accomplished and travelled man of twenty-five; and surely you will find no fault with such an alteration? And now kiss me, my own love, and tell me that you shall be happy to become indeed my daughter!"

"Aunt!" exclaimed Gertrude, as she freed herself from the embrace of her smiling relative, and cast herself upon her knees before her: "a grateful heart has few words. You know how I have ever loved you; how I loved him for whom we mourn; forgive me, then, if I declare that I dare not be happy as you would have me—my dear, dear aunt, I dare not. Oh, I beseech you, do not withdraw your hand! Do not misunderstand me, or you will break my heart! Indeed, indeed, you little know all that I feel; all that I would hope, did I dare to do so. Remember, my best, my only friend, that when Frederic—when Mr. Mortimer—left England, I was a mere girl of twelve years old, to whose childish fancies he granted an indulgence attributable at once to his own generous nature and to his desire to act in all things according to the pleasure of his parents. Remember, too, that five long years have since elapsed; that Frederic—that Mr. Mortimer—has grown to manhood; that he has visited many countries; seen many, many women more worthy of his love than your poor Gertrude; and that I could not, even orphan and penniless as I am, that I could not throw myself on the mercy of a reluctant heart."

The brow of Mrs. Mortimer darkened for an instant, but the shadow passed away as rapidly as it had gathered; and it was with a playful smile that she smoothed down the long silken curls which streamed over her knees, as she asked cheerfully: But is this all, my penniless and desolate young lady? Does the reluctance only exist in a want of faith in the continued affection of Frederic; or has it also some hidden source into which my maternal eyes are not permitted to intrude? Answer me honest ly, as becomes your nature, and as you hope for my love and confidence."

